Other media used were flashing lights and altering backgrounds projected onto a large screen. The effects gave the story more depth and kept it engaging when employed.

Wolfson's history as a storyteller was evident and her costume was appropriate. She wore a long, shimmering robe that fell to the floor, its wide sleeves hanging down each time she raised her arms in emphasis.

She altered her voice depending on which character she was portraying, used gestures to give the epic motion and varied her tone and inflection throughout the hour-long performance.

Yet despite Wolfson's successful storytelling ability, there were moments when the story fell flat. This occurred most often when there was no music to accompany the narrative. One felt like Gilgamesh was trying to stay awake for seven days and nights listening to his ancestor tell him a story.

The performance would have benefited from a closer blending of the oral and the melodic, since the areas of the epic that utilized both were strongest.

Each note and beat of the music fit perfectly with the emotions and events it illustrated, never feeling like an intrusion on Wolfson's narrative. Rather, the melodies added an unobtrusive layer. When they stopped and the musicians sat idly in their chairs, the story felt hollow and incomplete.

Wolfson's idea of collaborating with musicians in her recitation of myth is wonderful, but she should have taken more advantage of Shaheen and his ensemble for this piece.

The Qantara Ensemble took the stage after the conclusion of the epic. Without the story to focus on, one was able to concentrate completely on the musicians. After only a few notes it was obvious that all five musicians were skilled in their instrument.

Opening with "Al-Qantara," the Ensemble initially livened things up with their bright improvisations and quick-moving fingers. The high whining tones of the Arabian music almost made one feel as though they had been transported to hot, dusty streets.

A give-and-take exchange between Shaheen on the oud and Dafer Yawll on percussion especially enthralled the audience.

On Shaheen's Web site, the Ensemble is described as combining Shaheen's "Arabic musical heritage with postmodern jazz." Unfortunately, it soon became clear that the main aspect of jazz that the Qantara Ensemble drew from was that of constant improvisational solos.

The musical skill demonstrated during these improvisations was undoubtedly impressive, revealing a quality of musicianship rarely seen.

Yet there were six many lengthy solos during each song that the once-bright improvisations became a distraction from the beautiful melodies.

Watching Bassam Saba (flute and nay) and William Shaheen (oud and violin) standing idly on stage during yet another oud solo by Simon Shaheen, one wondered if they, too, were just waiting to get back to the actual song.

The Qantara Ensemble's concluding song, "Waving Sands with Mizwij Introduction," immediately perked the audience up each time the refrain was played. However, attendees sunk back into listlessness during each of the series of celebratory solos, waiting for the rich refrain's return.

The workmanship of the actor and the musicians was superior, but the performance could have improved. Greater use of music during "Gilgamesh," and fewer improvisational solos during the Qantara Ensemble's piece would have made the performance more accessible to a college audience.

Indie-pop band Cloud Cult is renowned for releasing eco-friendly and socially-conscious music.

Cloud Cult's green tea party

BY LEN RIGHI
THE MORNING CALL

Craig Minowa has been nurturing his eco-friendly band Cloud Cult since the early 1990s, and like anyone who is finally reaping some success after eking out a living in the hard-scrabble world of experimental orchestrated indie-pop, he speaks with pride at how his musical garden has grown.

"It's been a gradual process," says Minowa by cell phone from his organic farm in northern Minnesota. "But it seems like with each album we come out with, there's a trajectory that goes through yet another layer of the crust of mainstream media."

Minowa considers the most recent of Cloud Cult's eight ingenious discs of green-themed songs about life, loss and redemption – 2007's "The Meaning of 8" and this year's "Feel Good Ghosts (Tea-Partying Through Tornadoes)" – especially important breakthroughs.

"Releasing an album used to put me in the hole financially," he says. "Until the last two albums, I was using a credit card to put them out. But for 'The Meaning of 8' I didn't have to go into debt. It was the first album that core members pooled their money and treated it as an investment."

Even so, when "Feel Good Ghosts" was released in April, Minowa announced that Cloud Cult might go on indefinite hiatus after its 2008 tour and perhaps call it quits.

However, the 35-year-old frontman, who works as an environmental scientist for the on-line non-profit Organic Consumers Association, is now forecasting a sunnier future for Cloud Cult and its music, which has drawn comparisons to Arcade Fire, The Postal Service and The Polyphonic Spree.

"The spring tour went really well financially," notes Minowa, who with his band mates often travels in a bio-diesel van, records in a geothermal-powered studio and contributes to the non-profit conservation organization American Forests and NativeEnergy.com, which helps build wind turbines on Native American reservations.

"And we have been able to back off on regular day jobs," says the singer, who estimates he has had 36 of them, including kids' party entertainer, wedding DJ, ice cream truck driver and window handle factory worker. "So we decided to come out and do a fall tour. It's lucrative enough for me to consider it a paying job."

On the tour, "We will be bringing the full shebang," says Minowa, "painters included."

Minowa is referring to his wife, Connie, and trumpeter Scott West, who create original works onstage as the band plays. At the end of each concert, the paintings are auctioned off, with proceeds going to green groups.

Minowa attributes his interest in the environment to his parents, who instructed him about the importance of all living things – humans, plants and animals – as he was growing up in Owatonna, Minn.

"And I've always had an inherent need to do music," adds Minowa, citing The Cure's Robert Smith as "a huge role model" and crediting the Art

For the week of Nov. 17 – Nov. 20

(the sors) n. key to discovering the weekly happenings of New England

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 17

The Stonewall Center will be showing "Still Black: A Portrait of Black Transmen" tonight at 7 p.m. in room 101 of the Campus Center. This feature-length documentary follows the experiences of six black transgender men living in the United States. The film incorporates personal conversations and encounters which work to challenge the traditional ideas of black masculinity, sexuality and identity. Following the showing will be a discussion led by local black transmen.

For more information, contact the Stonewall Center at stonewall@stuaf.umass.edu or 413-545-6924.

"Bunker Hill," directed by Kevin Willmott, will be shown tonight at 7:30 p.m. in Herter 231. Willmott, who will be introducing the film, is an independent film director in the Confederate States of America and professor at the University of Kansas. The movie stars Emmy Award winner James McDaniel of "NYPD Blue." Laura Kirk, star and co-writer of feature film "Lisa Picard is Famous," and Saeed Jaffrey, an Indian actor who has starred in more than 150 films.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 18

The Afro-American Studies department will host a book reading with Dr. Paula J. Giddings tonight at 7 p.m. Giddings will be discussing the motivation for her newest publication, "Ida: A Sword Among Lions," which traces the life of Ida B. Wells, a journalist and civil rights activist of the late 1890s. Books will be for sale after the discussion, and refreshments will be served.

For more information, contact Tricia Loveland at tloveland@afroam.umass.edu or at 413-545-2751.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 19

Sigrid Schmalzer of the University of Massachusetts history department will hold a book signing for the launch of his newest publication, "The People's Peking Man." Held in the Special Collections Reading room on the 25 floor of the Library from 4p.m. to 5:30 p.m., the book addresses the ideas of popular science and human identity in modern-day China.

For more information, contact Danielle Kovacs at dkovacs@library.umass.edu or 413-545-2784.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 20

The Solos & Duos Series will feature Dave Douglas and Marcus Rojas tonight at 8 p.m. in Bezanson Recital Hall to close their seventh season. Trumpeter Douglas is recognized as an original Am.rican musician who emerged from the jazz scene of the last decade, and has won awards from "Down Beat," "Jazz Times," "Jazziz," and the New York Jazz Award. Tuba player Rojas has sprinkled his musical career with appearances on the "Late Show with David Letterman," "The Daily Show with Jon Stewart," "The Today Show" and "Saturday Night Live" and The Grammys from New York City, and has performed and recorded with Michael Jackson, Ray Charles, Paul Simon, Stevie Wonder, Queen Latifah, Aretha Franklin and Rose O'Donnell among others.

His song, "Modern Nature," from his debut record, is also featured on the soundtrack, along with a duet with chanteuse Lillian Samdal, as well as a cover of Pete Townsend's "Let My Love Open the Door."

Tonight's performance will be Lerche's first Northampton appearance since his tour in support of "Two Way Monologue" in October 2004 – a show on the same night as the first game of the Red Sox' World Series sweep of the St. Louis Cardinals.

This time around, the Sox romance is over, offering an opportunity for a true romantic to take the stage, unhindered by the absence of athletic fanatics.

Sondre Lerche will perform with opener Sylvia Lewis tonight, Nov. 17, at 7 p.m. at the Iron Horse Music Hall located at 20 Center Street in Northampton. Tickets are $15 in advance, available from the Northampton Box Office, or $18 at the door.

of Noise for his interest in samples and sound sculpting.

"That carried me through (lean times). I'd think back to bands like (British new wave band) The Cure, who had a half-dozen albums out before hitting in the U.S."

Minowa released the first of Cloud Cult's eight albums, 1994's "Shade Project," as a solo studio project. The band's name refers to ancient Native American prophecies advising humans to balance technology with spirituality.

However, by the time of 2000's "Who Killed Puck?" he had formed his own label, Earthology Records, and recruited other musicians, and they began to play live.

Cloud Cult's status among critics and fans billowed with three subsequent albums – 2003's "They Live on the Sun," which hit No. 1 on many college-radio charts; 2004's "Aurora Borealis," and 2005's "Advice from the Happy Hippopotamus."

"Our music is open, honest and intimate," says Minowa, noting that "They Live on the Sun" was written in the year after the death of his infant son Kaidin in 2002.

"'Sun' is about all of the different grief processes," he explains, "while 'Borealis' is about the later stages of grief, when you're starting to accept it and think about mortality and the hereafter. 'Hippopotamus' delves further into that philosophy. Near the end it gets playful about what happens when we die."

"The Meaning of It," says Minowa, "is about what it would be like if you had one foot in the living and one foot on the other side of that veil," while "Feel Good Ghosts" says that "life has its own inherent darkness" and outlines "the exercises and mental habits that allow you to smile – you know, party through the tornado."

In concert, Minowa and band are performing several tunes from "Ghosts," including "Everybody Here Is a Cloud." "The meanings are multiple," says Minowa of the joyfully rhythmic track he conceived on his back porch late one night while looking up at the stars and watching the clouds between them. "On one level, it says the vast majority of what we're made of is water. "But it's also about longing for the hereafter and wondering what that will be, and on a socio-political level, about the path to a more sustainable civilization."

"No One Said It Would be Easy" and "Journey of the Featherless" also are on the set list.

"It's kind of like a pep rally song," says Minowa of the former, a pulsating, keyboard-rippled neo-psychedelic tune. "It's about the struggles we're going through, and the necessity to stay optimistic, fight the good fight and make it out the other side."

The latter is one of "Ghosts'" best daft flights of fancy. It was inspired by trip to Malaysia that Minowa's wife had to make because of her job, as head of the Earthology Institute, a non-profit devoted to children's environmental issues founded by the Minowas in the late 1990s.

Rappers in new reality

the artists that I love, that there is a message that's sometimes degrading to women, uses the 'n' word a little too frequently," he said in an interview on BET. "But also something that I'm really concerned about is (they're) always talking about material things, about how I can get something, more money, more cars."

In the wake of racially charged remarks by talk show host Don Imus last year, Obama said rap wasn't blameless because it too contained derogatory language. Hip-hop pioneer Russell Simmons called Obama "a mouse, too, like everyone else," and urged him to take a closer look at the social conditions that made such lyrics commonplace.

In the wake of Obama's victory, Simmons struck a more conciliatory tone, calling it a "glorious" affirmation of "the hip-hop generation and its young people."

"I was just defending hip-hop," he said of his earlier criticism of Obama. "It's good for politicians to say they're against hip-hop. But hip-hop's job is to tell the truth, and the truth can be shocking."

Though many older activists didn't believe Obama could win the presidency, convinced that his race was too big of a barrier, the "hiphop generation said, 'Why not?'" Simmons said. "It's like when Run-DMC first appeared on MTV. There really hadn't been any black artists on MTV offering a real depiction of inner-city life, and hip-hop broke that barrier. Hip-hop's attitude has always been, 'Why not?'"

But activist Rev. Al Sharpton said Obama's victory will force hip-hop to change its tune. "You can't be using the 'b' word, the 'n' word, the 'h' word when you have Barack Obama redefining overnight the image that black people want to have. Here's the greatest political victory in the history of black America, and the thug rappers can't come near it. They will have to change or become irrelevant."

Simmons says that's hogwash. "Young people will use their language the way they want," he said. "If it's in their heart, they will express it."

Hip-hop has always been far too diverse to ever be so narrowly defined. Even before Obama became a serious candidate, the more thuggish brands of hip-hop were already in commercial decline, while some of rap's biggest recent successes – Kanye West, Lupe Fiasco, Common, OutKast – have been notable for their more high-minded lyricism.

As Obama said in the BET interview, "The potential for (rappers) to deliver a message of extraordinary power, that gets people thinking (is there). The thing about hiphop today is it's smart, it's insightful. The way they can communicate a complex message in a very short space is remarkable."

It's also sometimes reckless and irresponsible. And why would anyone who values creative expression want it any other way? Art that tries to conform to a vision of what it is or what it should say instantly dies.

President-elect Obama will have far bigger problems to address than the content of rap lyrics when he takes office. Meanwhile, rappers will begin confronting a new reality starting Jan. 20. How rebellious can they be when one of their fans occupies the most powerful office in the world?

Early deficit dooms UMass

thinking about taking a touchback, the linebacker decided to run and took it 100 yards for the touchdown to put UNH up 10-0.

"I caught it and thought about taking a knee, because I knew my big butt wasn't going to make it all the way," Parent said. "Then I just started running and everyone passed me up. The whole defense was running down the field like a big convoy and we all ran to the end zone together. It was awesome."

Four plays later, UMass' offense turned the ball over again when Devon Jackson picked off a pass intended for Julian Talley.

UNH quarterback R.J. Toman didn't waste any time. On the first play of the drive, Toman ran untouched for 43 yards on a quarterback draw to put the Wildcats up 17-0, just 7:33 into the game.

The Minutemen began to mount another drive, moving to the UNH 37-yard line before Coen was hit from behind by junior T.J. Taylor, jarring the ball loose. Parent recovered the ball and set UNH up for another scoring drive.

The drive by UMass was the sixth straight drive – dating back to last weekend's game against Maine – that ended in a turnover, the first five of which were interceptions.

Again, UNH needed just one play. This time, Toman ran the option and pitched to junior Chad Kackert who ran the ball 48 yards up the left sideline for a 24-0 lead.

"It was as tough of a first quarter as I've ever been a part of," Brown said. "It wasn't one phase. As a team you have to pick each other up when things aren't going well and we weren't able to do that in the first quarter in any way, shape, manner or form."

The Wildcats were facing a third-and-eight on their own 11-yard line on their next drive, when Toman found wide receiver Mike Boyle down the right sideline on a 64-yard reception. A few plays later, on first-and-25 on the UMass 30-yard line, Toman floated a pass to the end zone where he found Kackert to give UNH a 31-0 lead. Toman finished the day with 295 yards on 10-of-18 passing and four touchdowns.

After offenses traded three-and-outs, UNH was forced to punt from their own 25-yard line where UMass made its first big play of the game. As the ball was snapped back to the Wildcat's punter Tom Bishop, UMass' Terrance Farris pushed through the line and blocked the punt.

UMass took over and on three plays drove 11 yards for a touchdown. Fullback Chris Zardas finished off the drive with a 1-yard run. UNH scored once more in the half, bringing the score to 38-7, on a 77-yard pass from Toman to Chris Jeannot – good for Toman's longest pass of the day (he had three completions over 60 yards).

The second half saw each team score another pair of touchdowns, two touchdown passes by Toman, one by Coen and a 3-yard run by UMass running back Tony Nelson.

As with every regular-season matchup between UMass and UNH, the game's most outstanding player was awarded the Bill Knight Trophy. The past two meetings saw UMass players bring home the award, but this year Parent took it for his performance. The Wildcat linebacker had six tackles and two fumble recoveries to go with his 100-yard interception return for a touchdown.

Nelson had a strong day despite the loss, but not strong enough to make up for the six UMass turnovers. The back ran for 154 yards on 24 carries (6.4 yards per carry) and a touchdown. During the first quarter Nelson passed the 1,000 yard mark for the season, making it seven straight seasons that UMass has had a 1,000 yard rusher.

Courtney Robinson, UMass' return man, also became the all-time leading returnee in UMass history when he passed Tim Berra (1,295) and Stephen Parnell (1,317). Robinson now has 1,357 return yards after he returned five kicks for 100 yards.

UMass coach Don Brown, center, expresses his displeasure to his linebacking corps during Saturday's 52-21 loss to New Hampshire. The Wildcats gained 621 yards of offense against the UMass defense.

UM falls to No. 3 Syracuse in NCAAs

It took UMass until the second half of its first game against Syracuse to get on the scoreboard. But in Saturday's contest, it only took the Minutewomen 3 minutes, 25 seconds to get one in the back of the net.

Junior forward Cher King scored for UMass off of a rebound on a penalty corner. Sophomore defender Jackie Tait's shot was initially saved by Syracuse goalkeeper Heather Hess, but was collected by King for the score. The play produced the only save for Hess in the game.

"We came out hard and jumped on them from the very first minute," Sowry said. "Our goal was to put 70 minutes of hockey with the first five minutes taking it to them and we did that; we scored early."

The initial goal didn't rattle Syracuse. The Orange scored about three and a half minutes later to tie the score with a goal from freshman midfielder Martina Loncaria. Syracuse added to its lead when senior midfielder Shannon Taylor scored off of a penalty corner to put the Orange up 2-1.

The Minutewomen tied the game before the half when a turnover by the Syracuse defense led to a UMass goal with under four minutes left in the half.

Sophomore forward Katie Kelly made a steal deep inside the Syracuse zone and faced a slide tackle from Hess as she charged from goal. Kelly lofted the ball over the goalkeeper to forward Katelyn Orlando, who was waiting in front of the goal. The senior and A-10 Player of the Year's score tied up the game as the teams went into halftime.

"I thought the first half was relatively even," Sowry said. "Both teams had their opportunities and they scored two to go one ahead. But our second goal gave us a great rush and gave us a lot of confidence going into halftime."

The UMass confidence took a huge hit when Taylor struck again off of another penalty corner midway through the second half to put the Orange up 3-2.

Penalty corners by Syracuse would eventually doom UMass as the Orange held a 14-4 advantage. The edge was only amplified when Taylor, the nation's leading scorer with 31 goals, was thrown into the equation.

"[Shannon Taylor] is absolutely lethal on penalty corners, she is a weapon," Sowry said. "I think we defended the corners well. But if Shannon Taylor gets a hit off, nine times out of 10 it's a very hard, difficult shot to stop."

Taylor's second goal proved to be the final score of the game as the Minutewomen failed to produce much offense in the second half. UMass mustered only two corners and three shots, none of which were on goal.

The loss ended the season for the Minutewomen, but after two NCAA tournament births in her first two years with the program, Sowry believes that the team is moving in the right direction to get to the next level.

"We're a much more skillful team and a much more knowledgeable team. But we need to learn how to beat the big fish but we were a heck of a lot closer this year," Sowry said. "We know what it takes to get here now, we just have to overcome that last hurdle."

Own goal costs Minutemen in A-10 championship game

Following the goal, The Minutemen created several chances, but could not break through the Flyer's defense.

UMass had its best chance to score in the 77th minute when sophomore midfielder Chris Vaccaro beat Dayton goalkeeper Tyler Picard and had what seemed to be an open net. At the last second, a Dayton defender leapt in front of the shot and headed the ball just over the crossbar.

"A great play by their defender," Koch said. "If [Vaccaro] had put that in, that would have changed the game obviously."

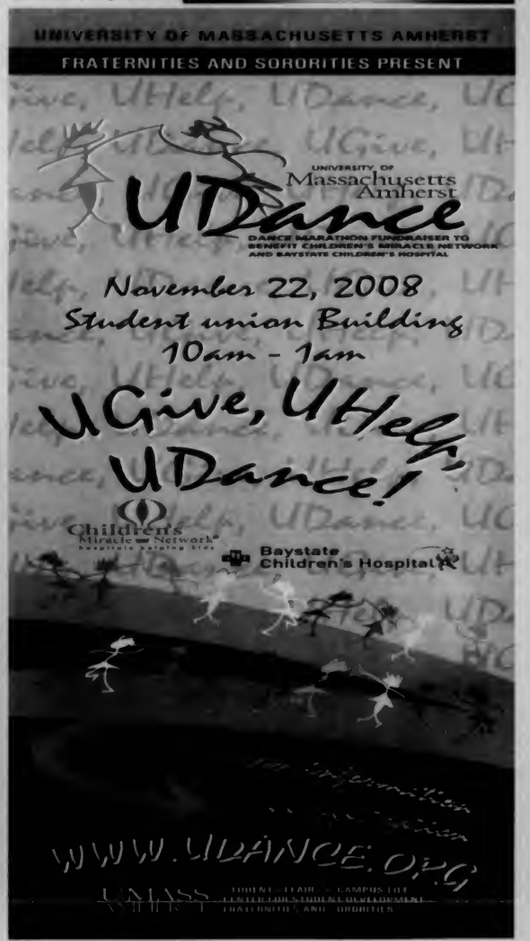
UMass outshot Dayton 14-11 and earned a 7-4 advantage in corner kicks. Koch was proud of his team's effort, but was disappointed they could not get the victory.

"We just didn't have what it took to win the game, we didn't have that little extra something and I give Dayton a lot of credit," Koch said. "They came out hungry, they came out ready, and they made it very hard for us to play. My hat goes off to them and I wish them the best in the NCAA tournament."

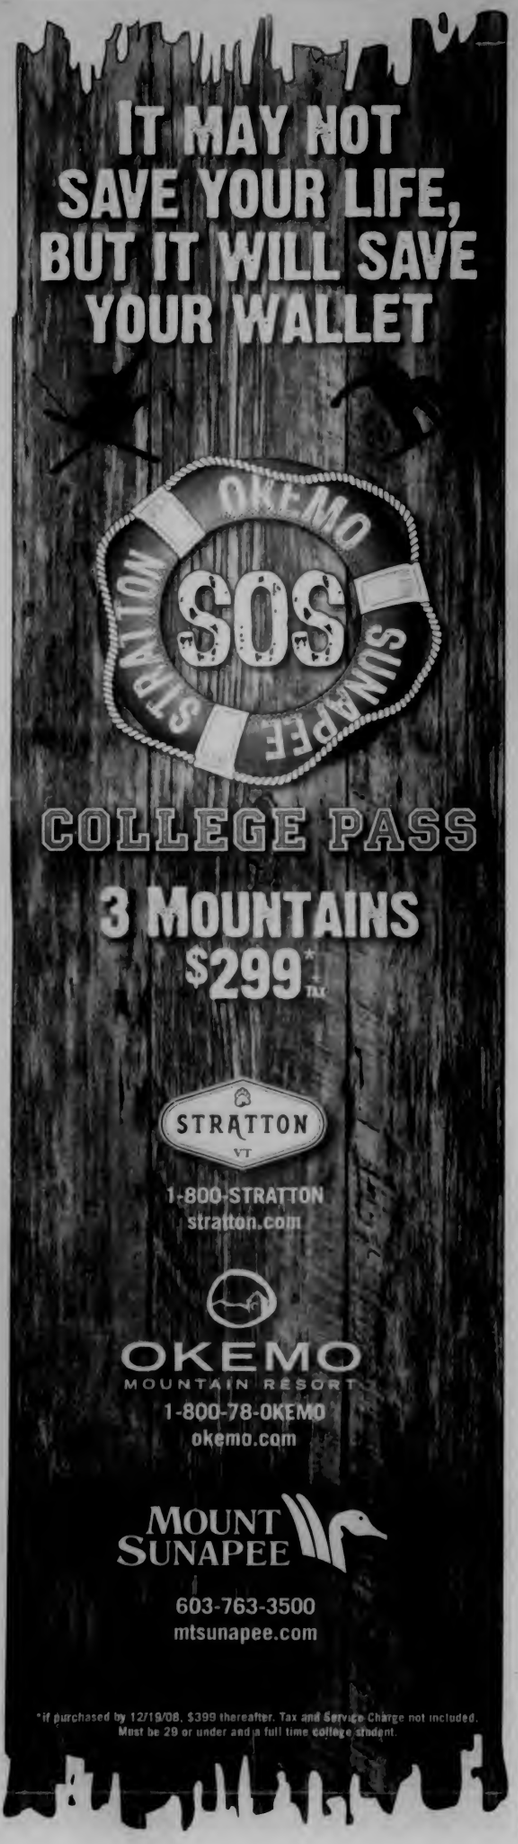
The game was played in snowy conditions that made it challenging for both teams. At one point, UMass midfielder Chris Rowsess' feet got wet and he wound up losing feeling in his feet in the second half.

Koch did not believe that the weather had an effect on the outcome, mentioning that the Minutemen are used to cold weather and snow.

The Minutemen advanced to the finals by defeating the Billikens (11-4-5) for the second time this season. Saint Louis came into both games ranked in the top 25 in the country, but could not overcome the Minutemen this year. UMass beat the Billikens 2-1 in double overtime on Nov. 7.



UMass started off quickly as Rowsess scored his second goal of the season nine minutes into the game, converting a crossing pass from midfielder Ben Arikan. Arikan notched his team-leading seventh assist on the play.



In the 17th minute of play, a Saint Louis defender committed a foul on UMass defender Dan Lepone inside the box. Lepone was awarded a penalty kick, which he converted on to give UMass a two-goal lead. It was the first career goal for Lepone.

Junior defender Dan Lepone and the Minutemen will have to wait until tonight at 6 p.m. to find out if they are selected to be in the NCAA Tournament. UMass made the College Cup last season.

Fourth line surprises

Watson, Concannon, Crowder stepping up

By Ryan Fleming
Collegian Staff

Usually, no matter what the sport is, you would like to have your best against your opponent's best. So, when UMass hockey coach Don Cahoon shockingly started his fourth line against Boston University's offensively-potent first line, in the Minutemen's 5-1 victory Friday over the Terriers, you immediately started to wonder how this peculiar tactic would fair for the Minutemen.

But Cahoon, like any good coach, had a method to his decision.

From the opening faceoff, which was won by UMass' Brett Watson, the fourth line made the game very difficult and frustrating for BU's top line.

The line of Marc Concannon, Watson and Scott Crowder got in the way of the Terrier top line of Chris Higgins, Colin Wilson and Jason Lawrence all game long.

"UMass' fourth line looked like a terrific line tonight," Boston University coach Jack Parker said after Friday's game. "They played great defense and they got at least one goal.

"But that line really played hard and against [BU's Colin] Wilson's line they really played hard," Parker continued. "During the course of 60 minutes that line was out against Wilson's line an awful lot and I thought they played extremely well, so you have to give them credit."

The trio cut off their passing lanes, forced turnovers with their physical play and held the top Terrier line to eight shots, all stopped by UMass net minder Paul Dainton. BU's top line finished with a combined plus-minus rating of minus-9.

In 60 minutes of hockey, the UMass fourth line was paired up with the Terrier top line for at least 75 percent of the action. Watson, an outstanding defensive forward, played on UMass' top penalty killing unit as well.

Not only did Concannon, Watson and Crowder play just like Cahoon wanted them to defensively, they also provided a bonus spark when the line, in a total collective effort, scored UMass' fourth goal.

The Minutemen gained the offense zone with the puck being carried in by Watson. Watson slid the pass to Concannon who skated toward Terrier net minder Grant Rollheiser's right. Concannon looked up and noticed Scott Crowder stationed on Rollheiser's immediate left. Concannon slid the pass to Crowder, who one-timed it past the Terrier goaltender.

"One of the most important and crucial aspects of tonight's win was the play of Brett Watson's line matching up with Colin Wilson's line," Cahoon said. "I thought Crowder, Concannon and Watson were absolutely fabulous all night long."

Cahoon stressed the value of Watson offsetting Wilson all game long and the level of difficulty Concannon and Crowder added to the playmaking ability of Higgins and Lawrence.

Due to the trio's success, the Minutemen matched their top line and second line with the Terriers' second and third lines, respectively. Those matchups caused mismatches that UMass took full advantage of.

The fourth line was paired up with the UMass first defensive pairing of Justin Braun and Martin Nolet. On the night, the five registered 11 shots on net.

"There's this thing called effort and I have a bunch of kids that give me that effort," Cahoon said.

UM upsets No. 1 BU

November evening increased the humidity inside the Mullins Center for Saturday's game, making the ice much softer and harder to play on.

The River Hawks (5-4-0, 3-2-0 HEA) adapted to the conditions better than the Minutemen as they controlled play for the entire game. The Minutemen struggled to make crisp, precise passes and keep control of the puck – ultimately shutting down their offense for the first time this season.

UMass sophomore Paul Dainton was in net, while Nevin Hamilton started for the River Hawks. Each goaltender made 22 saves in the game, and UML outshot UMass by a very slim margin, 24-22.

"[The River Hawks] ended up making a couple plays, scoring a couple goals, but we didn't and that's the game," Cahoon said.

UMass Lowell's ability to overcome the abnormal ice conditions ultimately granted them the win.

"[The] game is played on a lot of different surfaces and sometimes you just have to adjust and play. You obviously didn't see the puck movement tonight that maybe you've seen a few times in the past and it affected us," Cahoon said. "We've got to be able to play through that and be able to make an adjustment to our game to be able to generate a little more offense and we didn't do that."

The first period was scoreless, but 9 minutes, 37 seconds into the second period UML's Michael Budd scored his first career goal in his second game for the River Hawks. They doubled the lead at 12:03 in the third period when Scott Campbell scored on UML's man advantage – ending UMass' penalty kill streak that had been perfect for the last 29 attempts.

In the third period, UMass seemed to adjust to the conditions, but a little too late. UMass outshot UML, 9-7, but still couldn't come out with a goal.

On Friday, ice conditions weren't a factor and the Minutemen dominated play for much of the game. The Terriers came out hard, putting a lot of pressure on their forecheck by sending two forwards deep into the Minutemen's zone. This didn't allow UMass to break out the puck efficiently.

With Dainton in net, and after withstanding the pressure from one of the top offenses in Hockey East during the first period, UMass was confident that his sharp play would continue to benefit the team for the remainder of the game, and it did. He made 30 saves.

After the first half of the first period, the Minutemen took control of play and didn't let down for the rest of the game, putting pressure on BU's goaltender Grant Rollheiser – who made 21 saves.

Senior Cory Quirk put UMass on the board first, 7:03 into the game, when he received a pass from sophomore line-mate James Marcou. Quirk skated into the slot and backhanded the puck into the top shelf.

UMass returns to play next weekend with two games against defending national champion Boston College.

Game notes

The last time UMass beat a No. 1 opponent was Jan. 28, 1995 in a 4-2 win over Maine. Overall it is 2-12-1 against No. 1 teams … In the last 50 games, the Minutemen are 47-2-1 when scoring at least four goals … UMass is 0-3-1 when it doesn't score at least three goals … The last time UMass was shutout by UMass Lowell was Jan. 4, 2004 … Freshman defender Matthew Irwin scored his first career goal against BU.

Tournament turmoil

UM loses A-10 title game to Dayton, NCAAs in doubt

BY SCOTT FELDMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts men's soccer team prevented opponents from getting the ball into their net throughout the Atlantic 10 tournament.

In the end, only the Minutemen could score on the Minuteman defense.

UMass defeated No. 17 Saint Louis, 2-0, Friday in the semi-finals of the A-10 tournament. However, the Minutemen lost to Dayton, 1-0, in the A-10 championship game when a UMass defender accidentally headed the ball into his own net.

"We shut out Saint Louis in the first game. We denied Dayton from scoring against us in the second game, but we couldn't shut ourselves out," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "The only way to beat [goalkeeper Zack Simmons] was for us to score on him."

The loss cost the Minutemen (10-7-3) an automatic bid in the NCAA tournament and puts their hopes for an at-large bid in jeopardy. UMass finds out tonight at 6:00 p.m. whether the tournament committee believes it deserves a chance to make it back to the College Cup.

The tournament and quite possibly season-deciding goal came on a fluke play 19 minutes into the game. Dayton's Zack Weiss booted the ball into the box while trying to set up his teammate. A UMass defender tried to head it over the crossbar, but it took an awkward bounce and wound up in the corner of the UMass net.

Minutewomen fall just short in first round

BY NICK O'MALLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

For the No. 17 Massachusetts field hockey team, Saturday's matchup against No. 3 Syracuse in the first round of the NCAA tournament was all that stood between them and their status as one of the most elite teams in the nation.

|---|---|
| UMass | 2 |

But for UMass coach Justine Sowry and her players, the Minutewomen came one goal short of achieving that in a season-ending 3-2 loss.

UMass (17-5) heads into the offseason at the same point it did a year ago – getting ousted in the first round of the tournament. In the process, the team collected the program's 11th Atlantic 10 title and 21st NCAA tournament appearance. Making it to that point, however, is a success for Sowry and the Minutewomen.

"Our goal was to make the NCAA tournament, and we achieved that," Sowry said. "We won the A-10 title again and won a very tough play-in game and going against the No. 3 team in the country. Our goal was to leave it all out on the field and I'm proud of how our girls fought."

All season long, the Minutewomen have been on the cusp of beating some of the best teams in the country, including No. 5 Connecticut and then-No. 2 Syracuse earlier this season. However, UMass beat top-ranked teams in No. 19 Kent State and No. 20 Albany.

The Minutewomen stormed back from a 4-0 halftime deficit but fell just short of a win in a 5-4 loss in their first matchup against the Orange (21-1), only to come one goal short of ousting them once again in their second game.

"We certainly had our chances and we just kept persisting, which is true to our form all year," Sowry said.

UMass routed by UNH in CAA laugher

DURHAM, N.H. — New Hampshire didn't beat the Massachusetts football team this weekend. UMass beat itself.

Despite having the ball for just 2 minutes, 50 seconds of the first quarter, the No. 13 Wildcats built a 24-0 lead en route to a 52-21 victory over the Minutemen. All but three of UNH's first quarter points were off of UMass turnovers.

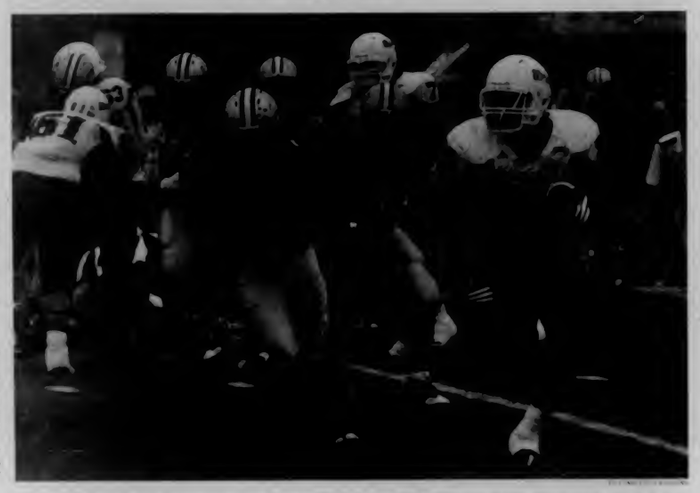
"Offensively, I thought we were as guilty of stopping ourselves as anything," UMass coach Don Brown said.



The Wildcats (8-2, 5-2 Colonial Athletic Association) started with the ball and quickly hit a 46-yard field goal for the first score of the game.

No. 22 UMass (6-5, 3-4 CAA) came out on the ensuing drive and moved the ball down field with ease. But on third-and-goal from the UNH 6-yard line, quarterback Liam Coen threw his first of four interceptions. Coen finished the day completing 22-of-41 passes for 211 yards and one touchdown.

"I honestly didn't even see what happened," Coen said after the game. "I knew I threw it in the right spot. I think it got batted and popped up. I don't know what happened; it just didn't go our way on that play."

Kellogg vs. Calipari

Midnight Madness: teacher, pupil reunite in Memphis

BY ADAM MILLER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It wasn't too long ago that Massachusetts men's basketball coach Derek Kellogg sat in Memphis senior Robert Dozier's family room and recruited him for the Tigers.

Now Kellogg will be coaching against him.

UMass (1-1) officially opens the college basketball season as part of ESPN's 24-hour marathon against No. 12 Memphis (1-0) Monday at midnight at the FedEx Forum in Memphis.

In their previous game against Southern Illinois, the Minutemen were up by as many as 15 points in the first half, but 20 turnovers ultimately allowed for the Salukis to pull off an 80-73 comeback victory.

Against a team as successful as the Tigers, UMass isn't going to have nearly the margin for error that it did in Carbondale, Ill.

Yet Memphis is nowhere near as dominant as it was last season when it lost a close game in the NCAA championship to Kansas, led by NBA No. 1 overall draft pick Derrick Rose. Even without three of their five starters from last year, the Tigers are expected to be one of the best teams in college basketball.

The arrival of freshman guard Tyreke Evans is part of the reason why Memphis can continue its high aspirations of winning an NCAA championship. Evans isn't as polished as Rose, but was rated the sixth-best incoming freshman according to the Web site Rivals.com.

Memphis rolled through its first opponent, Fairfield, 90-63, on Nov. 15. After playing the Minutemen, the Tigers will compete in a three-game series in Puerto Rico before returning to the FedEx Forum.

Prior to this season, Memphis coach John Calipari held a policy of not competing against former assistant coaches, but changed the rule after Kellogg got the UMass head coaching job.

The Tigers' schedule features meetings with three of Calipari's former assistant coaches: Tony Barbee (UTEP), Steve Roccaforte (Lamar) and Bruiser Flint (Drexel).

The last time UMass played Memphis was on Jan. 4, 1996 when the top-ranked Minutemen beat the Tigers, 64-61. That meeting was part of Calipari's last season coaching the Minutemen, who went on to make the NCAA Final Four.

Kellogg played under Calipari at UMass between the 1992 and 1995 seasons. Kellogg made the NCAA tournament every year while playing for the Minutemen. Their best season was during Kellogg's last year when they reached the Elite Eight.

After his playing days, Kellogg's coaching career received a big boost from Calipari after three years as a mid-major assistant coach. Kellogg was one of the first hires to Calipari's staff after taking the job at Memphis in 2000.

As an assistant coach, Kellogg has worked with and recruited four first-round picks in the NBA draft. His most significant recruit to date is Rose, who is the starting point guard for the Chicago Bulls in his rookie season.

Some of Rose's success with Memphis came from being part of the dribble-drive motion offense.

Kellogg is carrying that offense over to the Minutemen with the help of assistant coach and creator of the dribble-drive offense, Vance Walberg.

Kellogg believes the offense is helpful for any point guard, which is why he has such high expectations for Chris Lowe. The senior won't be expected to put up numbers similar to Rose, but he is expected to be one of the best point guards in the Atlantic 10.

Lowe is averaging 17.5 points and 5.5 assists per game. But after committing 10 turnovers with no assists against the Salukis, the Minutemen are going to need Lowe to take better care of the ball against the Tigers.

Young free throw caps comeback win

BY DAVID BRINCH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts women's basketball team found an opportune time to take its first lead in its home opener Sunday afternoon against Manhattan.

| Manhattan | 68 |

Senior guard Sakera Young hit one of two free throws with two seconds remaining to break the tie as the Minutewomen came back from a 19-point halftime deficit to defeat Manhattan, 71-68, at the Mullins Center.

After a layup by UMass' Ifatiema Hill tied the game at 68 with a minute remaining, Manhattan had the ball with under 10 seconds to go with a chance to win. But Kelly Regan's shot went in-and-out, as the game appeared headed to overtime.

But an offensive foul was called on Nadia Peters on the rebound attempt, sending Young to the line for two shots with 1.9 seconds left.

Young hit her first free throw, but grabbed her own rebound on the second shot and hit a soft layup to seal the victory for the Minutewomen.

"As a senior I knew I had to knock them down and lead by example and show heart," Young said after the game. "I wasn't thinking and I just made sure I made one of them."

UMass coach Marnie Ducko felt that she could rely on her senior guard to win the game for her team after such a hard-fought comeback.

"She's a great foul shooter and she's great at practice and was great last year," Ducko said. "I said 'you're a senior, ice the cake for us.' And she did."

Fellow senior guard Stefanie Gerardot added 24 points and a team-high seven rebounds in a game that was characterized by sloppy defensive play and unforced turnovers by UMass in the first half.

Both teams traded baskets early in the game, but back-to-back 3-pointers from guard Alyssa Herrington put the Jaspers up 12 points with just over 10 minutes to go in the first half.

The visiting team continued to dominate offensively throughout the first half with help from Herrington, Regan and Abby Weersworth.

"Their big people were killing us down low. We had an incredible time defending the screen and that starts with communication," Ducko said.

The Jaspers had eight turnovers at halftime, while the Minutewomen had trouble holding on to the ball, registering 17.

Seven different Minutewomen had at least two turnovers within the first half. Manhattan scored 17 points off of turnovers in the first half, but only six points in the second.

UMass also failed to connect on some easy layups, along with going 3-of-6 from the free-throw line and 0-for-8 from 3-point range.

"We really did self implode offensively and defensively in the first half," Ducko said. "I think our kids came back and played with a lot of heart and took a defensive stand and had the defensive stand translate into offensive possessions."

Despite narrowing the lead and tightening up their defense, the Jaspers continued to score often in the second half.

The Cameroon native finished with five rebounds and six points, including two put-backs in the game late in the game to help spark the UMass comeback.

"She's a great defensive player who can defend and jump with anybody, and she just played with a lot of determination and heart," Ducko said.

"I think it's a great morale boost and learning experience but we aren't going to be able to play like this and win too many games, so we have to get better," Ducko added.

Chief of police steps down

BY ADAM P. COULTER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

University of Massachusetts Chief of Police Barbara O'Connor plans to leave the University in January to become the executive director of public safety at the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign. The trustees at the University of Illinois voted on Nov. 3 to approve the decision.

"Her dedication to professional development makes her an ideal fit for my leadership team," said Richard Herman, chancellor at the Urbana campus, recently in a statement on the University's Web site.

O'Connor, 47, has been with the UMass Police Department for 25 years and has officially served as chief since 2002, having performed the duties as acting chief for a short time before that.

"The chief has had a long and very distinguished career here at UMass and has served the community well," said UMass spokesman Ed Blaguszewski. "She's led the department to a new level – they're well trained and well prepared."

During the seven years of O'Connor's leadership, UMass has been recognized for many accomplishments in varying aspects of community policing, which have resulted in a more efficient and cohesive department.

"When I inherited the department the morale was very low because of several years of bad contract negotiations, and there was no spirit of cooperation or camaraderie," O'Connor said.

She acknowledged that there wasn't much she could do on the contract side, but that some things could be done to improve the working mechanics of the law enforcement team.

"We really worked hard to address this, and we changed the organization culture by assessing a sense of value and appreciation for what we do as a team," she said.

Past UMPD officers have turned down jobs with bigger salaries to stay at UMass, evidence of the organization's progress under O'Connor.

"I've had three or four officers during my tenure turn down jobs with the state police, which is significant because they make six figures. Officers feel valued here," O'Connor said.

New aggressive programs have come to fruition under O'Connor as well.

Created in 2002, the police cadet program for college students interested in law enforcement is one such unique opportunity.

"Young people who come here who never think about becoming a university police officer see what we do and say, 'This is the only place I want to be a cop, chief,'" said O'Connor. "I've hired six cadets as full time officers once they finished college," she added.

There has been community policing programs initiated around crime prevention and problem solving, and state-of-the-art security systems and cameras installed in the dorms and around campus, which have produced facts related to the reduction in crime on campus, as well as student's opinions.

"They've been a good help solving crimes," said Aaron Hobbs, a junior journalism major.

"The cameras as a campus-wide standard has now reduced crime significantly," said O'Connor. According to the 2007 Annual Security Report

Ahearn researches 'green' building

BY KIMYA HEDAYAT-ZADEH
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Professor of landscape architecture and regional planning Jack Ahern returned to the University of Massachusetts after a trip to China last month, where he gave several lectures.

The trip was part of a sabbatical research tour examining whether countries are implementing "green" infrastructures and their own approaches to sustainability.

Like many modernized nations, China's pace of industrialization has triggered an equally rapid rate of pollution and deforestation. According to the Yale Center for the Study of Globalization, China has surpassed even the United States as the greatest source of greenhouse gas emissions, with 20 of the 30 most air-polluted cities in the world located in China.

According to Ahern, China's surge in urbanization "may be faster than anywhere else in the world," and this made it an ideal place to investigate how to implement sustainability practices.

At the 2008 China Landscape Architecture Education Conference at Peking University Ahern spoke about "Green Infrastructures," an idea linking urban development with urban sustainability to provide ecological services in cities.

An important aspect of creating this "green" infrastructure is rainwater management, or "the way water moves between the sky and rivers and the streams," added Ahearn.

"Traditional systems of urban drainage do a lot of damage to the ecological system and provide few benefits," said Ahern. "So in the green infrastructure rain water management ... involves showing the water down and infiltrating the water into the ground instead of putting it into pipes. And when the water goes into the ground, then you can create new wetlands and the new wetlands can support native plants and provide habitat for wildlife."

Another example of "green" infrastructure is the idea of planting trees in cities, or "urban forest canopy."

"So if you imagine flying over a city in an airplane and looking down at the city, how much of the

Alum creates first online game show

BY GARY TARANTINO
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

University of Massachusetts 1990 graduate of the Isenberg School of Management and Newton, Mass. resident, Eric Friedberg, has launched the first, live game show over the Web.

The website, ItsEasyToWin.com, is a free online live game show that allows consumers to interact with the game's host and to participate in games, sweepstakes and promotions, paving the way for a new generation of live online game shows.

The Web site went live on Oct. 11, 2008 and has signed more than 5,000 members. The innovative site includes popular, instant win games, most notably "Texas Hold 'Em" and "Scratch and Win."

"Consumers tune in and can immediately win," he said.

In order to play, consumers must log in and register. Registration is free. Once users log in, they are randomly selected to go into a one-on-one chat with the host.

Five different games are available on the site.

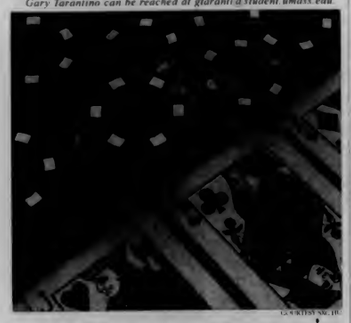
"Pick Until You Win" is a weekly, live game show a the cash prize of up to $1,000.

"Treasure of the Seven Seas" is a scratch-and-win instant game with the chance in which participants can win up to $50,000, a trip to Aruba and other prizes, and ItsEasyToWin.com is giving away a trip every month.

"Texas Hold 'Em" is a poker game with potentially winnings of $777, and "Dollar Bill Madness" is a game involving the consumer's own dollar bills. The $50,000 bill is the only winner in this game and can be found by looking at your bill's serial number. This game offers over $250,000 in cash prizes.

The fifth and final game is "What's In Your Naughty Drawer."

Aside from the games, the site includes a joke section called, "Laugh Today," which includes jokes and photos.



"This is a true evolution of the Internet and where game shows are going," Friedberg said.

With the invention of ItsEasyToWin.com, consumers are now given the opportunity to participate in live game shows rather than just watch them. The Friedberg said he plans to continue growing and continuing the site.

Future plans include implementing a social network platform and camera-to-web capabilities for complete audience participation.

Friedberg is also a partner at Cohen-Friedberg Associates, a Boston-based sales promotion agency.

Northampton Prop. 8 protest part of national movement

BY KATE DEVANE
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Crowds gathered in Northampton on Saturday to lend their support for gay marriage and protest the passing of Proposition 8.

Prop. 8 was a California ballot initiative during the Presidential election that passed by a narrow 52 percent majority in the state. Overturning a decision made by the state's Supreme Court in May 2008 to legalize gay marriage, it amends the California state constitution to solely recognize marriages between one man and one woman as legal. The passing of this measure has been debated, with younger generations especially opposed to it – 61 percent of California voters between the ages of 18 and 29 voted against the amendment.

JoinTheImpact, a national organization that says it is dedicated to peacefully raising awareness and gaining equality for the Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender and Queer (LGBTQ) community, organized protests in 300 cities located in all 50 states and in 10 countries against the passing of Prop. 8. These protests, held at 1:30 p.m. EST, featured speeches by local activists and politicians. The organizers hope to bring the issue of gay marriage into the national spotlight as well as to "carry the message of equality as well as one that encourages the entire community to unite for this cause."

One such protest was held in downtown Northampton, in front of city hall on Main Street. Despite rainy weather, an estimated 500 people, many carrying umbrellas and homemade signs, showed up for the event. Other nearby cities also held protests, including a similarly sized gathering in Providence and a large rally in Boston was attended by an estimated 4,000 people.

The Northampton protest featured a number of speakers, including the Raging Grannies, the Unitarian Universalist Society, and a group of drummers, who led the crowd in rousing chants and cheers. Although some of the speakers were difficult to hear without megaphones or microphones, they were able to excite the crowd, which listened attentively as activists talked about their own fight for civil rights in Massachusetts, a leader for gay and lesbian rights.

"I thought it was going to be all college students," said UMass student Lauren Sheehan, who attended the protest. "There were a lot of college students, but a lot of people from the community. There were older people, people with their babies and little kids."

She said the community at large seemed very supportive of the rally.

"People driving by would beep, and it was exciting," she said.

Fellow UMass students Kevin Truong and Amanda Otto, who also participated in the protest, agreed.

They were surprised to see that the majority of the people there were adults.

Truong, who said this was his first time at this type of rally, added that there were large groups of bystanders, curious about the goings-on, who gathered on the sidewalks to watch. The crowd in general seemed very enthusiastic, singing along with protest songs such as "We are a Gentle Angry People."

According to Truong and Otto, a number of people remained to continue the protest even after the rally had officially ended.

Like many similar protests nationwide, the rally in Northampton was organized largely via e-mail and Facebook. A total of 723 people responded to the Facebook event advertising the protest, indicating their plans to attend.

UM professor returns from Chinese lectures

city is covered with trees? And that percentage, some say, should be about 30 percent to have a tree canopy," said Ahern. "When that percentage gets low, like it is in many urban environments, the cities get hotter, all the building materials collect more heat, and people use more energy, and energy causes more pollution. So it's a kind of a spiraling problem."

Increased tree canopy, Ahern said, would translate to better moderation of city temperature, interception of rainfall, and a reduction in the amount of water going down sewers. Trees also act as pollutant-removers; cleaning the air, making environments more attractive to people and providing a better habitat for animals.

"So there's a lot of emphasis on expanding the urban forest canopy … not just because I'm a tree-hugger and I think trees are nice," said Ahern, "But because I can show you that planting trees provides more services to the city."

Despite problems of deforestation and water pollution in China, according to the Yale Center for the Study of Globalization, China "has the most successful afforestation program in the developing world…restoring forest cover close to 20 percent."

Also, according to the Center, rivers in southern China are improving, and "events such as a mass swim across the Pearl River in Guangzhou last year celebrate that progress."

Ahern also cited China's Olympic Forest Park, build for the 2008 Summer Olympics, as an example of "green" infrastructures.

"It's three times the size of Central Park in New York," said Ahern. "The park uses recycled waste water for irrigation and the park has a very beautiful collection of wetlands that are used to clean the water that circulates through the park – also to provide wildlife habitat and also to make beautiful places for people to see and to learn from."

Still, China's environmental situation is complex.

"It's not all good and it's not all bad," said Ahern.

The "bad" parts include the construction of many new highways and roads in China.

"Unfortunately, the Chinese are repeating the same mistakes that we made in this country," said Ahern, referring to the launching of the Interstate Highway System in the 1950s by President Dwight D. Eisenhower, which initiated a car-dependent lifestyle in America.

"The Chinese, like many cultures in the world, are focused on short-term economic gain and they're not thinking about the long-term costs of what they're doing, and when you think like that, it's kind of the opposite of thinking about sustainability," said Ahern.

After visiting Holland, Germany, Denmark and Sweden, Ahern believes northern Europe leads the world in sustainable urbanism. Expansion of "green" infrastructures on a worldwide scale, said Ahern, involves leadership from international groups, like the United Nations, leadership at the national level from presidents, prime ministers and parliaments and local leadership.

"Second is the importance of building demonstration projects," said Ahern, describing the "bite size" projects that allow people to see tangible examples of sustainability.

"And those are the types of projects I went to visit when I was there [in China], because there are no places on Earth that are completely sustainable, so we need to look at some other projects that are headed in the right direction," he added.

Also involved in the successful implemenation of sustainability would be research and scientific evaluation of projects.

"Sustainability is about thinking for the long term, thinking for generations into the future, and a lot of the current economically-driven policies and actions are aimed at short-term economic benefits rather than long-term ecological functions," he explained.

Ahern also spoke about landscape urbanism and sustainability to the landscape architecture department at Tsinghua University in Beijing, as well as students and faculty at Zhejiang Forestry University in Hangzhou and Shanghai Jiao Tong University in Shanghai.

He is now researching sustainable urbanism in Sao Paulo, Brazil — one of the five largest cities in the world.

The city of Beijing, as well as other Chinese cities, is known for its high pollution and smog. On his recent trip to China, UMass professor Jack Ahearn discussed options for sustainability and "green" infrastructure.

Mass. police say no point in enforcing marijuana laws

By Chelsea Pugh
The Daily Free Press (Boston U.)

Nearly two weeks after voters overwhelmingly approved Question 2, a measure to decriminalize possession of less than one ounce of marijuana, police groups that have publicly opposed the measure have their own follow-up: Why bother?

Under the law, which will take effect Dec. 4, officers in Massachusetts will issue a fine to individuals in possession of an ounce or less of marijuana instead arresting them.

The question's approval will put police in a non-enforcement conundrum by forcing them to treat marijuana violations as a lower priority, Boston Police Patrolmen's Association Area A-1 representative James Carnell said.

"Smoking weed will become similar to jay-walking, where you have a law that's totally not enforced because it's a waste of everyone's time," he said.

Carnell said it is not worth an officer's time to seize the drugs and fill out all the necessary paperwork for a citation under the new law and $100 fine when the fined individuals are not even required to show a valid form of identification.

"It would serve no purpose to hand out citations to people who are under no obligation to provide a positive photo ID," he said.

Often those arrested for marijuana possession are breaking other laws and without making an arrest, it will be harder for officers to investigate these crimes, Carnell said.

"This is just one other tool out of our hands to do anything about crime," he said.

There is no way to predict how Massachusetts' police will handle the oncoming changes, Carnell said.

"There is a whole range of issues that still haven't been addressed and it is the street level officers who will be confronted with these issues," he said.

Last year, the Committee for Sensible Marijuana Policy proposed the new law because the group said arrest records unfairly hurt offenders' chances to get jobs or secure financial aid, CSMP chairwoman Whitney Taylor said.

"Lifetime barriers created by involvement with the criminal justice system are too harsh," she said. "We want the penalty to fit the offense."

Taylor said a criminal record makes it difficult for people to obtain jobs, housing and student loans, and the new law will reduce these struggles for many people. The law is not meant to promote the use of marijuana, which is still an illegal substance, she said.

"Eleven other states have passed similar laws and what we've seen is that it does not affect marijuana usage rates at all," Taylor said.

Though the measure will soon take effect, Taylor said the CSMP will continue to work with Massachusetts police to insure the proper enforcement of the new marijuana policy.

"We will be working with others to make sure law enforcement officials and officers on the street enforce the law correctly," she said.

Anti-drug groups like Massachusetts' Drug Abuse Resistance Education will continue to discourage drug use, D.A.R.E. Executive Director Domenic DiNatale said. Still, he acknowledged some laws, no matter how stringently enforced, are powerless to influence some people.

"People are going to use [marijuana] regardless of what the law says," he said.

Chief O'Connor looks back, ahead

released in September there were three armed robberies in 2007 and zero in 2006.

"The first year I was chief we had eleven armed robberies and in 1998 a student was shot here. The fact that we haven't had that kind of violence in seven years say's we're doing something right," she said.

O'Connor and the department, with help from the University, have also implemented a K-9 unit, improved the condition of police vehicles, received additional dispatchers, and have increased the number of officers on the force.

"When I arrived there were 53 officers, and when I leave we'll have 63 from the chief on down," said O'Connor.

O'Connor believes investment in the department is vital and it correlates to lower crime rates and better policing.

"The University's invested in this department tremendously and we've learned that without those investments, officer's morale will be low and they're not going to be proactive in crime prevention," she said.

When asked what challenges she most looks forward to in her new position at the University of Illinois, O'Connor said, "I will be in charge of emergency management and disaster planning, which is a huge task considering the university is a third larger than UMass."

On leaving her home of 25 years she was nostalgic.

"I will miss the people here the most. I always say we don't use the pronoun "I" in this department, it's "we." It's not what I do as a chief it's what we do together," said O'Connor.

Under 21, not underprivileged

Eli Gottlieb

Well, the Presidential election is over and done with. The American people spoke loud enough to hear them through diebold-brand, voice-of-the-people, sound-damping technology.

The music has played and been gone and unfortunately nobody rioted in Southwest or danced the hora in the streets. Thus, it made the most important American presidential election in my lifetime incur less of a celebration than the average Yom Ha'atzmaut.

Ah, now speaking of dancing – let me relate a bizarre experience from a little more than a month ago. I saw a flier in a dining hall for an open night at a nightclub in Northampton for everyone 18 years of age or older, so I decided to go.

It was actually a fun and interesting experience, despite my having to leave quite early (at merely 11:15 p.m.) to catch the bus back to Amherst due to its being a weekday night. I'd rolled my ankle quite severely that night and thus stayed home and took ibuprofen the next day.

But the interesting bit was this: the club I went to is the center of the local gay scene and the local Gothic scene. It is also the only club in the area to have a designated night of the week on which patrons younger than the legal drinking age can enter. I repeat for emphasis: they are the only nightclub, or establishment of any kind of nightlife whatsoever, to allow patrons under the age of 21.

Does this strike anyone else as more than a little strange? The only nightclub in the area to offer under-21 nights also caters to the Gothic and gay scenes to the point that it's got the reputation as "The Gay Club."

Most cafés I've visited seem to close at about the time the bars open – an hour at which restaurants that are otherwise quite comfortable serving young people during the day – suddenly decide that only those of legal drinking age may purchase chicken wings.

Why are more than 15,000 people completely denied access to legitimate, legal nightlife and socialization by what appears to be market forces rather than law?

All this exists despite the fact that the 18-21 demographic makes up roughly 75 percent of the student population of the Five College area. To phrase the question most insightfully: Why are more than 15,000 people completely denied access to legitimate, legal nightlife and socialization by what appears to be market forces rather than law?

After all, it's legal for a cafe to remain open late or a nightclub to welcome those under the drinking age. Both businesses could make a profit doing so and most of them would, right?

I've asked around for explanations of this phenomenon and others, at the very least, agree with me that our area doesn't actually have much of a nightlife beyond getting massively drunk. One guy got it a bit closer to the right answer when he said that the club scene around here consists of the basement at Zeta Beta Tau.

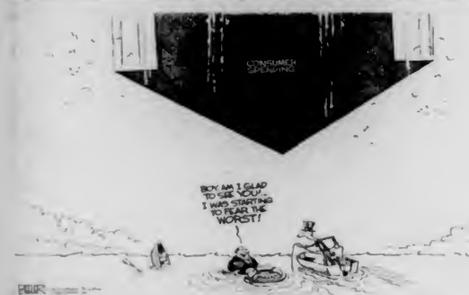
Now, I've actually patronized Zeta Beta Tau fraternity, and I would most certainly never refer to it as even resembling a nightclub. It's a den of iniquity and the brothers there are damn proud of that and make their best efforts to ensure that it's a fun den of iniquity.

But it's much too crowded and lacks the necessary selection of drinks – "one or the other" is not a selection – to qualify as a nightclub.

Does getting somewhat drunk (people who go drinking often soon develop enough of a tolerance to keep their judgment from becoming properly impaired, ironically) and pretending that the mostly mild (if often unwarranted) things people actually do at fraternity parties are somehow extreme acts of hedonism really completely replace the actual experience of clubbing for most people in this area?

Does it really replace having a comfortable setting for conversation about something other than beer pong, billiards tables, arcade machines, quality drinks and maybe even a dance floor on which a person can get and keep a square foot of space to themselves?

Actually, I've heard that one of the bars/clubs in the area will occasionally let in one or two underage costumers late at night if they particularly value letting that kid see a special band that apparently just plays there.



Scanning the archives of The Daily Collegian will also reveal that police busted a fake-identification ring in this area back in the early 2000s, but nowadays I really doubt enough people have fake IDs for over-21 bars to make up the entirety of the nightlife.

I only theorize because I feel that market forces would have corrected such an obvious gap if it actually exists – and nothing interferes with the market.

It seems to me like even before members of Congress finally get off their asses, listen to young people, listen to the college presidents and finally lower the drinking age, someone ought to get into a business to sell me a place to have genuine fun without alcohol.

After all, this is UMass-Amherst. If I want alcohol I can obtain it all on my own.

Keeping Guantanamo Bay and ideals of morality open

Greg Collins

No single human being has a monopoly on morality.

Why? Because your conception of morality may be vastly different than someone else's who may be faced with completely different constraints and dangers than you.

Barack Obama's campaign call to reclaim moral leadership in the world by closing Guantanamo Bay assumes, of course, that closing the detainment facility is the morally superior option as opposed to maintaining it.

The incentives for Obama on his campaign trail – and for professors, lawyers and human rights activists who criticize Guantanamo – are to convince other people of their point of view in order to get more votes, be recognized by their fellow academics as experts on a particular subject, or to win media coverage for their protests. If they fail to do this, the worst that will happen is that they lose an election or public approval.

America already has been taking the moral high ground because our government does in fact hold itself to a higher standard than both terrorist regimes and European governments.

The incentives for U.S. Defense Department officials, who oversee Guantanamo Bay, are completely different. Their job description is aptly revealed in the name of the department for which they work: defense. Unlike politicians on the campaign trail or academics, they make decisions daily which could lead directly to the deaths of thousands of innocents.

Because the U.S. military's primary purpose is to protect Americans from enemies who are intent on blowing up and killing as many Americans as possible – both those in and out of military uniform – their goal is not to win the public approval of voters during a particular election. Nor is it to win approval from professors or human rights activists.

The incentives to defend Americans are bolstered by the repercussions for failing to defend Americans from terrorists, which tragically manifested themselves after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, the U.S. embassy bombings in 1998, the USS Cole explosion in 2000, the Khobar Tower bombings in Saudi Arabia in 1996, the Daniel Pearl beheading in 2002 and the first World Trade Center bombing in 1993, among other countless examples.

The point is not to fear-monger. Rather, it is to look at facts and confront the consequences of what may happen if people prioritize winning the backing of politically connected individuals through moral pleas before striving to do what is necessary to defend Americans.

This leads us to the assumption that America must reclaim the moral high ground by closing Guantanamo Bay, which presupposes that America has already lost the moral high ground regarding the treatment of Guantanamo detainees. A closer look at the facts shows that the United States has a far higher standard for treating enemies with dignity and respect than other countries.

Guantanamo detainees are allowed to pray five times a day. They are allowed to read the Quran. They are provided with prayer caps, prayer beads and prayer oil. Military regulations explicitly prohibit guards from handling the Quran unless absolutely necessary. If they do need to touch it, they should as if it were "a fragile piece of delicate art."

I would challenge anyone to uncover similarly rigid instructions from countries who have taken Americans captive in the war on terror.

The fact that there have been documented instances in which detainees have expressed a desire to stay at Guantanamo rather than to return to their countries – whose leaders they fear may enact retribution on them – should plainly illustrate this.

Those who say that our moral standard should be higher than state sponsors of terror are overlooking what is right under their own noses.

America already has been taking the moral high ground because our government does in fact hold itself to a higher standard than both terrorist regimes and European governments. And make no mistake: the nationwide outrage over isolated examples of prisoner abuse and Quran desecration further underscore these high expectations.

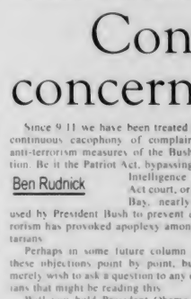
This leads us to ask whether closing Guantanamo Bay would be taking the moral high ground.

Once again, Obama is faced with the moral question of whether winning public approval from European and terrorist-sponsoring countries takes precedent over providing military officials with all the tools necessary to protect Americans from terrorists.

Guantanamo detainees are placed at the facility not by whimsical and arbitrary decision-makers, but from military personnel who need to establish enough evidence to justify detainment for people who are assumed to be the worst-of-the-worst among Defense Department officials.

To be sure, determining the extent to which these detainees have connections to terrorism is no exact science, as evidenced by the fact that the United States has released some inmates who have already resumed killing Americans on the battlefield.

But if Obama wants to use moral reasoning to spread his foreign policy message, he should do two things:



First, he should say that America already has, and continues to, display the moral high ground during the war on terror.

Second, he should do what any person whose exclusive responsibility is to protect 300 million Americans would do – and that is to keep Guantanamo open.

Because no single human being has a monopoly on morality.

Constitutional concerns for America

Ben Rudnick

Since 9/11 we have been treated to an almost continuous cacophony of complaint about the anti-terrorism measures of the Bush administration. Be it the Patriot Act, bypassing the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act court, or Guantanamo Bay, nearly every tool used by President Bush to prevent domestic terrorism has provoked apoplexy among civil libertarians.

Perhaps in some future column I'll examine these objections point by point, but for now I merely wish to ask a question to any civil libertarians that might be reading this:

Will you hold President Obama to the same standards you held President Bush to?

I ask because Barack Obama has given indications of hostility toward the Constitution in general – and to specific precepts of the Bill of Rights. His attitudes have been widely reported, but there has been an amazing lack of editorial response on the part of many who have yelled the loudest any time they perceived Constitutional transgressions by the Bush administration.

Where was the outcry when the Obama campaign summoned supporters in Chicago to silence critics Stanley Kurtz and David Freddoso?

This in itself is not enough to cause great concern, but anyone who thinks that any similar action by McCain would not garner immediate uproar from The New York Times is simply delusional.

Unfortunately, Obama's language doesn't suggest the nuanced approach he has expressed on other matters, but rather that he plans to go after lobbyists with a sledgehammer.

Obama's supporters in Chicago were clearly within their rights to flood the radio station with calls to protest Kurtz and Freddoso, but this was no spontaneous action by concerned citizens. This was an organized effort to silence Obama's critics.

Rather than engage with Kurtz or Freddoso, or even put out a statement decrying their information, the Obama campaign called out its troops to shut them up. This action suggests a willingness to oppose free speech on the part of Obama.

How about the efforts of the Obama campaign in Missouri to use legal threats to stifle free speech in St. Louis?

Perhaps the actions of officials there, in concert with the head of the Obama campaign, do not rise to the level of a prosecutable conspiracy. But again, they reveal a lack of belief in free speech. As an isolated incident, it is surely not unprecedented, but combined with the Obama campaign's actions in Chicago a pattern of contempt for the First Amendment begins to emerge.

What about Barack Obama's repeated commitment to deny the rights of many Americans "to petition the Government for a redress of grievances" – a right guaranteed by under the First Amendment – after he becomes president?

I am sure that many people reading this agreed with Obama when he said that our government is "dominated by lobbyists and special interests," and that "Washington has become a place where good ideas go to die because lobbyists crush them with their money and their influence."

"Lobbyists are evil," you say.

But are they?

What about the ones who work on behalf of seniors through the American Association of Retired Persons (AARP), or for the environment through the Natural Resources Defense Council (NRDC), or teachers via the National Education Association (NEA)? Just because you agree with them does not mean they are not lobbyists.

If you believe that only businesses are "special interests," or that only business lobbyists "crush" good ideas "with their money," you are ignoring the role of AARP in preventing Social Security reform, and the NRDC in preventing the United States from achieving energy security.

The First Amendment protects five specific rights – the freedoms of religion, speech, the press, to peacefully assemble and to petition the government. Just as great care must be taken to prevent popular opinion from overwhelming the free speech rights of minority voices, so too must great care be taken to protect the rights of unpopular segments of our society to petition their government.

Unfortunately, Obama's language doesn't suggest the nuanced approach he has expressed on other matters, but rather that he plans to go after lobbyists with a sledgehammer.

I would argue that he does not include the NEA, the NRDC or the AARP, and others, in his definition of "lobbyists." So, he will clearly run afoul of the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment if he treats some lobbying groups differently than others.

Finally, there is Obama's 2001 radio interview in which he condemned the Constitution for failing to "say what the federal government ... must do on your behalf."

From a man who is a Constitutional scholar, it seems worrisome that he would decry the intent of the Founding Fathers, particularly considering he had already recognized "the essential constraints that were placed by the Founding Fathers in the Constitution" to limit the powers of the government.

Individually, perhaps, each of these issues raise only slight concern about how Obama views the constraints the Constitution puts on his powers. It is only when you put them all together that a picture of a man with grave doubts about the continued efficacy of the Constitution emerges.

Considering the oath that our presidents take before they take office, I do not understand why there have not been more questions posed to Barack Obama in light of the anti-Constitutional rhetoric he has repeatedly used. When President Obama swears to "preserve, protect, and defend" the Constitution will he really mean it?

'X' marks the spot

Pirates hold more violence than Never Land fantasies

By Kate Olesin
Collegian Staff

Blackbeard and other swashbucklers, the "yo-ho-ho and a bottle of rum" ditty, and the infamous, X-marks-the-spot map are all concepts of piracy that minds have romanticized over the centuries.

But did pirates of the 17th and 18th centuries really keep parrots on their shoulders and say "Aye-aye captain?"

Readers emerge from David Cordingly's "Under the Black Flag: The Romance and the Reality of Life Among the Pirates" (Random House, 2006) with sword brandished in one hand, rum bottle in the other and, yes, a parrot perched on the shoulder, as Cordingly brings piracy to life.

Cordingly, a former staff member of the National Maritime Museum in Greenwich, England, chose to write the book after popularity surfaced for his exhibit "Pirates, Fact and Fiction," which opened in 1992. "Under the Black Flag" is an enjoyable test for academics and readers looking for a treasure trove of information on the realities of their swashbuckling heroes of their childhood.

As an authoritative expert on the subject, Cordingly takes the reader through a 244-page history of piracy by describing case studies of certain seafarers like Captain Kidd, Bartholomew Roberts, Sam Bellamy – among 10 or so others, both well-known and relatively unknown.

In addition, instead of focusing on the popular image of a pirate today, Cordingly mostly addresses the origins of that image.

"Treasure Island," "Pirates of Penzance" and the original play and Disney version of "Peter Pan" are the three key works he asserts formed society's view of piracy.

Many of the seafarers Cordingly focuses on have a great deal of history and even a heroic tinge to their tales – the romance of piracy. Although he mostly concentrates on Western pirates based in Europe and the Americas, he touches on some formidable Chinese pirates, like the powerful Mrs. Cheng, which gives the reader a good mix of types of piracy from all over the world.

His method of sailing through the history – a case study and subsequently an explanation of general, historical trends – is generally an effective way of combining the scholarship that has already been done on the subject combined with a mix of primary source documents.

Although he relies heavily on Captain Johnson (author of "A General History of Pyrates," the actual author is speculated to be Daniel Defoe) and Marcus Rediker, Cordingly peppers the book with court testimonials and other primary sources (especially helpful are his appendices with dates of pirate attacks and pirate trials) to bring pirates to the real world and out of Never-Never Land.

Cordingly writes "Under the Black Flag" almost as if it were a tale of fiction.

The first chapter, "Wooden Legs and Parrots," tells the vivid story of how Robert Louis Stevenson created "Treasure Island," where his inspiration came from and how that book was the origin for the popular image of the pirate. In fact, Cordingly attests that Stevenson had never encountered a pirate but because of his familiarity with maritime terminology he "was able to create a cast of vicious and murderous men and to conjure up an authentic atmosphere of double-dealing and casual violence."

But unlike a work of fiction, the chapter "Plundering the Treasure Ports" tells the tale of Sir Francis Drake, a violent and heroic narrative, who sailed around the world on The Golden Hind, terrorizing merchant ships and seaports.

Interwoven with historical descriptions of the types of coins, "pieces of eight" (or reales), "doubloons" and "ducats," and their worth, Cordingly puts the treasure into perspective – there was a great deal of gold and silver on the high seas for the taking. Drake's narrative is juxtaposed with the third chapter devoted to privateer and pirate Sir Henry Morgan, which makes a statement about those seafarers commissioned by heads of state and rogue pirates on the open seas – that there was little legal distinction between the two.

However, in the fifth chapter, the organization begins to seem rather formulaic. Instead of the interwoven historical analysis, the chapters become a biography of a certain pirate in the beginning and the bulk of the historical analysis coming at the end. However, Cordingly covers all the bases in these chapters, and through these mini-biographies, gives the reader insight into what life with the pirates was actually like.

Chapters 5-12 also delve into one particular aspect of pirate life, the most fascinating of which is Chapter 7: torture, violence and marooning – the stuff which made pirates feared throughout the world.

Cordingly begins the chapter with the brutal mutiny on the George Galley and the bloodbath that ensued on board. Once the crew was disposed of, a man named John Gow was made captain, the ship was renamed "Revenge," and indeed, true to its name, Gow attempted to take revenge upon a number of people who had made him miserable. But once he was caught, the methods used for his execution were particularly startling.

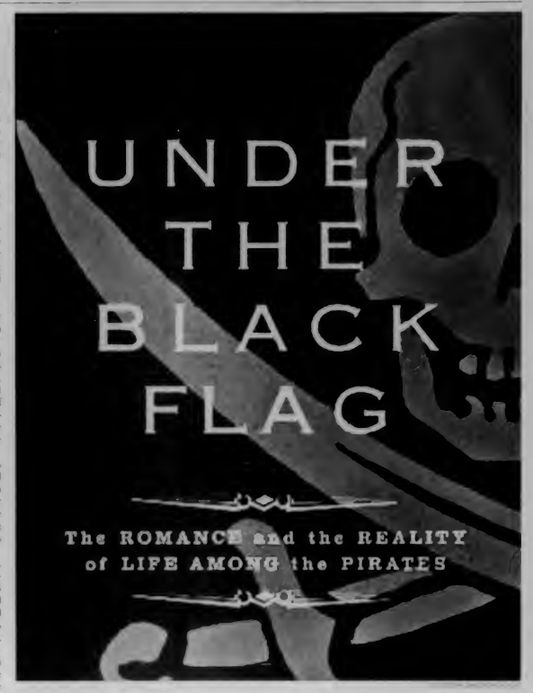
Until he pleaded, Gow's thumbs were bound with a whipcord and pulled tight and then he was taken to Newgate Prison to await further torture. The most common torture for pirates in Newgate was being pressed to death until the victims plead either guilty or not guilty.

Beatings with sticks, whippings, stretching limbs with ropes, burning matches placed between victim's fingers, and cords tightened around their heads until their eyes popped out were all brutal tortures pirates used on their victims. Some tortures, like limb stretching, have been humorized in children's movies – like in Brian Henson's "Muppet Treasure Island" (1996) – but in reality were real horrors for a captain who wished to turn his ship sailing through the sunset into a torture chamber.

Blackbeard is one pirate throughout this book whose history is well delved into by Cordingly. His cruelty, like the way he prostituted his 16-year-old wife to his crew members, was known far and wide – but his demise that Cordingly brilliantly narrates, was even more famous.

Chapters 11 and 12 are devoted to hunting down pirates and their trials and executions, aspects of pirate life that were relatively well documented. It is in court testimonials and trials where most historical knowledge about pirates is gleaned from, especially the shaky ground in which legal proceedings stood on. Trials of piracy could become complicated, especially since it was no civil matter, but had to be held before the admiral and common law judges.

Laws against pirates changed some with offered pardons by the court in an attempt to curb piracy, but many were hanged and then put on display in the harbor as a warning to other pirates.



Although an interesting text that is a bit too lofty for those with a general interest, the book was missing a key element that would tie the image of pirates of the past to modern-day readers conception of the pirate.

Cordingly goes into "Pirates of Penzance," "Peter Pan" and "Treasure Island" in the beginning of the text, but fails to bring the reader around full circle to mention other modern-day conceptions of piracy and write about how they differ with the real thing.

For instance, if Cordingly brought the reader back to instances in film where torture took place and how that scene differed from the historical trends, it might complete the book's message of comparing pirates facts and fictions.

Despite this, Cordingly has created a text that will prove interesting to young readers and adults fascinated by the world of piracy who desire to know what life on deck was really like.

David Cordingly illustrates violence and adventure in his publication, "Under The Black Flag," which follows the lives of pirates through history.

Artist William Elliot Whitmore performed at the Pearl Street Night Club last Thursday, along with Murder by Death. Whitmore's set brought insight and emotion, along with tunes that proved easy on the ears.

Murder by Death, Whitmore show brings variety to club

By Brian Wick

NORTHAMPTON – Ambience and Americana took center stage at the Pearl Street Night Club.

A dusty wool packer hat, some scraggly beard, warm bourbon in a crinkled Poland Spring bottle: a snapshot of the evening.

Thursday's performers, Murder by Death and William Elliott Whitmore, both reside in the thick of America's heartland carrying with them the engrained spirit of traditional folk lore. At the night unfolded, Whitmore built homes, dug ditches and confessed his sins while the headliners were busy shooting the devil in the back while raising pint glasses with ex-cons.

Not quite typical Pioneer Valley fair.

Whitmore used his set to effectively explore a variety of timeless themes ranging from regret to redemption.

On set opener "Buildin' Me a Home," a deep vocal hymn greeted listeners over rhythmic stomps before delicate banjo picks and strums joined the accompaniment. For those familiar with the songwriter, this served as a perfect introduction for things to follow. For those not acclimated with him, however, it was a jaw dropping initiation.

With "Digging My Grave," Whitmore set a scene of a broken man weighed down by past regrets, digging into cold Iowan dirt while accepting his fate following a loveless life. With sweat on his brow and his veins pulsing, Whitmore struggled to keep his vocals on key; each chorus growing with intensity. Losing all restraint, he belted out the song's conclusion in a quivering honest tone.

"Take it on the Chin" served as an ode to fatherly bonds and overcoming the harsh inconsistencies of life. "He said stand your ground and don't back down, that's the only way to win. When life throws a punch son, you've got to take it on the chin," sang Whitmore during the song's chorus.

Concluding his set was the rollicking "Johnny Law," an upbeat anti-establishment tune in the Cash tradition. The song was a refreshing end to a profound and low key set.

O.A.R. to headline at Mullins Center

By Brittany Bell Dalphond
Collegian Correspondent

It has been almost a year and a half since O.A.R. graced the floor of the Mullins Center and tonight they return in conjunction with the environmental group Reverb for the third annual Campus Consciousness Tour with opener Virginia Coalition.

Reverb is a non-profit organization founded by environmentalist Lauren Sullivan and her musician husband, Guster guitarist/vocalist Adam Gardner.

Reverb educates and engages musicians and their fans to promote environmental sustainability. Over 80 percent of a concert's carbon footprint is from fans' commute, and Reverb works with the fans to reverse that in Fan Offset Carbon Programs. They have "greened" many tours including "Bare Naked Ladies," Kelly Clarkson, John Mayer, "Ben Folds," "Maroon 5," "Dave Matthews Band," Jason Mraz and many more.

O.A.R., also known as Of A Revolution, formed in 1996 around lead singer and rhythm guitarist Marc Roberge, lead guitarist Richard On, saxophonist Jerry DePizzo, bassist Benj Gershman, and drummer Chris Culos. Roberge had known Culos since childhood in Rockville, Md., where the two became friends and played in local bands with On and Gershman. DePizzo, who hails from Youngstown, Ohio, met the others at Ohio State University.

O.A.R. first recorded their first album "The Wanderer" independently as a demo in 1997.

Two years later, their popular song "That Was a Crazy Game of Poker," catapulted the group from student band to headliner. Their second demo, "Souls Aflame," was also released independently in 1999, and a third, "Risen," in 2001.

After success with Risen, Roberge began writing songs for a new CD and to appease their fans released the live album "Any Time Now" in spring 2002.

O.A.R. signed with Lava/Atlantic for the release of "In Between Now and Then" in 2003. This led to the release of their second live album, "34th & 8th."

2005 saw the release of its fourth album, "Stories of a Stranger," which contained a pair of hits "Love and Memories" and "Heard the World," followed by another live album, "Live from Madison Square Garden."

O.A.R. released their sixth studio album, "All Sides" in July.

Opening tonight's show is Virginia Coalition, made up of a group of friends who have known each other since high school: Andy Poliakoff, lead vocals and guitar; Paul Ottinger, keyboards, percussion, guitar, and vocals; and Jarrett Nicolay, bass, guitar, banjo, and vocals.

On previous albums, their songs often featured arrangements that veered off in unanticipated directions.

"It's good being eclectic," said Poliakoff, the band's main lyricist and frequent spokesman. "It keeps you on your toes musically, and it's fun, but we wanted to get back to some serious songwriting. In the past few years, we were writing for the live shows: endless groove things that are far from what we wrote when we were starting out. We wanted to get back to that original creative impulse and focus on our songwriting."

Virginia Coalition had released three independent albums by 2003, while maintaining a heavy tour schedule. They were signed by Bluhammock Music in 2004 and released "Ok to Go," as they moved from regional to national tours.

Last year's live release, "Live at The 9:30 Club," is credited with leading to the "soul-searching" that led to their latest album, "Home This Year."

The performance with O.A.R. and Virginia Coalition starts at 7:30 p.m. at the Mullins Center and tickets are $35 at the door.

M83 does justice to music, opening act less impressive

BY IAN NELSON
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Few live bands pull off the difficult task of sounding like a mirror image of its recordings. Add M83 to the list.

Anthony Gonzalez and his M83 bandmates, along with "School of Seven Bells," played Pearl Street's clubroom Sunday night, pumping out electronic grooves, operatic post-rock crashes, and colossal shredding which very nearly put its studio work to shame.

Beginning with a churning, sweeping version of "Run Into Flowers" from its first record "Dead Cities, Red Seas, and Lost Ghosts" (2003), M83 kicked right into top form with "Moonchild" from its sophomore record "Before the Dawn Heals Us" (2005), wowing instrumentally as the drummer captivated the audience.

The percussion master must have been a highly talented, exquisitely trained session drummer, situated behind a sort of sound-absorbing Plexi-glas wall, hitting every note on point. He turned the electronic percussion found on M83's albums into electric rhythms that a drum machine would love to be able to produce. He was found manning a drum set as well as an electronic drum pad, recreating the 80s-leaning percussive elements found on many newer M83 songs.

"Your drummer's awesome," an audience member offered.

"We know. We love him," Gonzalez responded.

After the first two numbers featuring dreamy, sampled vocals, M83 began material from this year's album, "Saturdays = Youth," with its third single, "Kim & Jessie." The song's steady pop gave way to textural forthcoming single "We Own the Sky," combining more gauzy vocals and atmospheric synthesizers with the drum sounds of Phil Collins to create a processed yet pleasing arrangement.

Synth-driven "Graveyard Girl" came next, its glimmering chorus and daybreak guitar sounds juxtaposed with its dark lyrical content, most notably the sampled female vocal monologue preceding the song's climax.

Gonzalez emotes little, a product of his futuristic vision of what music should be – synthetic, chromatic and dense. What's surprising is his use of live instrumentation – seemingly unnecessary and frivolous – yet it is what validates M83: computers don't make electronic music; humans make computers that make electronic music. Without the human element there is no basis for attachment, and Gonzalez makes use of this sentiment in his live shows.

M83 continued with fan favorites "Teen Angst" and "Don't Save Us From the Flames," both from the "Before the Dawn Heals Us" album, before the obligatory leaving of the stage before the expected and anticipated encore, which consisted of the epic club track "Couleurs," during which Gonzalez thanked the dancing crowd immensely for coming out.

Openers "School of Seven Bells" (SVIIB) essentially failed to impress once again, showing little to no improvement since their first Northampton appearance last fall opening for "Blonde Redhead."

The five show just isn't interesting, as sisters Alejandra and Claudia Deheza (formerly of "Un Air Library") match each other's vocals almost exactly, swapping any chance for daring harmony with long stretches of a seemingly single, double-tracked vocal. While sisters are sisters, perhaps switching up a melody wouldn't hurt once in a while.

While the duo sang in its stale manner, guitarist Benjamin Curtis (formerly of Secret Machines) shredded away, trying his best to one-up the guitar washes exquisitely crafted by My Bloody Valentine, whose album was on shuffle before SVIIB took the stage, to no avail. While these were the most interesting portions of their set, Curtis was not loud enough, losing some of his edge in the meaty mix of uninspired, programmed beats.

However, their new debut record "Alpinisms" (Ghostly International) has garnered praise (4.5 stars and an AMG Album Pick from allmusic.com), and for good reason: it's aesthetically pleasing.

The beats prove more original on the record than in person, the vocals don't sound half-bad, and the fuzzy guitars and other electronics thrown in make for eerily hazy, nighttime music, especially the opening track, "Iamundermydisguise."

In this album, the Deheza sisters collectively resemble Dolores O'Riordan of Cranberries fame – in a good way.

Anthony Gonzalez and bandmates of M83 played at Pearl Street's clubroom on Sunday night, along with sister duo, School of Seven Bells. M83's performance was lively and energetic, as its drummer impressed the crowd with a plethora of musical elements.

M83's showcase included many electronically-enhanced pieces, which were recieved well by the Pearl Street audience.

New releases, updated sounds

Recently released, and appearing nearby next week, is No Age's new "Teen Creeps" single available from Sub Pop Records. The Los Angeles-based duo will play at The Grind, Clark University's student center, Sunday, Nov. 23.

"Teen Creeps," a grinding jumble of dirty guitars, pounding drums, and that vastly memorable and high-pitched riff, could be No Age's tour de force.

Originally from "Nouns" (Sub Pop), released last May, "Teen Creeps" epitomizes their affection for quick punk songs as well as meandering ambience, the final half-minute of the track hovering and glistening into nothingness.

The B-side, "Intimate Descriptions," caters to their more spacey aspect, almost Middle Eastern in tone, percussion, and rhythm.

One more odd release, White Denim's "Explosion" (Transmission), a rehashing of their Europe-only "Workout Holiday" (Full Time Hobby), released last June. Altering track lists, dropping songs, and diddling with import/domestic releases is nothing new, but still uncommon.

The new release drops key tracks "Let's Talk About It," "Look That Way At It," and "I Can Tell You" in favor of back-country jams "All Truckers Roll" and "Migration Wind," the latter of which takes off and soars after initial chords' twang.

The rest are reworked for the most part, especially the ditty "Sitting," its climaxing chorus of "You sitting with you sitting with me," beefed up by some jazzy clarinet which did not appear on previous versions, as well as an extended outro, dragging the song on for three minutes longer than its initial length of just over two minutes.

AC/DC 'shakes all night long' at Garden

BY JUSTIN GAGNON
COLLEGIAN STAFF

NEW YORK — 1512: Michelangelo completes painting the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel.

1969: Man lands on the moon.

AC/DC, which hasn't toured in eight years, played two shows last week at Madison Square Garden in New York City.

The band still possesses all its members who are most known for being a part of AC/DC: lead singer Briah Johnson, 61, lead guitarist Angus Young, 53, backup guitarist Malcolm Young, 55, bassist Cliff Williams, 58, and drummer Phil Rudd, 54.

The Answer, an Irish band, started off the night, and was surprisingly enjoyable. The group didn't have a long set, and was playing to a less-than-half-filled MSG. It has a style very similar to AC/DC, and lead singer Cormac Neeson, who has a striking resemblance to Robert Plant, sounds remarkably like Brian Johnson.

As soon as the lights went off for the main act, a wave of electricity hit the crowd, inducing goose bumps and butterflies across the now-packed arena.

A cartoon was shown on the three big screens around the stage and featured Angus Young powering the engine of a locomotive that was speeding down the tracks, about to hit a blockade. As the train crashed on the screen, an actual train appeared on the stage with flames, sparks and smoke. Led by legendary guitarist Angus Young, the band came out on to the stage to the hit off the new "Black Ice" album, "Rock N' Roll Train."

After the extravagant entrance, the band immediately reminded the audience that it knew why they were there: not to hear clips from the new album, but because they wanted the classics. AC/DC played "Hell Ain't a Bad Place to Be," followed by an extended "Back in Black."

The first solo by Angus Young in "Back in Black" stated with authority that he may look old, but he still has the energy and the talent that he possessed in the 70s.

Brian Johnson, who looks like he is still in his 40s, started off "Dirty Deeds Done Dirt Cheap" by saying something along the lines of "This'll be a great song for this crowd."

He was presumably recognizing the effervescent smell of cannabis. The crowd, agreeing with Johnson, obliged by going crazy and singing along word for word.

Next came the fan-favorite "Thunderstruck," which the crowd genuinely responded to. The subsequent song was the title track off the new album, "Black Ice," which proved to be enjoyable, and included a catchy riff.

Out of the few songs from the new album that AC/DC played, this single was best received.

The band followed up the stretch of heavy songs by mellowing down with "The Jack," which is held close to the heart of the women who long for Angus Young. This is traditionally the point in the concert where the schoolboy outfit that Young is known for comes off.

As per usual, he didn't simply rip off the get-up and continue to play the guitar, but rather, he slowly stripped to the seductive beat of the song. As the sports coat, tie, and shirt were all gone, he was only left with shorts. With his back to the audience, he unbuttoned his shorts slowly, and then quickly pulled them to the ground, revealing black boxers with "AC/DC" printed on them. A sigh of relief from all the men who didn't want to see their hero's bare bottom resounded through the crowd.

After "The Jack," a massive bell descended from above the stage. Brian Johnson ran and jumped up onto the rope hanging from the middle, and swung back and forth ringing the bell. This sent the crowd wild, and set up the band to play "Hells Bells."

Next was a reloaded version of "Shoot to Thrill."

AC/DC then played a few more songs off the new album, followed by their most mainstream song, "You Shook Me All Night Long."

The most exciting song played throughout the night was "T.N.T." The crowd pounded their fists in the air in unison yelling "Oy! Oy! Oy!"

As it is known to do, the band had a guest appearance from rock 'n' roll's favorite voluptuous blowup doll, Rosie. While playing its hit, "Whole Lotta Rosie," the gargantuan inflatable woman actually played with herself to the sounds of Angus Young's guitar.

When he stopped playing, she did too.

AC/DC capped off the main set list with "Let There Be Rock," one of its greatest songs, and undoubtedly Young's best.

A few minutes into the song, Johnson and the rest of the band stepped back and allowed Angus Young to perform a solo for the crowd. Young held true to his fame, running all over the stage, sliding on the ground, and playing behind his head.

At one point, he even ran out onto a circularly-rotating platform in the middle of the crowd that raised him about 15 feet.

The encore may have marked the most special part of the night. With the lights off and the fans screaming for more, red smoke began to come out of the stage. Up rose Angus as he played the famous riff to "Highway to Hell." He donned devil horns on his head as flames exploded on the screen behind the red-lighted stage.

The group ended the night with "For Those About to Rock" fully equipped with functioning Civil War cannons, which fired multiple times during the song.

An ordinary concert is just a band playing music for an audience, and this night was far more than a concert – AC/DC put on a show, the Cirque du Soleil of rock.

Angus Young is undeniably one of the greatest guitarists that has ever lived, and also one of the best live performers. Collectively, however, AC/DC is indisputably one of the greatest rock bands of all time, and is already a member of the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in downtown Cleveland, Ohio.

To see the band live is a dream come true, and it makes fans pray that it is not the gentlemen's final tour.

Justin Gagnon can be reached at jrgagnon@student.umass.edu

The world famous members of the 1970s group AC/DC rocked New York City's Madison Square Garden last week, proving that they still have what it takes to excite a crowd. During the group's first tour in eight years, legendary guitarist Angus Young stripped down to his boxers, revealing a black AC/DC logo in support of the tour's title, "Black Ice."

Taylor makes swift entrance into business

BY JON BREAM
STAFF TRIBUNE

MINNEAPOLIS — As instructed, I removed my shoes before entering the tour bus. As I was introduced to Taylor Swift, I extended my hand in formal greeting, but instead country's hottest young star pulled me into an enthusiastic embrace.

At 18, Swift plays by her own rules. After selling a remarkable 3 million copies of her self-titled debut, she has been setting up her sophomore album (in stores this week) the new-fashioned way, showcasing a new song at the Summer Olympics, another on "Grey's Anatomy," two singles on country radio and two others on iTunes.

She comes off as the girl next door – preoccupied with boys, beauty and her blog - but Swift is also one of the shrewdest operators and boldest talents in Nashville.

She writes or co-writes her own don't-mess-with-me love songs, which have attracted a new generation of teen girls to country music. She's poised, polished and popular enough to appear this fall on the World Series, the MTV Video Music Awards, "Good Morning America," David Letterman, Ellen DeGeneres, the American Music Awards and CMT's "Crossroads" (duetting with Def Leppard!) to trumpet her new CD, the aptly titled "Fearless," sure to be one of the best sellers of the year.

When we visited on her tour bus, Taylor covered a wide range of topics, including the economy's effect on country music; a video shoot that kept her up until 5:30 a.m., and how much politics she'd bring onstage in this election year. We promised to chat again before her album was released.

"Guess what I just did?" Swift exclaimed, dispensing with the pleasantries, when I picked up the phone the other day.

It was the morning after her Philadelphia Phillies won the World Series - she sang the National Anthem at the first game in Philly - so I expected some baseball talk.

"I voted!" she said instead. "I waited in line for two hours and then I voted. Everyone's early-voting in Tennessee, I guess. It was like the most amazing feeling when I got to push the red button that says 'cast your vote.' When I pushed that button, I felt so completely 18 and American."

She was genuinely excited and even recalled our previous conversation - how smart is that? – about the election.

Throw a question at Swift and she has a tendency to repeat it - like a student stating her opening thesis, or a beauty-pageant contestant buying time while she considers what to say. But Swift's answers are assured and well-spoken. Even on the fluff questions - like the Phillies winning the Series ("Ohmigod, I was crying") or about her boyfriends.

Since she says the songs on "Fearless" are mostly about boys, love and relationships, I had to ask how many dates has she been on in 2008 – and with how many guys?

Twenty dates with the same guy, she said without hesitation. But five or six questions later, she insisted on correcting herself. "It's bugging me that I told you 20 dates," she blurted. "I was on way more than 20 dates. And I dated two guys."

I didn't ask her to name names, but anyone who reads Perez Hilton - and that includes Swift, who said she also reads JustJared.com and People.com daily - knows that she has been linked to Joe Jonas of the Jonas Brothers.

One of the most striking songs on "Fearless" is "15," a look back at freshman year for her and her BFF, Abigail.

"It says, 'I should have known this, I didn't know that, here's what I learned, here's what I still don't know,'" she said. "It took me a really long time to figure out how I was going to tell all these different stories about meeting my best friend and watching her get her heart ripped out and me having to choose a career over a boy."

Swift wrote eight of the 13 songs on "Fearless" by herself. While the album tends to be teen-focused, there are more mature songs this time. A prime example is "The Way I Loved You," co-written with John Rich, the ubiquitous song doctor to the country stars. Her most emotional vocal, it's about a more complex relationship. "I miss screaming and fighting and kissing in the rain. It's 2 a.m. and I'm cursing your name. You're so in love that you act insane. And that's the way I loved you."

"It's about being in a relationship with a nice punctual, practical, logical guy and missing the crazy, complicated, frustrating guy," said Swift.

Swift grew up on a Christmas tree farm in Wyomissing, Pa. At 11, she started pitching her songs in Nashville, where her family relocated a couple years later. Her self-titled CD was released in late 2006 on the impetus of "Tim McGraw," a wistful remembrance about a courtship conducted against a backdrop of songs by country star McGraw. The disc also featured feisty hits - "Teardrops on My Guitar," "Picture to Burn" and "Should've Said No."

That disc won her country's rookie-of-the-year prize, the Country Music Association's Horizon Award. She was so hyped that night that she was "absolutely shaking the entire performance."

Since then, Swift has made the transition from giddy teen ("I'm obnoxiously excited," she gushed at the 2007 Minnesota State Fair about achieving a No. 1 album) to polished pro. Of course, she can slip into the total teen mode without provocation.

How much time does she spend blogging on her MySpace page?

"I post a blog every couple days and I post a video blog once every two weeks. I spend a lot of time (responding) to fan e-mails. It's really, really important to me, to make sure people know that I love them, I appreciate them and I'm nothing without them. I'll never forget about them. I'll always be on MySpace as much as I possibly can trying to get back to them. Sometimes I get so addicted to it that I can't stop commenting people back. There's always one more that's so sweet. I've stayed up all night doing it."

What makes her happy?

"Video editing. If I weren't in music, I'd be a music video director. I've been doing a lot of video blogs on MySpace."

What makes her sad?

"When someone calls you on the phone and breaks up with you," said Swift, whose current favorite sad songs are Beyonce's "If I Were a Boy," Sinead O'Connor's "Nothing Compares 2 U," Kelly Clarkson's "Low" and Jesse McCartney's "It's Over."

When I asked her to describe herself, she sketched a complex portrait in words: emotional, creative, quirky, competitive, vulnerable, independent, grateful and social as well as sarcastic and vengeful.

The daughter of a stockbroker and a saleswoman, Swift has natural business instincts. Her latest side project is the Taylor Swift dolls at Wal-Mart and Toys R Us.

"They have my video outfits on and they sing songs when you push the button on her stomach," said Swift, who used to play with dolls but was more interested in their houses, stables and RVs. "All the little girls are loving them; that's why we decided to put out a doll. Her hair isn't as curly as mine, but other than that, it's pretty accurate."

Her mother, Andrea, usually travels with her. She appreciates her mom for looking out for her best interests and not being "afraid of hurting your feelings. It's so important for me that my career goes in the right direction. If that means someone says to me 'That dress looks bad,' if it's the truth, I can take it."

In the spring, Swift plans to launch a line of sundresses at Wal-Mart.

"I was raised by a stockbroker so I've always been conscious of what the market is doing and where the economy is. I never want to put my name on something that an 18-year-old girl struggling through her freshman year of college can't afford or a family of four who won't spend $150 for a dress."

Turla, Whitmore battle for spotlight

Whitmore is an artist who wears his heart on his sleeve literally. The heavily tattooed part-time farmer utilized the humble paring of banjo and boot stomps to compliment his deep blues-inspired melodies. Additionally, the songster interjected personal narratives between tunes, further drawing listeners to the muddy banks of the Mississippi.

During one such lull he told a tale of his adopted Rhode Island Reds fighting off a swooping chickenhawk in spite of their clipped beaks. Following a spirited performance of "Lee County Flood," he narrated the tale of the Lee County community banding together to combat the rising river to save the most irreplaceable of locations: the local watering hole.

"I love natural disasters," Whitmore proclaimed. "They really, truly, bring people together."

While much of the audience responded to his banter with laughter, they failed to grasp the depth of his rural musings. The stories, much like his music, embodied the resiliency that is ever-present in nature.

Murder by Death quickly took the stage following Whitmore's departure, with the unassuming figure of vocalist Adam Turla standing front and center.

At first glance, Turla hardly looks the part of frontman for a band with such an intimidating name and unruly lyrical content. He's miniscule in stature, but with a simple "Hi we're Murder by Death," his larger-than-life presence was quickly established. Saturated in whiskey, cigarettes, and images of bank robberies, Turla's voice is as deep as it is weathered.

The bass rattling baritone is a relatively new vocal approach for Turla. In past releases, he used a far less dramatic tone when performing live. With the transition came mixed results.

The band sounded their best when hiring through newer material at a furious pace. "I'm Coming Home," "Ball and Chain" and "Brother" all possessed the audacious amounts of piss, vinegar and moonshine to accentuate Turla's bravado.

Unfortunately, when performing selections from the band's back catalog, such as "Devil in Mexico" and "Three Men Hanging," Turla's newly adopted vocal stylings weighed the tracks down heavily.

On the band's earlier recordings, Turla often extended his range to vulnerable, unpolished levels, yelling and cracking in the process. His excessive baritone may add a decidedly tougher motif to the band's sound, but it is no replacement for genuine emotion.

Ultimately, however, what muddled Murder by Death's performance was that they constantly treaded on the same territory. Whitmore covered, only without his authenticity.

On the encore selection "Shiela" Turla echoed Whitmore's prior paternal advice. "I tell him son, never throw the first punch and if you must fight, make it clean.'" he sang.

Within "Brother" he makes mention of the dreaded Johnny Law pounding on his door. During their sets, Whitmore was "building a home" through "hell and high-water," while Turla was "coming home" in the exact same manner.

"Murder by Death" delivered an enjoyable romp of a set. Fast tracks about drinking, the devil and death were undeniably entertaining, but their delivery, when compared to Whitmore's, came up short.

"It's always hard to cover a song by someone who's such a bad ass, it makes you feel like less of a songwriter" claimed Turla after playing a rendition of Whitmore's "One Man's Shame" and a swig of bourbon.

Amen Adam, amen.

Sophomore midfielder Stuart Amick plays an integral part in creating offense for the Minutemen. UMass earned an at-large bid to the NCAA tournament last night.

UM hosts Harvard

Minutemen scored, as long as they could shut down their opponents.

The Minutemen have allowed 17 goals this season, the second-lowest amount in the A-10 behind Saint Louis (16 goals against). Simmons, who has played every second of the season in goal, earned seven shutouts this season – tying him for fourth with Dayton for the most team shutouts, but he came in third for the most individual shutouts. Simmons led the A-10 with the best save percentage (.827).

Teams have struggled to score against Simmons and the Minutemen when they play defense as a whole.

"We denied Dayton from scoring against us, but we couldn't shut ourselves out," Koch said after Sunday's game. "The only way to beat [Simmons] was for us to score on him."

OFFENSIVE IMPROVEMENTS

At the start of the season, the Minutemen were defending well, but couldn't seem to score goals. The two leading scorers from 2007 – juniors Mark DeSantis and Bryan Hogan – didn't earn a point until halfway through the season. Hogan has yet to tally a goal but earned an assist on Oct. 26 in UMass' 2-0 win over George Washington.

DeSantis scored his first and second goals of the season on Oct. 17 in UMass' 4-1 win at St. Bonaventure. He has four goals and two assists this season, for the third most points on the team, tied for second in most goals.

But, with the lack of production from the two expected leaders, other players stepped up offensively. Sophomore midfielder Ben Arikian leads the team in points (15) and assists (seven), while scoring four goals for the Minutemen, including three game-winners.

Senior Prince Ofosu, known for his speed, leads the team in goals (five). Freshman Chris Roswess has tallied two goals this season, and eight other players for the Minutemen have knocked in a goal.

UMass is not known for its aggressive offense, but as the season has progressed it became more of an offensive threat. Since the win at St. Bonaventure, UMass went on an eight-game unbeaten streak until the A-10 championship game – in six of the eight games since taking on the Bonnies UMass scored two goals.

With important playmakers – Arikian, senior Mike DeSantis and sophomore Stuart Amick – the Minutemen have been more successful at bringing the ball up the sides of the field and putting pressure on the opponent's goalkeeper. Their ability to move the ball around with quick, precise passes and playing a simple game will benefit them throughout the NCAA tournament.

MET THEIR GOALS

Koch wanted his team to improve every game, advance to the postseason and win at least six conference games, and they did all three. The strength of UMass during Atlantic 10 play earned them the at-large bid.

Since the first day of the season, Koch has said that he wanted his team to make it to the A-10 tournament. After a 2-1 double overtime win against then-No. 10 Saint Louis on Nov. 7, UMass was guaranteed to advance to the postseason tournament. At that point, the team's goals shifted to being regular-season champions.

Two days later, the Minutemen beat Charlotte, 1-0, to clinch the regular-season A-10 title and earn the first seed in the Atlantic 10 tournament, only to face the then-No. 17 Billikens again, seven days after their first encounter.

The Minutemen won, 2-0, to advance to the championship game, but failed to beat Dayton, who led the A-10 in standings for nearly the entire season.

piled up 154 rushing yards and a touchdown. But on many occasions after driving the ball, the Minutemen would have one bad play, one mistake in execution, and turn the ball over.

Even on defense the, effort was there but a lot of the woes can be traced back to injuries, but Brown said he would not use that as an excuse for their effort.

"I don't think our guys stopped competing by any stretch of the imagination," Brown said. "Obviously we were depleted in some areas, from the injury bug, but that is not making any excuses. [UNH was] able to take it to us."

One injury that was exposed for the first time was the loss of cornerback Sean Smalls. The All-American was lost three weeks ago when he cracked his hip against Bryant and the void was exposed by Toman.

While most teams have shied away from throwing on UMass all year, Toman and the Wildcats did not. Toman exposed the secondary by throwing for an average of 29.5 yards per completion. The secondary was also weakened by Jeromy Miles' being spread too thin. The safety was up playing the run for much of the day, as seen by his 18 tackles, which gave more work to the rest of the secondary.

"When you get into this profession, those are the kinds of scenarios that you watch on TV and you hope they never happen to you and it just seemed things didn't go our way today," Brown said after the game.

With one game remaining for UMass and no shot at the playoffs, there is still plenty on the line for these Minutemen. Last week after the loss to Maine last week, Miles mentioned how much this team needed to go out with two wins, regardless of whether they made the playoffs, because of its pride.

Well, winning this weekend's game against Hofstra means even more for its pride. This team does not want to end the year losing three straight games.

When Hofstra comes to Amherst, it will also be Senior Night. It will also be a chance for the senior class to win the most games in UMass history over a four-year span. Over the past four years, Coen, Smalls and the rest of the seniors have won 36 games, the same amount as the four-year classes from both 2006 and 2007.

Even though this will be the final game for those Minutemen, it is important that they put Saturday's game behind them and become the championship-caliber team people know them to be.

"It's huge [to get a win this weekend]. We're disappointed where we are at, but we got a lot of things to fight for this week coming up and a lot of things going on for the seniors and for the team," Coen said. "On Senior Day guys are going to want to finish the thing off right."

Freshmen key in Hockey East

first and only game as the No. 1 team in the nation, BU lost to a more determined UMass team.

Rollheiser struggled and made a few questionable decisions but overall, his defense didn't give him much support. However, it's not all that difficult to notice the statistical divide between Rollheiser and fellow freshman Kieran Millan.

Through five starts, Millan is 5-0 with a nifty 1.80 goals-against average and .918 save percentage. Rollheiser started BU's only two losses to this point. His goals-against average isn't exactly high, but his .895 save percentage says volumes about his struggles. In one less start than Millan, he's seen 24 fewer shots and allowed the same amount of goals.

Millan demonstrated a trait particularly important in earning him his first career shutout Sunday night against Northeastern. The loss to UMass could have sent the Terriers into a tailspin, but Millan stepped in and shut the Huskies offense down. After tough losses, goaltenders play a crucial role in a team regaining confidence; allow a cheap goal or two and suddenly the game is out of reach.

That's where losing streaks come from. With the way the league is shaping up, a two- or three-game skid at the wrong time could cost a team home-ice advantage in the Hockey East tournament. And it's not too early to think about that with Maine and UMass-Lowell looking increasingly tough to beat.

FRESHMEN HAVING IMPACT

A month into the season, freshmen all around the league are impacting the success, or lack thereof, of nearly every team in conference.

DiGirolamo started both games for UNH this weekend and allowed eight goals in each matchup. With Foster out indefinitely, according to several reports, the freshman DiGirolamo must put his struggles this weekend behind him. The Wildcats have a pair of conference games next weekend, including a road game with Northeastern.

Another freshman took advantage of DiGirolamo's struggles Saturday night. Boston College freshman winger Jimmy Hayes scored his first career hat trick in the 8-6 win. Hayes stands at 6-foot, 5-inches, providing another dimension to the dynamic BC offense.

UMass-Lowell's David Vallorani assisted on both goals in its win at UMass. Vallorani earned the Hockey East rookie of the month award earlier in the season. His seven assists rank him second among Hockey East freshman and tied for ninth overall.

His first assist against the Minutemen displayed great vision and ice presence. Battling in the corner with a UMass defenseman, he won the puck and fired a perfect pass to another freshman, Michael Budd, who quickly shot and scored.

ICE SHAVINGS

An eight-point weekend, five goals and three assists put BC senior Brock Bradford atop the Hockey Easy scoring chart, with 19 points. He's scored 12 goals, six more than anyone else in Hockey East ... Minnesota took over the No. 1 spot in the poll after a 1-0-1 weekend with Michigan Tech, BU's loss to UMass dropped them to No. 2 despite its win over Northeastern on Sunday ... BC moved up one spot to No. 4; Northeastern to No. 6; New Hampshire fell seven spots to No. 13; Vermont remained at No. 15; UMass moved up four spots to No. 16.

UM earns at-large bid

By Melissa Turtinen
Collegian Staff

Mistakes happen.

But in soccer one misplayed ball can be disastrous, and for the Massachusetts men's soccer team it was nearly season ending.

But, last night the Minutemen received an at-large bid to the NCAA tournament for the first time in program history, making the misplayed ball by a UMass defender in Sunday's 1-0 loss to Dayton in the Atlantic 10 Championship game less relevant.

"We were very disappointed," UMass coach Sam Koch said about earning an at-large bid. "Everybody was hoping to get started on their Christmas shopping, but I guess we're going to have to postpone that. Seriously though, we were very excited."

UMass Soccer

Beating Dayton would have guaranteed the Minutemen a place in the 48-team field for the NCAA tournament; instead UMass earned an at-large bid. The Minutemen were the highest ranked A-10 team in the RPI index (34), one spot above Saint Louis.

"When you rely on a committee to make a decision you're always nervous because you don't have control over it," Koch said. "I felt confident that we had a good shot, but I also know that anything can happen."

The Minutemen (10-7-3, 7-1-1 A-10) were the only team from the 2007 NCAA College Cup that made it to their conference's championship game. But the loss to Dayton took away their opportunity to win a second consecutive conference title, and almost their chance to advance to the NCAA tournament.

The Minutemen will host No. 26 Harvard in the first round of the tournament on Saturday at noon at Rudd Field.

"Everybody was elated to the point that we couldn't hear if we were home or away, when we found out we were home we were even more excited," Koch said.

Home field advantage, again

In 2007, UMass hosted the first round of the NCAA tournament when it beat Boston University, 2-1, to advance to the next round. This year, after being on the road for most of the season, UMass will host the first round once again.

"We don't have to travel, we've been on the road so many times it's hard," Koch said. "Going on the road, especially when you're a student ... the missed class time, it just wears you down. So I think the fact that we don't have to travel is a bonus."

This season, the Minutemen are 5-1-1 at home.

"To be able to play at home, where we feel comfortable on our home field is great," Koch said. "We have such a good group of fans that support us and we are excited to play in front of them."

Koch has seen Harvard play this season and UMass played the Crimson last year. Harvard's coach, Jamie Clark, is new to the Crimson program and Koch expects there to be differences in the team. He is making phone calls to find out more about the Minutemen's upcoming opponent to prepare for Saturday's game.

If the Minutemen win on Saturday, they will play South Florida on Tuesday evening in Florida.

Defensive strength

UMass' defense has been the constant throughout the season. With senior goalkeeper Zach Simmons as the voice on the field and the experience from senior Chris Brown and junior Stuart Thomson, the Minutemen will continue to benefit throughout their postseason run.

At the start of the season, when UMass struggled to score goals, Koch explained that as long as his team had a strong defensive unit it didn't matter how many goals the Sophomore midfielder Ben Arikian plays a critical role for the Minutemen on offense and defense. UMass will host Harvard in the first round of the NCAA tournament this Saturday.

Not living up to its name

All season long, one thing could always be heard coming out of opposing coaches mouths: the Massachusetts football team is a championship-caliber team.

But their performance on Saturday, particularly in the first quarter, was not a championship-caliber performance – not even close.

Jeffrey R. Larnard

The UMass defense let No. 13 New Hampshire do as it pleased against it in the 52-21 blowout. If the Wildcats wanted to score on one-play drives, they did. If they wanted to eat some time, they did.

UNH scored twice on one-play drives, another time on a three-play drive and also had a seven-play, 91-yard drive and a 14-play, 85-yard drive. The Wildcats had seven plays of 30 yards or more and five longer than 40 yards, which led to 621 yards of offense – the most UMass has allowed in a game since 1997.

UMass' defensive line was non-existent. Very little pressure was put on UNH quarterback R.J. Toman, who threw for 295 yards and four touchdowns. He looked comfortable in the pocket all day. But worst of all, the Wildcats ran for 326 yards on 54 carries. Tailback Robert Simpson led the parade of rushers with 125 yards and was followed by junior Chad Kackert, who ran for 86. Toman also added 61 yards on five carries.

The offense was no better. Its first two drives ended in interceptions and its third ended after quarterback Liam Coen was blindsided and lost the ball. All three turnovers resulted in touchdowns for the Wildcats and quickly put UMass in an insurmountable hole.

"When we don't get off well, we create this hole that we have to dig our way out of," UMass coach Don Brown said after Saturday's loss. "We just weren't able to do that, today. Not even close against a really good football team."

The offense went on turn the ball over another three times, two more on Coen interceptions and one on a fumble by Victor Cruz – for a total of six on the day compared to zero turnovers by UNH.

But, watching the game, there was one thing that stood out. UMass did not lose as badly as it did because it is not a championship caliber team; it was the simple fact that they did not have a championship-caliber performance on that given Saturday.

The effort was there, it just wasn't enough to mask the numerous errors – mostly execution, according to Brown and Coen – that the Minutemen had on the day.

"We needed to step up and take [the game] by the horns and make a play," Coen said. "Obviously we're trying to do that, and guys are making the efforts to do so, but it came down to a lot of execution errors today, a lot of errors I don't think we usually make."

Coen was correct that the effort was there from his teammates. No matter how big the deficit was, the Minutemen were still pushing the ball on offense. Tony Nelson never gave up as he

River Hawks snubbed in poll

Six Hockey East teams earn national rankings this week

By Joe Melosi
Collegian Staff

Coaches cringe when they hear anyone discussing national polls. The polls may play a significant role in awarding at-large bids to March's national tournament, but for the most part, coaches downplay their relevance.

There are six Hockey East teams in the latest USCHO.CBS College Sports Division I men's poll. The conference's two hottest teams, however, are absent from the 20-team list.

Both UMass-Lowell (5-4-0, 3-2-0 Hockey East) and Maine (6-3-0, 3-2-0 Hockey East) earned weekend sweeps and climbed the Hockey East table in the process.

The River Hawks defeated both No. 13 New Hampshire and No. 16 Massachusetts. Perhaps the most promising aspect of the wins was the different way they won each game.

Hockey East

They stunned the Wildcats in scoring eight goals on freshman goaltender Matt DiGirolamo on Friday, playing in place of injured starter Brian Foster. The River Hawks play such a tight checking style that it's rare for them to break out for four or five goals – never mind eight.

Saturday's matchup with UMass fell in favor of the River Hawks, partly because of a sloppy ice surface but mostly due to their ability to control the pace of the game.

"You have a brand of hockey and you stick to it and believe in it, you can beat anybody," UML coach Blaise MacDonald said after Saturday's win over UMass. "When you play against two really good opponents, you want to rise to the occasion."

Junior Nevin Hamilton stepped in for injured Carter Hutton and provided steady, sometimes excellent, goaltending all weekend. His performance (2-0, .60 saves) earned him Hockey East's Pure Hockey Defensive Player of the Week honors.

The Minutemen began playing more cohesively late in Saturday's game, but Hamilton's play kept them from cutting into UML's lead.

Excellence in goal has also led to Maine's resurgence. Freshman Scott Darling stopped 59 shots in the Black Bears' sweep of Providence. He is 5-1 on the season with a 1.00 goals-against average.

With their seven leading scorers from a year ago and goaltender Ben Bishop all departed, no one outside of Orono expected much from the Black Bears. Darling's consistency could quell any concerns and, should it continue, propel Maine into a more favorable matchup come tournament time.

Friday night's win wasn't perfect for the Black Bears, but Darling kept them alive and eventually preserved the win. His performance strengthened Maine's overall confidence, and it showed in a 3-0 win on Saturday.

"We knew we had to be better [than Friday night]. Scotty [Darling] kind of stole that one for us [Friday] night," Maine forward Tanner House told the Bangor Daily News after Saturday's win. "We weren't happy. So right from the get-go we just wanted to play a consistent game and, for the most part, we did."

Maine hosts Merrimack for a pair at Alfond Arena next weekend. Meanwhile, the River Hawks take on both Providence and Northeastern at Tsongas Arena in Lowell.

Rising to the top

It's difficult to blame Boston University goaltender Grant Rollheiser for the Terriers' 5-1 loss to UMass Friday night. In their

See HOCKEY on page 8

Sophomore defender Ryan Blair and UMass-Lowell beat then-No. 20 UMass, 2-0, last Saturday. The River Hawks defeated two ranked teams over the weekend.

Kellogg signs second recruit

By Adam Miller
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's basketball team officially signed guard Freddie Riley to a National Letter of Intent hours before last night's game against Memphis.

Riley is the second recruit Kellogg has signed this season. The first, Javorn Farrell, is also a guard and was signed Nov. 12.

Riley is a Florida native and played at the Hargrave Military Academy in Chatham, Va., where he averaged 22.8 points per game. The school is well-known for producing NBA talent, such as Josh Howard, David West and Joe Alexander.

Before Hargrave, he was a three-year starter at Vanguard High School. At Vanguard, Riley scored over 1,000 points, making him the 13th player in team history and first since 1993 to do so. He averaged 20 points and six rebounds per game, earning him third-team All-State honors.

Scout.com rates Riley as the 87th best recruit in the country, while ESPN gave him a rating of 89 out of 100 on its scale and ranked him the 31st best shooting guard in the country.

Riley was recruited for his scoring ability and versatility. He is the Minutemen's first Top 100 recruit in UMass coach Derek Kellogg's career.

The new, red signs displayed around the UMass campus are part of a $500,000 construction project which was approved in 2007 prior to the recent economic decline and state budget cuts.

New sign costs add up

UM expects to spend around $500K on project

By Dominic Poli
Collegian Staff

Perhaps you've seen them.

They're the first of many new signs to be erected around campus. Some give directions to nearby locations while some designate a specific building – and the whole project is expected to cost around $500,000, according to University of Massachusetts spokesman Ed Blaguszewski.

Jim Hunt, communications manager for UMass Facilities and Campus Planning, said that 30 to 40 signs have been placed around campus so far as part of the Campus Landscape Improvement Plan (CLIP), a beautification project managed alongside the $1 billion "New Dirt" campaign.

Hunt said the planning stages for CLIP, funded through bonds sold by the UMass Building Authority, started roughly two years ago.

In an e-mailed statement, Blaguszewski said that more signs will be installed through the spring and that they will help the campus community and visitors find their destinations more easily.

Due to the current economic crisis, some may criticize the decision to install the signs, which were discussed among several groups and approved by former UMass Chancellor John V. Lombardi in 2007.

But Hunt said the signs, put up by the UMass Physical Plant, are not the product of frivolous spending because the money to erect them was used about a year ago, before the economy hit such lows.

"It's part of the budget," he said. "It's not something you can go back and necessarily undo. The borrowing for it had already been done. And that's part of the reasoning behind doing it now."

"In projects like this going forward, of course we'll be under a lot more scrutiny and a lot tighter reins because of the budget situation," added Hunt. "The fact that the construction is actually going

Non-profit plans to cope with budget cuts

By Lisa DiMatteo

Students at the University of Massachusetts are not the only ones being affected by the $1 billion state budget cuts enacted by Gov. Deval Patrick. Charities and non-profit organizations are also suffering from the pinch.

The Amherst Survival Center (ASC), a non-profit organization, is looking at a loss of $30,000, 10 percent of its $300,000 budget, for the next fiscal year.

ASC is dedicated to helping those in need in the Hampshire and Franklin Counties. Founded in 1976, ASC's mission is to provide food, clothing, health care and community through volunteer efforts.

The center provides a medical clinic, a kitchen serving hot lunches four times a week, a pantry for emergency groceries and a thrift store – all of which are offered free of charge.

The center also employs a no-questions-asked policy.

"People just come in and we direct them to what they need," said Cheryl Zoll, executive director of ASC.

According to Zoll, the center serves about 3,000 people per year, and so far this year the center has seen a 40 percent rise in the number of people seeking services.

"Need is going up while resources are going down," Zoll said. "We have had about 200 people ask for turkeys for Thanksgiving this year, which is up from last year."

The state budget cuts do not take affect until the next fiscal year, which begins this coming January, but the center is already looking for alternative sources of income so it can continue providing the same services.

"We are appealing to the community for help, applying for more grants [and] asking people to support us," Zoll said. "We are also having to look at what [services] we might have to cut, we are not sure but maybe providing less food in the boxes [we give to families] or serving one less lunch each week."

Cutting services is obviously a worst-case scenario and one which Zoll said they are hoping to avoid.

In order to raise awareness in the community, the ASC has sent out press releases to the local media as well as additional fund raising appeal through their Web site.

According to the ASC Web site, the center relies on contributions of good and services as well as financial donations. Clothing, fresh, frozen or canned foods, small appliances and linens are all welcomed and accepted at the center. Volunteers are also needed to sort out donations, prepare and serve food and pick up food donations.

In addition to donations and volunteering, the center also provides a gift catalog. This catalog is way for people to honor their friends and family by purchasing a gift in their name to help those in need. Included in the catalog is a "Lunch is on me!" gift option which provides 60 survival center guests with a hot nutritious meal.

"[The catalog] gives people a sense of where their money is going," Zoll said. "It also educates people on what [services] are here."

As the winter months approach donations of warm clothing and holiday food for Thanksgiving and Christmas are in great demand.

Those interested in donating or volunteering may contact Tracey Levy, the center's program director at 413-549-1968, Ext. 202, or e-mail her at tracey@amherstsurvival.org.

The ASC Web site also provides general information on the center, their mission statement, donation and volunteering opportunities, as well as a way to make online donations or online purchases from their gift catalogue. The Web site is www.people.umass.edu/supportasc.

CVSA hits dance floor

Members of the Cape Verdean Student Alliance perform Pasada and traditional Cape Verdean dances Saturday evening in the Student Union Ballroom as part of CVSA night.

By Jasmine Renee Pina
Collegian Staff

Students rehearsed for hours on the 12th floor of Coolidge Hall in Southwest as they prepared for Cape Verdean Student Alliance (CVSA) night. The CVSA event was held Saturday in the Student Union Ballroom, where students practiced Pasada and traditional dances to Cape Verdean music.

Anthony Bingham, president of CVSA described Pasada as "a dance from Angola that we, Cape Verdeans, adopted into our own culture.

"We took in the dance and it involved into our culture and we made it our own," he said.

Pasada did not originate in Cape Verde, but their culture adopted it and enjoyed dancing to it.

"I was brought up into it myself," said Bingham.

There are also traditional dances which are performed within a community. More drums and instrumentals are heard during this dance. Traditional dances came from the roots of African culture.

"Pasada is modern like a new hip hop," said Amanda Dasilva, the secretary of CVSA.

Some festival dances they performed are masurka, cola and kuduro.

Traditional and Pasada dances are different from one another because Pasada has a slow, calculated tempo and is danced to music such as zouk. Pasada is more intimate, slow and sensual.

Four dances were prepared for CVSA night.

UMass students assemble to protest racism, 'Islamophobia'

By James Wellver
Collegian Staff

On a blustery Tuesday afternoon, students from a variety of Registered Student Organizations marched in protest of racism and "Islamaphobia."

Beginning on the Student Union steps, a group of approximately 40 students marched in a loop across the University of Massachusetts campus with signs of "We Want Justice" and "We Want Freedom" while chanting "No justice, no peace!" and "Islamaphobia has to go."

According to Subhan Tariq, President of the Muslim Student Association, the protest was in reaction to the lack of media coverage of an incident that occurred September 26, in Dayton, Ohio, which involved the abuse of children in a Mosque.

The coalition, which involved such RSOs as the Muslim Student Association and the Campus Anti War Network, participated in the protest.

Calling themselves the "Ohio Speak Out Committee," the coalition's goal is to gain awareness in what they call the unbalanced portrayal of Muslims in mainstream media.

UMPD Crime Log Nov. 10 – Nov. 16

MONDAY

Karl Miller, 51, with no listed address, only a P.O. Box 697 in Enosburg Falls, Vt., was arrested on Hicks Way at 6:51 a.m. and charged with indecent A&B on a person 14 or over.

"We received a 'be on the lookout' from Hadley P.D. about an indecent sexual assault that had occurred in a local hotel in Hadley," said University of Massachusetts Police Department Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald. "It was reported that there was enough probable cause to make an arrest, and the information about the car was transmitted to us. We located the car on Hicks Way and the person was ID'd and placed under arrest," he added.

Robert Luke Chiodo IV, 40, of 990 North Pleasant St. C10 UMass, Amherst, Mass., was arrested in the North Village Apartments at 7:17 a.m. and charged with domestic A&B.

TUESDAY

Geoffrey Janey, 22, of 42 Saint James St. Boston, Mass., was arrested as a result of a traffic stop on Commonwealth Avenue at 4:25 p.m. and charged with operating a motor vehicle with a suspended license and no inspection sticker.

WEDNESDAY

Yassine Rhrib, 18, of 145 Mountain Ave. Revere, Mass., was arrested as a result of a traffic stop in Lot 21 at 12:07 a.m. and charged with failure to stop/yield and operating a motor vehicle with a suspended license.

Ryan E. Czarnecki, 18, of 3945 Baylis Road Seaford, N.Y. was arrested in Lot 13 near Fraternity/Sorority Park at 2:09 a.m. and charged with possession of a Class D drug.

"One of our officers was watching four suspicious people in a vehicle at 2 a.m. and the officer believed that they were making motions, passing a cigarette amongst themselves. So, it appeared as though they were smoking marijuana," said Archbald. "Once they saw the [police] car a number of them ran and attempted to hide. The officer and additional officers on the scene approached the car, identified Ryan as the owner and operator of the car, and placed him under arrest," he added. Marijuana and paraphernalia was found in the car.

FRIDAY

Andre C. Paquette, 19, of 10 Faxon Green, Newport, R.I., was arrested at the Mullins Center at 6:06 p.m. and charged with A&B on a police officer, disorderly conduct and resisting a police officer making a lawful arrest.

"There were a number of officers drawn to a fight at the north lobby when people were leaving and they observed a crowd of about 75 people," said Archbald. "Paquette was being pulled out of the building by friends and officers," he added.

Paquette did leave but returned to the lobby and attracted a big crowd, including police who then attempted to arrest him. "He began to swing wildly and hit an officer in the chest and also tried to grab his badge. He then tried to flee, and an officer trying to arrest him was struck in the shoulder while [Paquette] was thrashing about," said Archbald.

Eddie Chang, 24, of 15 Simmons Ave. Belmont, Mass., was arrested as a result of a traffic stop on Lincoln Avenue at 11:27 p.m. and charged with operating a motor vehicle with a suspended license and not having registration in possession.

Vannak Suom, 28, of 204 Brown Ave. Holyoke, Mass., and Jyhong Chea, 27, of 97C Southpoint Drive 97C Amherst, Mass., were arrested as a result of a traffic stop on Massachusetts Avenue. Suom is charged with marked lanes violation and greater than reasonable and proper speed. Chea is charged with having three warrants in his name.

SATURDAY

Ashley L. Adams, 19, of 69 Hazel St. West Springfield, Mass., was arrested in Lot 32E at 9:49 p.m. and charged with possession of alcohol while under the age of 21.

SUNDAY

Morgan Corbett, 19, of 15 Nichols St. Merrimac, Mass., was arrested in John Quincy Adams dormitory at 12:57 a.m. and charged with A&B domestic, B&E for a misdemeanor and disconnecting a sprinkler system.

"There was an altercation in the hall where a male grabbed a female and the female was able to break away and get into a room where there were people inside," said Archbald. "She was followed and he forced his way in, uninvited and with friends," he added.

Corbett allegedly told everyone to leave and then assaulted the women.

"Once alone he pushed her into the wall and a second time into the bed, and grabbed her hand," he said.

Police were notified of the incident the next day and then gathered information and an arrest warrant.

"When we went to look for him in JQA, officers noticed a safety device [smoke alarm] was tampered with," said Archbald. This constitutes the disconnecting a sprinkler system charge. "He was located later and arrested," he added.

Scientists itching for an explanation

BY ROBERT S. BOYD
(MCT)

WASHINGTON — Scientists are baffled by one of humankind's most annoying problems — itching — an almost universal misery for which there is, as yet, no adequate explanation or treatment.

"Why we can't stop scratching remains a big puzzle for researchers," said Zhou-Feng Chen, a neuroscientist at Washington University, St. Louis.

"Itch can be devastating to patients and lead to extensive loss of quality of life," said Matthias Ringkamp, a researcher at Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore. "Unfortunately, the treatment of itch is often unsatisfactory."

The recent discovery of an "itchy gene," however, may offer hope for better treatments, Chen said. A drug to block that gene might relieve the distress of itching.

Specialists on pruritus — the scientific term for itching — described their work Monday at the annual meeting of the Society for Neuroscience in Washington.

They distinguished between two major types of itch: a mild form that can be treated with common antihistamines such as Benadryl and a severe form that cannot.

"The second type is often severe and very common, since more than 50 diseases and conditions can cause it," said Glenn J. Giesler, a neuroscientist at the University of Minnesota in Minneapolis. "There are no treatments currently available for this latter type of itch."

As many as 10 percent of the people in the world endure chronic itching, said Ben Maddison, a researcher at Unilever, a multinational consumer-product corporation.

The itch-related gene identified by Chen is labeled GRPR, for gastrin-releasing peptide receptor. When he injected it under the skin of laboratory mice, they "scratched like crazy," he said.

"The discovery of the first itchy gene in the spinal cord raises the hope that it may be possible to relieve itchiness in patients by blocking the GRPR function," Chen said.

The discovery "puts us in a better position to design better drugs to help people suffering from a variety of disorders," said Ethan Lerner, a dermatologist at Massachusetts General Hospital in Boston.

Itching and pain are different but related, the neuroscientists said. The nerves that carry both sensations travel along closely spaced pathways through the spinal cord to the brain.

Robert LaMotte, an anesthesiologist at Yale University in New Haven, Conn., called these related pestilences "itch and ouch."

Mild itching often is caused by histamines, itch-inducing chemicals found in poison ivy, mosquito bites, pollens, etc. Antihistamines provide temporary relief from them.

Chronic itch may result from kidney, liver or blood disease, HIV, shingles, eczema or many other causes.

Scientists aren't sure why scratching helps relieve itching. "We can only speculate," LaMotte said.

According to Giesler, scratching may prevent neurons on the spinal cord from responding to an itch-producing agent, thereby preventing the sensation from reaching the brain.

"Itch happens in your brain, not on your skin," said Clemens Forster, a researcher at the University of Erlangen in Germany.

A news article titled "Ahern researches 'Green' building" published Tuesday, November 18, misspelled the name of a University of Massachusetts professor of landscape architecture and regional planning. That professor is Jack Ahern, not "Ahearn."

More signage to come

New signs, like those in the North Residential Area, have been constructed across the UMass campus. The half-million dollar project is not complete as additional signage will be installed in planned phases.

Construction's cost, timing sparks criticism

on indicates that all of the budgeting processes took place long ago."

The signs are scattered from the Sylvan Residential Area to the Newman Center.

Hunt, who has worked at UMass for four years, said there will be far less construction projects next year, due to the budget situation now.

Yet some UMass students are still critical of last year's decision, saying that the economy wasn't in much better shape then either.

"I feel that the economy wasn't awesome a year ago," said Alison Eichmann, a 28-year-old Continuing Education student working on her master's degree in speech-language pathology and audiology.

She said that there were "other ways to spend the money," like renovating some of the building on campus.

Taylor Bramhall, 19, said that because there were already signs to designate each building, the money wasn't properly used. He said the same for the signs that display directions to local buildings.

"I can understand them doing it a year and a half ago," said Bramhall, a sophomore majoring in hospitality and tourism management. "The economy wasn't as bad. But with the recent downturn, it makes the past decision now seem kind of ridiculous. I was talking to construction workers and it seems like a lot of [the signs] are kind of unnecessary."

Blaguszewski said the current approved funding of a half-million dollars will pay for the new signage and, eventually, new banner installations. He also said the parking office will install new parking lot signage in planned phases.

"There will be additional phases of the signage Installations that include new street signage and individual building identifications as well as campus maps and information kiosks," he said.

Sixth graders impress experts with snow-thrower accessory

BY RICK BARRETT
MCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

MILWAUKEE — Why didn't we think of it?

That's how engineers from lawn and snow products manufacturer Ariens Co. reacted when they first saw the snow-thrower accessory invented by sixth-grade students Matt Moran and Sam Hippler.

The students from Davenport, Iowa, built a rock salt dispenser that mounts under the handlebars of an Ariens snow thrower and spreads salt along the machine's path, allowing the user to clear snow and melt ice in one pass.

The invention is made from a garden fertilizer spreader and some bicycle parts. Called the Mega Melter, it will be developed and sold by Ariens.

Matt and Sam will receive a cash royalty for each of the salt spreaders that Ariens sells through stores such as Home Depot and smaller equipment dealerships.

Terms of the deal haven't been publicly disclosed, but over a period of years, the boys could receive tens of thousands of dollars.

"The patent is pending, and we have no reason to think it won't be formalized," said Dan Ariens, president of the Brillion, Wis.-based Ariens Co., which has built lawn and garden equipment for 75 years. "I hope that we can get these boys through college without an expense to their parents."

Matt and Sam got their idea when they entered an invention competition sponsored by the engineering colleges at the University of Iowa and Iowa State University. The boys, now in seventh grade, also were looking for an easier way to remove snow and ice from their sidewalk and driveway last winter.

"It was a time saver" to use the snow thrower and spread salt at the same time, Matt said.

The competition was part of a program called Invent Iowa that encourages students in grades K-12 to seek and solve problems. In the annual event, hundreds of students come up with inventions ranging from toilet paper protectors to extendable handles for baby strollers.

"There's some type of engineering involved in every one of these projects," said Clar Baldus, Invent Iowa state convention coordinator and a University of Iowa administrator. "We did a survey of the inventions once, and it pretty much ran the gamut of what you would find at the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office."

Ariens Co. noticed Matt and Sam's invention through an Iowa newspaper article.

"We saw a picture of these two boys with an Ariens snow thrower they had mounted their device on," Dan Ariens recalled. "I sent them a letter of congratulations, and at the end of it I said 'let's talk'" about commercializing the invention.

Ariens Co. said this month it signed a letter of intent with Matt and Sam to produce and distribute their invention as early as next year.

It's a "viable, marketable and useful product idea," Dan Ariens said. "Our employees saw the potential and ran with it."

The basic design is sound and won't take a lot of refinement, according to the company.

Through trial and error, the boys modified a garden fertilizer spreader so that it opened and closed by pulling on a bicycle brake handle. One of their ideas was to use vibration from the snow thrower to make salt come out of the spreader, but that didn't work.

Ariens has done patent searches for similar products, and the invention seems unique for a snow thrower. A provisional patent has been filed in the boys' names and is pending.

"It was their intellectual curiosity that got us where we are with this invention," Ariens said. "The word 'breakthrough' might be a little strong, but what they came up with certainly is an innovative feature for a snow thrower."

Ariens Co. is keeping the boys informed of the product's development. The company plans to sell the salt spreader as an accessory for new and existing snow throwers.

"It's an idea that made it all the way up the ladder. Other ideas haven't made it this far," he said.

Sen. Clinton may face questions

BY TOM BRUNE
MCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

WASHINGTON — If Barack Obama asks Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton to be secretary of state, she likely will face questions about the global network her husband Bill has created with his foundation, speaking engagements and business ventures, experts said Friday.

Those questions could include whether Bill Clinton has conflicts of interest or follows the State Department line in his dealings with business and government leaders overseas.

Since leaving the White House eight years ago, Bill Clinton has entered into business partnerships and established the William J. Clinton Foundation, which sponsors international development, AIDS care and other initiatives in projects around the world.

The Clintons dissolved their blind trust and sold their stocks last year, and Bill Clinton disengaged from some investments, to avoid conflict of interest questions while Hillary Clinton, (D-N.Y.), campaigned for president.

But Bill Clinton still runs his foundation, which has raised at least $375 million from donors, including some from foreigners whose gifts have been questioned in newspaper articles.

In one case reported by The New York Times in January, for example, Canadian mining tycoon Frank Giustra gave $131 million to Bill Clinton's charitable enterprises after the two went to Kazakhstan together.

There, Clinton announced a program of selling discounted AIDS drugs and praised the country's leader, and Giustra won the right to invest in state-run uranium projects. Clinton and Giustra denied the two deals were connected.

But questions about that deal, the foundation and other business dealings are expected at the Senate confirmation hearing if Hillary Clinton is tapped, said Danielle Pletka, vice president of the American Enterprise Institute, a think tank.

"Any oversight committee worth its salt would raise those questions," said Pletka, a senior professional staff member on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee for 10 years.

The Clintons also would face financial disclosure requirements, she said. But it is unlikely Bill Clinton would have to name his foundation's donors, which is not required by law.

Yet as on the campaign trail, Hillary Clinton as secretary of state could face concerns she might have to tiptoe through a maze of trip wires inadvertently set by her husband in his far-flung connections and interests.

"There is no question it's a tricky thing," said Edwin M. Smith, a professor of law and international relations at the University of Southern California.

Sen. Hillary Clinton may be asked to serve as Obama's secretary of state.

Experts: 'Let it mellow;' urinal debate swirls on

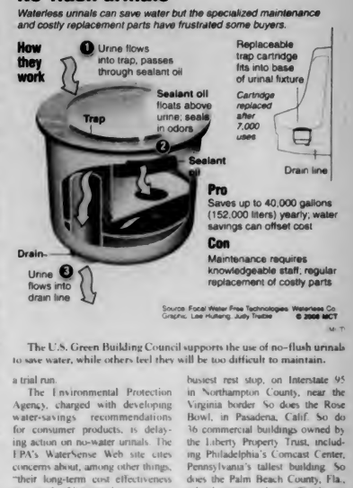
BY FRANK GREVE AND QUTENE WONG
MCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

WASHINGTON — Men since Adam have survived without urinals that flush. By the early 1990s, concerns over water shortages and environmental impact spawned a garage industry for urinals that don't use water.

Since then, the devices, which rely on special oil-filled drain traps, have become the rage in eco-conscious communities nationwide, especially in water-worried California and the arid Southwest. They're now fastest-growing segment of the U.S. urinal market, accounting for 250,000 of its 12 million units, thanks largely to powerful advocates.

The influential U.S. Green Building Council promotes no-flush urinals as a way to win its prized Leadership in Energy and Environmental Design endorsements. The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers specifies them for the service's future construction. Nobel laureate and former Vice President Al Gore is a board member of Falcon Waterfree Technologies of Grand Rapids, Mich., the leading no-flush urinal maker.

Still, an inconvenient truth hovers over the no-flush urinal industry. It's that many buyers and one-time fans say that the urinals are icky, tricky and costly to maintain.



Among those worried about their performance is Mary Ann Dickinson, executive director of the Chicago-based Alliance for Water Efficiency, a nonprofit that promotes water conservation. She fears no-flush urinals will fizzle and deter other water-saving innovations just as underperforming low-flow toilets did in the early 1990s.

"We need to make sure no-flush urinals deliver effective savings before we incentivize their placement," she cautioned.

Other doubters include Wal-Mart, which tested and rejected no-flush urinals for its stores last year; the Army's Fort Huachuca in southern Arizona, whose 870 units make it one of the biggest U.S. no-flush clients; and the University of Washington in Seattle, which recently canceled plans to install 100 after busiest rest stop, on Interstate 95 in Northampton County, near the Virginia border. So does the Rose Bowl, in Pasadena, Calif. So do 36 commercial buildings owned by the Liberty Property Trust, including Philadelphia's Comcast Center, Pennsylvania's tallest building. So does the Palm Beach County, Fla., school system, whose officials say no-flush urinals reduce student sabotage while conserving water.

However, no-flush urinals require distinct cleaning procedures and the fixtures vary in quality and ease of maintenance. And turnover is high among building maintenance staff. Net result: Some buyers find that their housekeeping staffs can't, for whatever reason, keep no-flush urinals in odor-free, efficient operation.

Consider the experience of building owners and managers in the Seattle area, an early adopter. Al Dietemann manages a regional utility consortium there called the Saving Water Partnership that in 2002 started offering rebates to commercial water customers for installing no-flush urinals.

The U.S. Green Building Council supports the use of no-flush urinals to save water, while others feel they will be too difficult to maintain.

a trial run.

The Environmental Protection Agency, charged with developing water-savings recommendations for consumer products, is delaying action on no-water urinals. The EPA's WaterSense Web site cites concerns about, among other things, "their long-term cost effectiveness as a result of increased maintenance requirements and life expectancy of (their) liquid seal or cartridge."

The feature in question is the no-flush urinal's trap. It's the size of a coffee mug and locks into the urinal drain. Urine flows under the trap's layer of scented blue oil much as vinegar flows through salad oil. At the same time, the oil blocks release of sewer gases in the drain line.

"They're not a problem if they're maintained properly," said Falcon vice president Daniel Gleiberman, whose products are also sold under the Sloan Valve Co. name. Customers with well-trained, well-managed and low-turnover maintenance staffs tend to agree with Gleiberman.

North Carolina, for example, uses only Falcon urinals at the state's

Gay is not the new black

Brad DeFlumeri

The Advocate, started in 1967 by two gay rights activists, is the oldest continuing gay publication in the United States. Currently printed as a biweekly newsmagazine, it will, according to its website, declare in its next edition that: "Gay is the New Black" – proclaiming gay marriage to be the "Last Great Civil Rights Struggle."

Many of its writers, former New Republic editor Andrew Sullivan notably among them, have already argued that the blacks in California who affirmed the traditional definition of marriage – thus denying the privilege of marrying to homosexuals - by a seven in ten majority two weeks ago denied to homosexuals the same civil rights sought for so long by blacks themselves.

Pro-gay marriage forces have leveraged this argument to their political advantage in an effort to bolster their claims, first that marriage is a civil rights issue similar to those fought for and won by blacks in the 1960s, and second that those who seek to deny this right of marriage to homosexuals must be bigoted and mean-spirited, similar to the racists who for so many years economically exploited and socially discriminated against blacks.

But this connection has thus far not held water – most states have spoken on this issue and done so in favor of a traditional definition of marriage – and for good reason.

The radical homosexual activists who claim that their struggle to redefine what endless generations of civilizations have defined as marriage is analogous to the struggle for civil rights of an oppressed racial minority in America do much to discredit their own cause and reveal the wrongheadedness with which they approach the issue. This connection belittles the efforts made and injustices endured by heroic black leaders, such as Martin Luther King Jr., who, in the face of actual hate-based discrimination, fought for racial equality across a spectrum of social, economic and political battlefields.

One of these battlefields was in the arena of marriage, where many states across the country outlawed the possibility of interracial marriages. But as the country – finally – began to come to grips with the atrocity known as the Jim Crow era and started to eliminate the legal distinctions between blacks and whites, bans on interracial marriages necessarily began to fade away.

Racism undergirded opposition to interracial marriages in this country, but rationality, not bigotry, forms the foundation on which opposition to same-sex marriage is built. Homosexuality has been accepted in our society as homosexual marriage has been roundly rejected.

Racism undergirded opposition to interracial marriages in this country, but rationality, not bigotry, forms the foundation on which opposition to same-sex marriage is built.

Society's interest in preserving traditional marriage is substantially due to the arrangement's ability to produce new life, something that a homosexual marriage, no matter how loving, well-meaning, and committed, simply cannot accomplish. This simple premise forms a legitimate and enduring basis for opposition to alternative definitions of the institution that serves as the wellspring of survival for our society.

An institution as immovably linked to the enduring health of a society as marriage must be maintained in a way that serves society's best interest. Moreover, altering the nature of such an institution and perhaps diminishing its ability to serve that best interest must be discussed in a dispassionate way, apart from the hysteria that gay rights enthusiasts have angrily infused into the debate.

Furthermore, we would be imprudent to change the definition of marriage based on the political preferences of a handful of activist judges. Instead, state officials governing how to best preserve the institution ought to be politically agreed upon, inclusive of the widest number of voters or their elected representatives, as they have been in states across the nation: voters in thirty out of thirty states where marriage definition initiatives have been on the ballot have resoundingly said the timeless and heterosexual definition of marriage need not be changed.

These voters, despite what radical homosexual activists would lead you to believe, were not hell-bent on denying civil rights to homosexuals. Rather, they looked at marriage and correctly saw its lone society-enhancing purpose: the loving union of a man and a woman with the possibility – indeed the likelihood - of that union producing a child.

With this in mind, motivated by rationality and not bigotry, these voters saw no reason to redefine a bedrock institution that need not be tampered with. In short, they found no compelling societal benefit in allowing homosexuals to marry and saw a reasonable objection, the inconsistency with procreation, to allowing them to do so.

Rest assured that this debate is not over: gay rights activists from San Francisco to Northampton, while asserting their "civil rights struggle," and falsely equating it with that of blacks, will continue to vilify as hateful any type of organized religious group or social conservative resistant to the radical transformation of marriage.

But in misunderstanding their perceived political opponents and mislabeling their own cause, pro-gay marriage advocates are content to use fear and hysteria to advance their political agenda. A country only a few decades removed from an actual civil rights movement – an astonishing crystallization of human progress and the inspirational righting of past wrongs – however, has rejected their selfish message.

For some states, a post-election setback

Parisa Saranj

Almost two weeks after the election of the first African-American president, still one of the most discussed topics in many conversations and gatherings is how one feels about such an achievement. Some strongly believe that it is a beginning of a new era for American society and the question of race.

For others, it is just another day or two of excitement, and soon everything will go back to normal, citizens will be preoccupied by their busy consumer life, and the everlasting struggle for minorities or people of color will continue to exist.

I am sure that this election was a tearful one. Many shed tears for senator Obama's victory, others cried for the loss of Senator McCain. Yet, there were many more teary eyes. Many men and women, who heard that proposition 8 has passed in California, cried for their shattered dreams and for their delayed civil right to equal marriage.

My special feelings for this victory lasted only few moments. In the midst of celebration for Obama's election, my best friend told me that even if he wants to be happy for his country, he just can't. "I am considered a second class citizen again," he said to me with his sad voice over the phone.

According to a New York Times article by Jesse McKinley about the reactions to the passing of Proposition 8, Frank Schubert, the campaign manager for Protect Marriage, the leading group behind passing Proposition 8, invited the gay community to a challenge of what he calls "democracy."

Schubert said, "The marriage is between a man and women. If they want to legalize same-sex marriage, they are going to have to bring a proposal before the people of California. That's how democracy works."

What struck me about this comment wasn't the context of it, since such comments have not been rare. Instead, what moved me was to see how well people from all over the country – not necessarily from the gay community – reacted to what happened in California.

Away from politics, religion and professional expertise, I simply ask myself: who am I to judge the work of God?

For example, Kate Leslie, an organizer for a rally in Boston, told McKinley, "You're watching people who could be you and are part of your community being stripped of their rights."

In her opinion, the sense of community has caused people in Massachusetts and elsewhere to raise their disapproval and anger.

And if there have been some small incidents of conflict and outrage among the gay community, it does not indicate the violent nature of these people. Rather, it shows the normal reaction of any human being to injustice.

Thousands of gay and straight people who have gathered across the country to raise a peaceful protest against the ban of same sex marriage are not committing hate crime toward a particular group. Such crowds are the signs showing how hurtful it is when one of the most fundamental civil rights of citizens is ignored. It is notable that rallying in front of churches does not mean "church-burning." It simply directs the attention to religious groups such as the Mormon Church, which spent millions of dollars on passing the Proposition 8.

At the same time, two main arguments that those who are opposing the same sex marriage make are for preserving family and for religious morality.

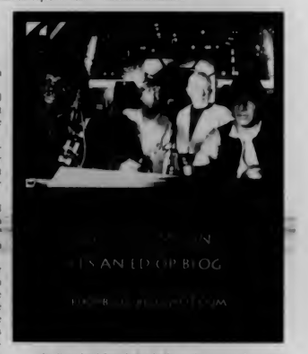
The pro-family arguments that have been circulating through the teaching of opposition groups such as the disciplinary TV commercials merely ignores the family structure of gay couples who have children by either adaption, surrogacy or artificial insemination. They are destroying such families who are already formed; they are preventing other families to be shaped.

On the other hand, my personal opinion on the long discussed topic of religion and its interference in matters of homosexuality points to the individuals rather than any particular religion. I do not hold any religion or book responsible for the interpretation of same sex marriage as wrongdoing.

Rather, the understanding of the followers of these religions of sexual status causes the unfair treatment of gay people. Away from politics, religion and professional expertise, I simply ask myself: who am I to judge the work of God? I am sure that in any religion, love, compassion, humanity and tolerance are promoted.

A question that never escapes my mind is how we as humans allow ourselves to forget about the civilized sides of what banning of same sex marriage will bring about. Why do we get lost in the Godly-Ungodly aspect of the issue that we forget the same God's humans?

One of the simplest examples that come to my mind is the right to health care. There are numerous cases in which one's employer health benefits would be denied to partners of decades when one of the couple retires. Yet, if the couple were legally married, the benefits would continue.



Now, a setback from the victory of Obama. I wonder if I will ever see the day that we keep our Gods to our hearts and homes and instead will enjoy practicing His words in loving and tolerating our fellow humans regardless of their beliefs.

Insulated environmentalism

Jon Peterson

Those who put high values on symbolism may have a lot to feel angry about at the suggestion that what they are doing has less actual affect on the situation that they are attempting to better. They may feel even more anger at the suggestion that what they are doing has no noticeable effect, and that their actions are prompted by a want to feel morally superior.

The past weeks have seen a fair share of environmental groups setting up around Amherst and the UMass campus. And when I see environmental groups, I have to take a breath and make a decision not to talk policy. One of the defining characteristics about environmentalists is their inability to compromise, and it is in their special world they can see things in such black and white.

Clearwater.org is an environmental action group which hires young people in the roles of "Field Organizers." Their Craigslist.com ad says the position offers competitive wages, "rapid advancement," and an ability to "defend our environmental laws from attacks" from opposing view points.

It is only with an ideologically objective group that knows what is best for the world that there can be such absolutes. And what is most disturbing about environmentalists is how many false things they know to be true.

What is it that makes individuals so sure of their positions that any change to their position would be inexcusable? A discussion I had recently with a new acquaintance summarized the state of affairs quite nicely.

After getting along fine, I asked her who she was voting for. She named her candidate (Candidate A), and I did my own (Candidate B) as well. She was 100 percent opposed to my Candidate B, stating that Candidate A was an amazing person for the job and that Candidate B was more or less not worthy to be in the position they were at all.

What is it that makes individuals so sure of their positions that any change to their position would be inexcusable?

I argued that my Candidate B was not my ideal choice to make for the presidency either, but that I preferred him strongly on several issues, while disagreeing with him on several others.

That was the end of that friendship. True believers for any position can not be swayed from their stance for a number of reasons, but what is it that makes it so difficult for them to consider their opponents?

Scientific philosopher Thomas Kuhn described the problem in the term of a "paradigm" in his main work, "The Structure of Scientific Revolutions." We are all familiar with optical illusions in which there may be two possible images in a picture.

Kuhn describes our how as it is much easier for us to see one pattern than another, while other people see the other image, as the paradigms. He says in his work that neither of these views more accurately describe reality than the other; they both just see it differently.

These "paradigms" theoretically could extend to all aspects of life, and to everyone's perceptions of reality in every sense. Due to these differences, people essentially speak different languages when trying to communicate ideas, and because of this it is extremely difficult to change a persons mind with arguments hinged even upon facts.

In terms of politics and the environment, many people do not want to hear facts. Many students at UMass are from Cape Cod, and know about the historical districts, the land reserves and the problems of poverty and cramping in many places in the area.

Many of the same people who argue on the Cape for more government provided state subsidized housing also argue for the preservation of historical places and of the "environment" as a whole.

These people don't understand the basic rules of supply and demand, and that by restricting vast swaths of the Cape land from being built on, the prices of existing houses and unused land increases astronomically.

Anyone who has flown over the Cape in a plane or glider knows that there is very little development, and that green encompasses the vast majority of the land. To environmentalists, however, this is less important than saving as many trees as possible.

It is through this lack of listening to cost benefit analyses that environmentalists do more harm than good. As the world turns though, markets fluctuate, and even now, the Cape is becoming more and more deserted by new families and a generation of its keepers.

So the next time you are talking to an environmentalist who is a friend, tell them you're going to waste more paper as a means of environmentalism. Appreciate their glazed eyes as you explain that tree harvesters will have more incentive to plant more trees, and thus increase the tree population. They may not listen to you, but it is possible that they were never hearing your ideas in the first place.

Assistance for public care assistants

Matt Kushi

Nearly every single time that I tell a person that I sometimes work as a part time PCA, I get a blank stare followed by a guess as to what the acronym PCA could stand for. What PCA stands for is Personal Care Attendant.

For those people out there that are PCAs, you will find the content of this article familiar. For those of you not familiar with PCAs, take this column as an opportunity to learn something new. By the end of this column, you will see that PCAs are the unsung heroes of many people's lives, and are finally on the brink of getting long sought benefits, provided by their new union, 1199SEIU United Healthcare Workers East.

With this union, workers are proposing to form a new union contract that would guarantee higher wages, paid time off, and health insurance.

A lot of you may be wondering what it exactly is that a Personal Care Attendant does. What a PCA does is take care of people who are unable to perform daily tasks that we take for granted and help them lead a better quality of life. "Ok, that's pretty normal," you might be thinking. It is normal until you take into account the fact that PCAs in Massachusetts, until now, have had almost no job benefits.

With a solid union, people will be more willing to choose PCA work as their primary source of income. Increased wages is one of the benefits proposed that would help stabilize the financial crisis for PCAs. The proposal is that wages will be increased to $11.60 by July 1, 2009 and $12.28 by July 1, 2010.

Paid time off is another benefit that is proposed in the new union contract. When employees take sick time off, they are not allowed to be paid by it, a benefit that most other jobs have.

Striving for ... self-reliance is no easy task, but it is necessary to resolve all the other issues we face.

Health Insurance is yet another benefit that many take for granted. This would allow employees who are injured while at work to be covered by insurance instead of having to pay out of their own pockets.

If this new union contract is passed, it will make the job of Personal Care Attendant more acceptable to people looking for a long-term job instead of a short-term filler job.

To give you a better understanding of what a Personal Care Attendant does, I will give you the privilege of seeing into my life a little bit. My older brother has severe disabilities and my family, after reviewing many options, decided to hire PCAs about 6 years ago. Due to the fact that the pay is low and that there was no union to protect their jobs, there were not a lot of PCAs to hire. This left me to be my brother's primary PCA for a time. This experience was more than helping my brother. It was a lesson in responsibility and humility.

It showed a young kid the true value of helping a fellow human being. The job description for a PCA differs from person to person but it generally encompasses helping the person feed, bathe, get into the bathroom, and hanging out with them.

Over the past 6 years, I have seen PCAs come and go. All of them have become friends with my brother, which touches the hearts of all in my family. It is sad to see them leave because they have to tend to their lives too and need a more stable financial situation.

One of the most important qualities that a PCA can bring to the job is friendship. A lot of people that require PCA's can't go out and weave their own social life. There have been times when I have sat and wondered about my brother's life. While there are many wishes and dreams that my family and I wish that we could give him, we know that his friends are one thing that he does have. A lot of his friends have been those that have cared for him and I only wish, for his sake, that they didn't have to leave.

Just as having a stable situation is important for the person being cared for, it is also important for PCAs. That is why the formation of this union is so important.

What matters the most to humans is the need to be loved and to matter to somebody. As a PCA, you provide that essential need to a person whether you know it or not. Due to the fact that you care, you are a hero to the one that you care for. Likewise, to the PCA, the one that they care for may be their hero as well for the adversity that they stand up day after day, whether it be a disability or old age.

For those PCAs out there, this union proposal is for all of you unsung heroes. For the average reader, hopefully you have found the inspiration in the value of caring for a fellow human, the best thing that one person can do for another.

New Bloc Party album just noise

Alternative indie-rockers' new release fails to deliver

By Peter Rizzo
Collegian Staff

Bloc Party's third album, "Intimacy," does not have much to show for itself with its collection of familiar melodies and less-than-stellar lyrics.

For a record entitled "Intimacy," Bloc Party's third disc is anything but subtle and introspective.

Forming in the late 90s, these English rockers went through their share of lineup shuffling and name changes before finally hitting it big with their 2005 debut, "Silent Alarm."

The album immediately shot up to No. 3 in the U.K. on the back of heavy praise from British press, but like many of their fellow contemporary British acts, the album's homeland hype failed to generate similar waves across the pond.

On the new disc, Bloc Party attempts to hit the stadium circuit, this time by opting for arena-sized songs with shout-a-long choruses.

The first track, "Ares," named after the Roman god of war, dispels the notion that this will be an album filled with power ballads. Instead of a power hit, is an amorphous blob of fuzzed-out guitar noise, call-and-response lyrics, and pounding drums. The result is anything but tuneful and not worth a repeated listen.

Elsewhere, the disc dips into uncharted territory, leaving behind comparisons to bands like The Strokes and The Cure that have dogged the band since their arrival.

The album succeeds at broadening the group's musical palette, incorporating strings, horns, bouts of electronica, and the heavy usage of effects into their established mix.

However, despite the musical evolution, "Intimacy" fails to deliver more than a handful of memorable tunes.

"Mercury," the album's second track, repeats many of the opening song's mistakes.

The track's murky mix buries lead singer Kele Okereke's voice under a busy drum beat and vocal delays, and one can easily see why, when Okereke sings "my Mercury's in retrograde" repeatedly throughout the chorus, it proves that Bloc Party's weakness isn't their musicianship – it's their songwriting.

"Intimacy"
Bloc Party
Witchita Recordings/Atlantic
4/10

While Okereke strives for the lyrical life that Robert Smith of The Cure was able to bring to even the simplest of lyrics, here the results are mixed.

Okereke's high school notebook lyricism more closely resembles the mediocrity of Incubus front man Brandon Boyd, who also had penchant for oddly stressed syllables and emotional impotence, giving way to hit-or-miss results.

Bloc Party is better when they stick to their strengths. The track "Halo" hangs with a straightforward punk fury, and is one of the few tracks free from the album's constant overindulgence.

I finally released from the swaths of reverb and effects that choked the life out of earlier songs, "Halo" and it's oddly named follow-up "Biko" find the band regaining their footing.

"Biko" is the album's first mid-tempo song, one that finds Okereke singing about loss, the album's overarching theme.

Though the lyrics are as weak as those on earlier songs ("I keep writing these songs for you, to save you from your grave"), the song's sparse drum machine beats and simple chords free it from the cacophonies that dominated earlier efforts.

Anchored by multiple tracks of echoing backing vocals, Okereke's words get space to breathe. Displaying that even though he's no lyrical Lennon, with the right backdrop lyrics like "toughen up the world isn't kind to little things," can be used effectively.

These tracks prove to be the eye of the storm, as the band quickly abandons the track that they stumbled on in favor of rehashing earlier mishaps.

Lyrics with weak metaphors abound on the track "Trojan Horse," as Okereke drops more emotional clunkers with final like "you could take your watch off/ honor me/ made love/ we didn't want to share our time with anyone" that make you wonder if he's trying.

Softer songs like "Signs," "Ion" and "Biko" somehow elevate themselves above the album's murk of techno and mosh-pit jams, the few rays of light in an otherwise empty album. Overall "Intimacy" fails to even elevate itself above mediocrity, inhabiting a musical landscape with too many valleys and not enough peaks.

Sondre Lerche performs at the Iron Horse Music Hall

Norway-native Sondre Lerche performed new material as well as a duet with opening act Sylvie Lewis last night at Northampton's Iron Horse Music Hall yesterday evening. His cover of Pete Townsend's "Let My Love Open the Door" was recently featured on the "Dan in Real Life" soundtrack. Look for a review of his performance in Thursday's paper.

Dido picks up sticks, lays down her own groove

By Ann Powers
Los Angeles Times

LOS ANGELES – Talking about her new album at a Hollywood rehearsal studio last month, Dido Armstrong used one word more than any other – 14 times, in fact, over the course of an hour. The word was "emotion." This was a bit surprising, since Dido is pretty much the living picture of musical reserve.

"I pull emotion into these songs," said the English singer-songwriter, whose third studio album, "Safe Trip Home," was released Tuesday in the U.S. "Sometimes it's my emotions, sometimes it's something I've picked up. But then it becomes yours when you take it on."

Dido is contemporary pop's most resolute plain Jane, even more firmly undramatic than her American counterpart, Norah Jones. Her two multi-platinum albums and her sampled vocal on Eminem's 2000 hit "Stan" made her a single-named pop star, but she truly wouldn't cause a stir at the grocery store. She's sensible-ponytail pretty, embodying that pre-feminist term for self-possession, "demureness."

Another word Dido often uses is "insular" – that one describes not her music but herself.

"I will just say things how they are," she said of her songs, which are considered by admiring fellow songwriters to be models of unfussy introspection. "I always want to bring emotion across in a straightforward way. I don't want to get histrionic when I'm singing. For me that's just not interesting; it goes too far down one road."

The delicate strength of Dido's music has made her an unexpected critical favorite. She's the kind of artist who's often dismissed by tastemakers as too bland, yet many find themselves drawn into her songs despite themselves. "It has its own kind of integrity," wrote Barry Walters in Rolling Stone, reviewing 2003's "Life for Rent." Similar, somewhat startled praise is now filtering in for "Safe Trip Home."

"She's much maligned as hitting that place on the first album where every 25- to 35-year-old woman owned her record," said Nic Harcourt, the outgoing music director of local station KCRW. "Then it sort of becomes, 'Oh my God, she's everywhere.' But if you take a listen to the songs, she's just a really good songwriter. At the end of the day, that's what comes through."

Dido is a careful minimalist in a field in which bold strokes are more rewarded, especially from women. Emerging from England's down-tempo electronic music scene in collaboration with her brother, Rollo Armstrong of the band Faithless, her style stood out in contrast to more picturesque divas like Portishead's Beth Gibbons or Tricky's partner, Martina Topley-Bird.

But she also was upholding the legacy of reserved feminine voices that extends throughout European pop from Francoise Hardy to early Marianne Faithfull to Linda Thompson to Sade, Tracey Thorn and Beth Orton.

"She's one of the most naturally gifted singers I've witnessed," said Jon Brion, who produced much of "Safe Trip Home," in a phone interview. "Her sense of time, her sense of musicality is huge. Partly because she's had success, and partly because the pure electronic quality of her earlier records and the subtlety of this kind of singing, I don't think people realize how deeply musical and flowing it is – and how it influences the musicians around her."

Enlisting Brion on "Safe Trip Home" brought the kind of drama Dido welcomes. As a producer, the Los Angeles-based Brion is best known for spinning gold from unruly souls such as Kanye West, Rufus Wainwright and Fiona Apple. He and Dido first connected as writing partners, but a studio collaboration soon evolved.

"I was actually a fan of her writing," Brion said. "With a lot of people who are making things, you feel like it's running through a borrowed filter. It's their idea of what it means to be an artist. Whereas, there's a point in which you realize somebody's intelligent and self-aware enough to take the time to run things through their filter. That's the attraction for me."

Brion encouraged Dido to try new things, starting with an unexpected basic: playing the drums. Sitting behind the kit, as well as working with the top-notch drummers Brion recruited, including Mick Fleetwood, Jim Keltner, Questlove and Matt Chamberlain, prompted Dido to delve deeper into the rhythmic core of her sound.

"I come from a dance music background and I went through all the phases when I was young of loving dub and reggae, and then into hip-hop," she said. "I learning to play the drums as well really opened up my brain. I'll be writing a song on the guitar, and maybe a little stuck on that, and I'll move to the piano, and now it's this really liberating thing that I can go to the drums. Because to me a song is just about the flow of it, it just has to flow and me to never notice in a way, it has to feel whole and real."

After her sessions with Brion, Dido returned to London, thinking that "Safe Trip Home" was done. But she couldn't stop writing.

"I went home, and I had all my instruments around, and I now knew how to record and work all the computer programs and everything, and how to engineer it, and ended up basically doing a whole album's worth of stuff on my own at home, from what I'd learned," she recalled.

At first she thought she'd keep these new efforts to herself, but soon she shared them with her brother. He encouraged her to complete the songs, and several appear on the new collection.

Her expanded sense of self also helped Dido take new thematic risks. A) the album's core is a confrontation with stasis and mortality, spurred by the death of Dido's father from lupus in 2006. Songs such as the album's centerpiece, "Grafton Street," capture the complexity of a family member's lingering departure. Others consider how even the happiest

From runway to reality

By Rebecca Babin
Collegian Staff

(Editor's Note: This is Part one of a two part series that will continue next Wednesday.)

Let's face it: On a college budget, most designer duds that come straight off the runway are a little bit out of our price range.

Showing up to class in what comes down that catwalk would be going a little overboard anyways. The real trick is learning how to transform those runway looks into a trendy but realistic version.

The Fall 2008 Ready-to-Wear collections were nothing short of spectacular. The New York, London Milan, and Paris designers truly outdid themselves, presenting cohesive collections that expressed their visions of what they wanted fall to be about this year. This, in turn, makes it so much easier to pull out the overlying trends and make them happen for us.

Plaid is making a big comeback this season.

Fall hues are making a scene in winter too.

Autumn Hues

It was a wonderful fall this year, with bright and brilliant foliage painted onto the trees. As a result, spiced shades of crimson, bright blasts of orange, and flares of yellows are popping up in stores everywhere – just dying to be worn. This silk Banana Republic top is one way at $69, which is just a fraction of the cost of its Marc by Marc Jacobs counterpart.

Plaid: The Comeback Kid

Plaid was done away with after pairing it with oversized flannel in the 90's: a grungy stage we would sometimes rather forget. Past decades have reserved it for school girls in mini skirts. Now, designers just can't seem to get enough of it. Whether dresses, shirts, or blazers, plaid has covered them all and we really like it. Mark Jacobs channeled plaid in his Mark by Mark Jacobs collection, which caters to a younger, livelier crowd. Check out this Urban Outfitters tunic for $58, who has a broad range to pick from, which you'll soon be able to see for yourself when its newest store opens in Northampton.

Peek-A-Boo: I See You!

There is nothing wrong with amping up the sex appeal, according to designers this season. Instead of showing more skin, it's all about creating an allusion.

Plunging necklines that would otherwise be considered seriously scandalous are made allowable by netting pulled tight across the chest and collarbones. This style comes in a variety of designs ranging from sensual to romantic, depending on the look you are trying to create.

For the holidays, you may choose a satin, sweetheart-turned-short-sleeve number that balloons out into a full skirt at the waist. Or for a date, try a body hugging tube-turned-tank.

Whatever you choose, it will be sure to turn heads. There were four dresses incorporating this trend in the Fall 2008 Lanvin collection. This Topshop Knitted Corset Dress accomplishes the style for $90.

Energetic patterns are all the rage this year.

Leather jackets can be worn off the Harley too.

Patterns, Please!

It was obvious that designers put neutrals and solids out of mind when you take a look at the energetic patterns that made their way down the runway.

Patterns ranged from brilliantly crafted florals to metallic mosaics to bright splatter-painted graffiti. There is no shortage of choice, which leaves room for creativity with patterns this year.

This Express dress may seem a bit pricey at $98, but they are buy one, get one 50% off, so go in with a friend and get them at a steal! Especially, when compared to the similar, over-priced Erdem frock!

Suiting is Sexy

With interview season in full swing, those of us looking for jobs and internships are on high alert.

The stress of finding the right job usually outweighs the stress of finding the right look to search for it in, so people tend to be stuffed in run-of-the mill pants suits. No wonder why we're all so grumpy.

Luckily, designers are loving suits this season and have recreated them in a stylish and sexy way. Dolce & Gabbana brought back the three piece suit, a look that is classic and re-creatable. Try Express and mix and match.

This peek-a-boo dress is ideal for the holidays.

They have a ton of pieces to try!

Leather: Sexier than Lace?

It's hard to say which one takes the cake, but this season is all about leather jackets. Whether cropped or to the waste, asymmetrical zippers or no zippers at all, hot biker collar or not, these jackets can make even a white t-shirt and jeans look runway ready.

The Miss Sixty jacket is retailing at $529, a price that stars like Blake Lively and Lindsey Lohan are quick to pay. Unfortunately college students are not, but can still accomplish this look with this TopShop bomber jacket for only 45 pounds, which comes to about $90...much more doable.

Vests are a classic addition to any ensemble.

Cure your dose of winter fashion woes

Scarves are a sure hit this winter season both indoors and outdoors. They come in all sorts of patterns and add an extra dose of moxie to any outfit.

By Julie Holbrook
Collegian Staff

It's official. The cold weather has now come upon us. It's time to put away those mini-skirts and flip flops and drag out all those winter clothes. There are a few must-have looks everyone needs to keep warm and stay fashionable this winter.

Certain colors are getting the spotlight this winter season. Most commonly seen are dark crimson reds and deep purples, chocolate browns and hunter greens, and of course, the essential black.

Any of these hues are sure to get you noticed this season. But these shades don't necessarily have to just be on your clothes – try to incorporate them into both makeup and accessories, too.

Of course, the most important staple of any cold month is the jacket. This can be anything from your typical ski parka to a cute pea coat.

Some hot, affordable parkas are available from other companies like Mont Bell, Eddie Bauer, Gorsuch, Burton and White Sierra. Chic and reasonable pea coats can be found at stores like H&M or Express.

Pea coats and parkas serve as a functional means of keeping the best warmth through the cold winter months. Leather and tweed jackets are both practical and stylish choices, too.

Not chilly outside? One of the most common and functional items seen this winter is the ever-classic and stylish blazer. Blazers and sports coats are stand out items this season, and work all year around. And they can be worn with almost anything – from blouses to t-shirts and even dresses. They are the perfect way to add a little polish and sophistication to any look.

Not a fan of the typical, bulky snow boot? There are countless alternatives options for boots out there for everyone.

Up-and-coming this season are the super-edgy biker or rocker leather boots. They can be found in either high or low heel and are accessorized with lots of straps and zippers.

Equestrian boots, formerly known as cowboy boots, are making a comeback this season too. From leather to suede, high heel to flat, nothing adds a certain statement to an outfit quite like equestrian boots.

Slouched boots and cuffed boots, particularly suede, are also perfect to match with your favorite pair of jeans. Companies like FRYE top the list for desirable boots, but don't quite fit the bill price-wise. More reasonable alternatives are available at places like Urban Outfitters and web stores like StyleDiary.com and Zappos.com.

A vital item to keep anyone warm indoors this winter is the knit sweater. Sometimes referred to as "old man sweaters," these simple, button-up cardigans can go on over essentially anything, and add a little zing to any outfit. Cardigans are something for both women and men, and can be found most anywhere, from your local Salvation Army to virtually any major retailer or department store at a nearby mall.

Don't fret if it doesn't necessarily fit nice and snug. Lose fitting and oversized sweaters are no longer a fashion faux-pas. You can even dress up the oversized sweater with some chic tights and rock it as a knitwear dress.

People are paying close attention to detail this season, so accessories are a must. And in the cold months, the possibilities are endless.

Of course with winter come hats, gloves, and scarves. Like boots, leather biker gloves are a great way to add a certain edge to your style. In terms of hats, anything from knits to beanies to fedoras will do.

Even more so than hats, everyone is dressing up their look with a scarf. Scarves can be worn with almost any outfit, both indoors and outside. Find a scarf that makes a statement, whether it be with a bold color, an audacious print such as plaid, stripes or perky flowers. Tassels can make a scarf pop that much more.

As far as materials go, the possibilities are equally endless. Knits and fleece are great for being out in the cold, and jersey and silk materials add oomph to any indoor outfit. Looking to save money? Awesome winter accessories can be found at stores like Target for great prices.

Perhaps the most important tip, for any season, is to be sure to rock everything you wear with confidence, because the better you feel, the better you'll look.

Ask Gwen: your go-to advice authority

To make high heels easier on your feet, consider wearing supported inserts or a pair of flats.

Hey Gwen,

I know I look so much better in heels, and not to mention I strut with a little more confidence when I wear them. But an hour into wearing them, my feet are totally screaming at me. Is there anything I can do to make the beauty last, sans the pain?

—Hurting in Heels

Dear Hurting in Heels,

High heels really work wonders for our confidence, don't they? They streamline the figure, make our legs look longer and leaner, and make our butts stick out just enough to give us that needed oomph.

However, beauty can equal pain, and in your case it is the literal truth.

I'd recommend looking into gel or cushioned inserts to place inside your heels. They won't remove all the pain – let's face it, you are still wearing high heels – but they will give you a little more support while you are on your feet.

Check out Dr. Scholl's for a line of products specifically for women, from inserts to soothing foot butter.

Also, consider that flats are still in fashion.

They may not give you quite the same effect that heels do, but for days when you know you will be walking or standing for long durations, they will make a difference.

Whichever shoe you decide to wear, just remember that the heels only make a difference because you believe they do. You are a beautiful and confident person, regardless of your choice in footwear. Stand tall and strut your heart out!

Hey Gwen,

Recently my skin has been breaking out and I don't know why. I heard it could be my pillowcase but even when I change it, my face is starting to resemble that of a prepubescent nightmare. Any ideas?

—Breaking Out & Freaking Out

Dear Breaking Out & Freaking Out,

Well, changing your pillowcase often is a very good practice, so I recommend keeping that up.

The oils from your hair release onto your pillow and in turn clog the pores on your face while you sleep.

Changing your pillows and sheets once every week or two should help. If you have particularly sensitive skin, try replacing your detergent. Also, if it's possible, you could try to sleep on your back.

It's a good idea to have some kind of topical treatment on your face while you sleep, as well.

This will not only promote healing of the irritated places you already have, but will help shield your skin from any unwanted oils and bacteria.

And please remember to always wash off your make-up before you head to bed! This is one of the quickest and easiest things you can do to help clear up your skin and prevent any more trouble areas.

As for topical treatments, there are so many products out there to try, and honestly the best way to find what works best for you is trial and error.

What works for your friends will not necessarily work for your skin type.

However, if price is not an issue, I will recommend Murad's Acne Complex line of products.

They work wonders and will not over-dry your skin. The Murad line is available at Sephora. They are a bit more expensive than drugstore items – they range from $17.50 – $53 – but are worth every penny, in my opinion.

There is an Acne Complex starter kit, with smaller sizes of all the top items, available for $35. This is your best bet if you are unfamiliar with the product, and comes with enough of each item to last you about a month.

Most importantly, though, I suggest you make an appointment with your local dermatologist.

Everyone has different skin and there are many reasons why your skin could be changing. It's always best to seek a doctor's advice in these matters, and you may need something stronger than you can get over-the-counter.

Sometimes it takes a double whammy of prescriptions and topical treatments to clear up the problem.

Finally, don't stress about your skin! It will only make things worse!

Just relax, take a breather and know that something out there will work for you, it's only a matter of finding the right solution.

Freshman Thalia Kazakos generates much of her personal style from her Goodwill collection.

By Emma Livergren
Collegian Staff

Name: Thalia Kazakos
Year: Freshman
Major: BDIC Sustainable Building

Sweatshirt: American Apparel
Shirt: American Apparel
Scarf: Paris street vendor
Leggings: EG Smith
Boots: Doc Martens

Daily Collegian: How would you describe your personal style?

Thalia Kazakos: I don't really have a personal style. I'm kind of plain. I keep everything simple.

I wear Doc Martens because they're the most comfortable shoes in the world.

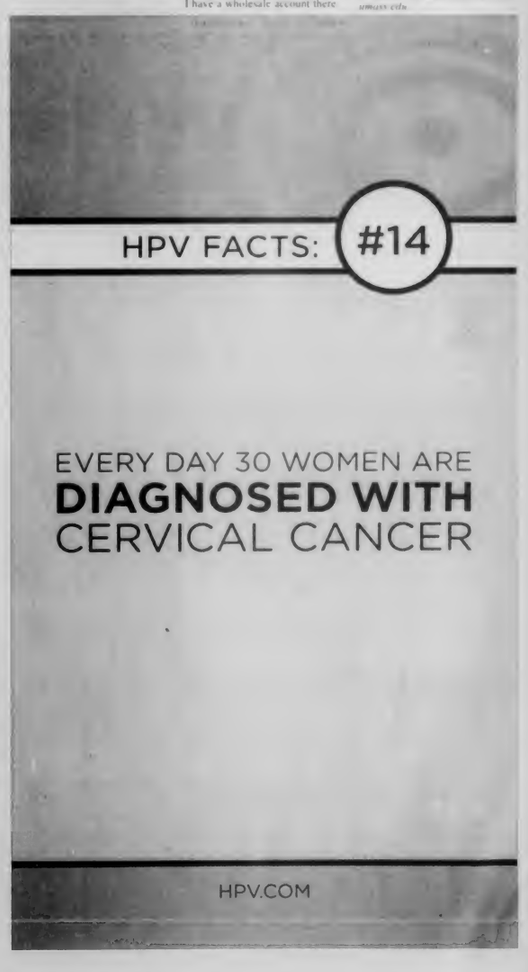
I like boots. I like purple and I like American Apparel – only because I have a wholesale account there.

DC: Do you have a signature piece that you wear constantly?

TK: Boots, my Doc Martens. I have Frye harness boots, I like those a lot. I have a pair of cowboy boots that I wear a lot, and Levi's are the best jeans in the world.

DC: What do you think when you get dressed in the morning, do you have a plan?

TK: It really depends on the day. Sometimes I don't care at all and sometimes I kind of care but I generally don't spend much time. I like to clash. I'd say about 50 percent of my clothes are from the Goodwill.



DC: Do you have a style icon?

TK: No, not really, no one that comes to mind, I kind of do my own thing.

Fashion DIY: How to spice up your own UMass T-shirt

BY ELLIE RULON-MILLER
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDANT

A few weeks ago, my intramural soccer team won the championship game at the end of our season. Each girl on the team was given a t-shirt – UMass maroon t-shirts that read "Intramural Champion" on them.

The whole team got really excited to wear these (mostly oversized) numbers around campus the next day, except for me. I found my shirt a little bit boring because there were eleven other girls who had the same one. The fact that it was several sizes too big didn't help.

Instead of throwing the shirt in my soccer bag and forgetting about it, I resolved to make a few alterations to it.

I thought over my options: a hoodie? No, this shirt was too thin for a New England winter. Maybe I could just tailor it down to my size? No, too boring. So I decided to turn the shirt into a one-of-a-kind tank.

To make your own tank top, you'll need a fairly baggy t-shirt, straight pins (if you don't have any or don't feel like buying some, safety pins will suffice), scissors, a sewing machine (or intense hand-stitching skills), 1" bias tape, a pen or fabric pencil, some extra fabric in a complementary color to your shirt (optional). You can get all of these at Jo-Ann's Fabric and Crafts at Hampshire Mall.

To start, turn your shirt inside-out and lay it flat on your work surface with the front facing you (I just cleared off my bed and worked there). Make sure that the bottom hem on the front and back of the shirt are lined up – keeping the original hem means you get to avoid having to create your own, which is a lot trickier than it sounds. If you want to be really meticulous, now would be an opportune time to iron the shirt, though it's not completely necessary.

Take out your straight pins (or safety pins) and see where the seam of the sleeves curves into the middle of the shirt in the chest area. Put a pin in the body of the shirt where the curve of the sleeve's hem meets the body on both sides. The needle end of the pin should be pointing down towards the bottom of the shirt (make sure you're pinning the two layers of the shirt together).

After sewing the strips to the spots you have marked on your shirt, the finished product should look like this.

Using the two pins as a guide, pin two straight lines from the sleeve to the bottom hem. Next, place a pin just below the seam at the collar, pointing either right or left. Pin a horizontal line across the top of the shirt, following that pin as a guide. If the pinned-up sides don't already meet this horizontal line, continue pinning in a straight line up the sides until they do.

Now that you have everything pinned, take out your scissors and cut around the pinned lines so that you have two rectangles of fabric pinned together. Take out your extra fabric or scraps from the last step and cut out two long rectangles that are as long as the top side of your newly cut-out rectangles and about two or three inches high. Take these two strips and (separately) fold them in half lengthwise.

I used black jersey fabric because it goes very nicely with the standard UMass maroon. These strips will form the band that will go around the top of your shirt.

Unpin the rectangles from before and lay each one flat on your work surface, with the right side facing you. Now take one of your folded strips and pin it across the top of the shirt, with the raw edge of the strip lined up with the raw edge of the rectangle (see second image on the right).

Now take to your sewing machine (or bust out your needle and thread) and sew along the line of pins, removing them as you sew. After you have sewn the strip onto the rectangle, flip it up so the raw edges are no longer exposed, and sew a line (see third image).

Repeat these two steps to the other rectangle with your other fabric strip.

With both pieces done, place one on top of the other with the right sides facing in. Pin the sides back together – just the sides, not the top – and sew them together, again taking pins out as you sew.

After you sew up the sides, slip the top on, keeping it inside-out. If you like the way it fits, mark the spots on the front and back where you want your straps to go (or you can leave it as-is and rock it as a tube top). If you don't like the way it fits, pin up the sides (while you're wearing it – you may want to ask a friend to help) to your desired fit. Make sure you start pinning at either the top or the bottom so everything stays lined up properly.

After you find your desired fit, sew along your pinned line, removing pins as you sew, and put it on inside out to mark where you want your straps to be attached.

To make your straps, cut two pieces of bias tape to your desired strap length (this is very often right around the length of your bra straps). Before attaching the bias tape to the shirt, carefully sew the opening in the fold together using your sewing machine or hand-stitching skills.

My machine has a lot of different stitch options, so I used a cute one that looks like a vine with leaves on it for a little additional detail. After running these strips through the machine, sew them to the spots you've marked on your shirt.

Now, you're done! All that's left is rocking your creation campus side!

Ellie Rulon-Miller can be reached at erulonmi@student.umass.edu

Before getting started on creating your shirt, lay it down on a flat surface, like a floor or table.

Be sure to line up the raw edge of the one of the folded strips with the raw edge of the rectangle.

After sewing the strip onto the rectangle, flip it upright so the raw edges are not visible and sew a line.

English singer-songwriter shows emotion, looks ahead

circumstances – like settling down in a relationship ("Look No Further") or having a child ("Us 2 Little Gods") – contain their own small deaths, as other possibilities are put aside.

"'Look No Further' is a prime example of something where I want to express something really simple and pure and beautiful, but I also can't help myself having a little bit of doubt," Dido said. "And a song about something absolutely devastating can be uplifting and hopeful as well. 'Grafton Street' is an example of that. It's definitely a sad song, but there's something in there for me which is talking in such a loving way about something devastating because that's how I felt. There's always a bit of both for me, and that's what I find exciting about the world."

"Grafton Street" is a masterstroke, and it even risks not being subtle – its climax comes via a near-psychedelic multi-tracked recorder solo. Dido learned the unfashionable instrument as a child and playing it "felt like home," she said. She wrote the song with another inspirational friend – veteran producer and artist Brian Eno, whose 1975 album "Another Green World" offered solace during her father's last days.

"You know how you get those albums that are so emotional but comforting?" she said. "Almost like a safe place to be, you know? Around the time that Dad was dying, that's what I was listening to. And I thought, God, I'd love to do some writing with Brian Eno."

The sessions with Eno, whom Dido had known casually for years, yielded several songs. She's keeping them, with many others, in a stash for future release. Meanwhile, she's planning to tour small spaces with her band, and even to get behind the drum kit once in a while.

"I'd actually love to be in a band at some point," she said. "The thing that would excite me next, to learn more, would be to play for someone else while they're singing. That would be a whole other step. It would be really interesting."

Dido, who was born and raised in England, tunes into her heart and soul, putting forth more emotion into the lyrics of her latest album, "Safe Trip Home."

Mapmaker's intriguing mystery

DAVID BROWN
THE WASHINGTON POST

WASHINGTON — How was it that a German priest writing in Latin and living in a French city far from the coast became the first person to tell the world that a vast ocean lay to the west of the American continents?

This is one of the bigger mysteries in the history of the Renaissance.

But it is not the only one involving Martin Waldseemueller, a map-making cleric whose own story is sufficiently obscure that his birth and death dates aren't known for certain.

Waldseemueller appears to have also known something about the contours of South America's west coast years before Vasco Nunez de Balboa crossed the Isthmus of Panama and Ferdinand Magellan sailed around the bottom of the continent. History books record them as the first Europeans to bring back knowledge of the Pacific Ocean.

The evidence of this knowledge is in Waldseemueller's world map of 1507, perhaps the most valuable of the 5 million maps owned by the Library of Congress. It was acquired for $10 million in 2003 and went on permanent display last year.

The map – in near-perfect condition and with no other known copies – is the oldest document that applies the label "America" to the land mass between Africa and Asia.

This was, of course, in honor of Amerigo Vespucci, a Florentine navigator who had sailed to the New World for the Portuguese. (His first name was Latinized to "Americus" and then feminized to "America.") The act of naming was apparently Waldseemueller's alone; there is no evidence that the term was in use at the time.

New research by John Hessler of the Library of Congress has made the mystery of Waldseemueller's knowledge deeper and richer. But it hasn't answered the biggest question: How did he know?

"There is some probability that Waldseemueller knew something that is no longer extant – information that we don't have," Hessler said.

The researcher, 48, brings a diverse set of skills to the task. He took Latin all through parochial school and college (at Villanova University) and reads the language fluently. He is an engineer by training and is equally fluent in the mathematics of cartography.

In a new book, "The Naming of America," Hessler provides the first published translation of the map's text blocks. He has also done a modern translation of Waldseemueller's book, "Cosmographiae Introductio," printed in 1507 in St. Die, France, where the cartographer was canon of the cathedral. Although Waldseemueller gets most of the credit for the map and the book, he had a collaborator, an Alsatian named Matthias Ringmann, who died in 1511.

In the largest block of text on the map, Waldseemueller writes that many things remained unknown to the ancients "in no slight degree; for instance, in the west, America, named after its discoverer, which is now known to be a fourth part of the world."

In "Cosmographiae," he uses similar language: "The earth is now known to be divided into four parts. The first three parts are continents, but the fourth part is an island, because it has been found to be surrounded on all sides by sea."

Hessler said he thinks the phrases "now known" and "has been found to be" are crucial. They suggest geographical knowledge that is confirmed and believed, at least in some circles.

"The idea that this was a total guess is far-fetched," he said.

The people who knew were most likely Portuguese explorers (or at least sailed under the Portuguese flag). It was valuable, and most likely secret, knowledge. How it got to a priest-cartographer working under the patronage of the duke of Lorraine is a good question.

Equally intriguing is the shape of South America.

Inscribed along the western edge of that land mass in the 1507 map are the words "terra ultra incognita" – land most unknown. But the border is not drawn as one long, ignorantly straight line. Instead, it is a series of straight lines meeting at shallow angles, implying a mixture of knowledge and uncertainty.

Using a technique called "polynomial warping," Hessler re-projected the image and compared Waldseemueller's continent with the real one.

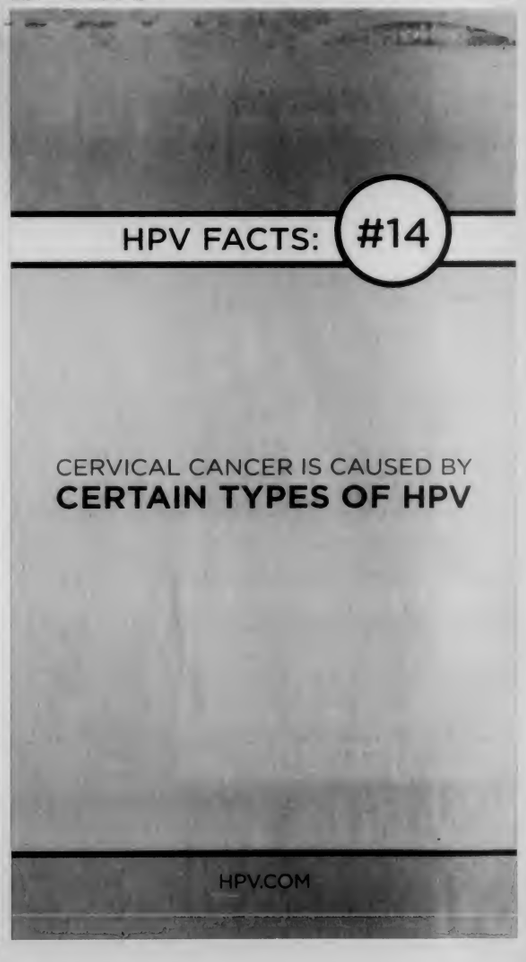
There are many differences, of course. But the correlation is about 75 percent, and at two important places – near the equator and near the place in northern Chile where the coast veers sharply northwesterly – the width of Waldseemueller's South America and the actual one are almost the same.

Things were perhaps not as ultra incognita as he let on.

That is not the end of the strangeness, however.

In the large text block on the map, Waldseemueller requests "that those who are inexperienced and unacquainted with cosmography shall not condemn all this before they have learned what will surely be clearer to them later on, when they have come to understand it."

It is a plea. He knows his map is asking a lot.



In 1516, Waldseemueller published his second great map, called the Carta Marina. It shows South America no longer as an island. The continent disappears off the left of the page, implying it is attached to Asia, which is on the right edge.

Hessler has provided the first English translations of the second map's text blocks. In one of them, Waldseemueller says: "We will seem to you reader, to have diligently presented and shown a representation of the world previously, which was filled with error, wonder and confusion. ... Our previous representation pleased very few people, as we have lately come to understand."

Was this a retraction? It sounds like it. Was a continental America heresy? Hessler said he has found no reason to think it was. So why would Waldseemueller change his new view of the world to an older one?

That's just one more mys-

level, it seemed as if the primary starter from a year ago would be fighting for playing time.

However, Meyer's early struggles in the Minutemen's 9-5 win over Providence opened a window for Dainton's return to the crease for the Minutemen – and he hasn't looked back.

Against BU and UML, Dainton allowed only three goals while accumulating 52 saves - 30 of those saves came against the Terriers as Dainton and the Minutemen defense limited one of the nation's best offenses to a single goal. For his performance, Dainton earned UMass/Dinn. Bros. Athlete of the Week.

In five games this season, Dainton has allowed six goals while posting a 3-2 record. His 1.30 goals-against average ranks sixth in the nation. Meanwhile, his .948 save percentage is fifth.

PENALTY STREAK KILLED

Before their game against the River Hawks, the Minutemen have killed 29 consecutive powers plays. However, during the third period, the River Hawks' Scott Campbell scored while on the man advantage. The goal was only the third of the season against the UMass penalty kill unit.

The unit consists of a rotation at forward with senior captain Cory Quirk and senior Alex Berry switching with junior captain Brett Watson and senior Chris Davis. On defense, junior Justin Braun, junior Martin Nolet, senior John Weissbecker and senior Topher Bevis take the majority of minutes with a man down.

UMass, which boasts one of the best penalty killing units in Hockey East, has defended their penalties at a rate of .921 this season, allowing only three goals on 38 opportunities.

Improvements made

Fischer, Zan lead UMass in NCAA regional qualifier

BY STAVEN LEVINE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Minutemen and women traveled to Bronx, N.Y., on Saturday to compete in the NCAA cross country regional qualifier. Both teams made substantial improvements from last year, as the men jumped four spots to seventh while the women gained six spots to 22nd. Senior leader Nils Fischer completed the race at the helm for the Minutemen, finishing 29th overall. Sophomore standout Shiyi Zan led the Minutewomen, finishing 18th overall.

Zan's time of 22:07.9 was very strong, as she bested fellow Minutewoman Karen Rea by over a minute in the 6k. Rea, a freshman, finished next on the roster with a time of 23:35.3, placing her at 94th, respectively. Completing the top five scoring for the Minutewomen were freshman Claire Pettit, sophomore Kristen Darling, and senior Taryn Happ. Pettit's time of 24:01.6 was good for 110th, Darling's time of 24:48.1 for 171st, and Trapp's time of 24:51.6 for 175th. Providence, ranked first coming into Saturday's contest, finished first with 36 points.

Women's head coach Julie Lefreniere believed her young team could have done a bit better.

"I think we probably could've placed somewhere around 18th if everybody had their best race. We have a very young team though, and losing Dina Perno to injury right before the race definitely hurt. Next year I'm expecting to see the team jump from 22nd to the top twelve as they mature."

The long, arduous season contained many special moments, which begs the question: what was coach Lefreniere's favorite?

"My favorite moment was at the A-10 Championships, when our team was finally completely healthy, and we competed well. I like the dedication and desire my team has to be good. I think we have a really nice group of ladies, and I'm looking forward to next year when everything hopefully can fall into place."

On the men's side, their seventh place finish was highlighted by Nils Fischer and Jonathan Pierce. The 10K race had Fischer finishing first for the Minutemen with a time of 32:52.4, and Pierce two seconds and two spots behind him, at 32:54.7. Capping off the scoring were senior Jesse Regnier, sophomore Kevin Johnson, and junior Andrew Mulvaney. Regnier's time of 33:18.7 was good for 51st, Johnson's for 57th, and Mulvaney's time of 33:45.3 for 70th. Iona, also ranked first coming into the contest, finished first with 46 points.

Men's head coach Ken O'Brien also believed his team could've fared for a better finish.

"The poll actually polled us at finishing seventh, but I felt as though maybe we could've done a little better, maybe as high as fourth of fifth. I'm a little disappointed, we had some ups and downs all season, it definitely wasn't straightforward, but I am proud of my team."

The A-10 victory was perhaps the shining moment for the team, and Coach O'Brien couldn't agree more.

"Winning the A-10 conference meet in North Carolina was my favorite moment, were there were three or four other teams that certainly could've won it. It was one of those races where every person's time counts. The kids worked real hard for that, and I'm glad they were rewarded."

Tie comes as surprise even to veterans

Akers still dependable in Philly, Curtis back from injury

LES BROWN
PHILADELPHIA DAILY NEWS

PHILADELPHIA — What Andy Reid said on Monday was right. Donovan McNabb admitting he was surprised to find out there wasn't going to be a second overtime in Cincinnati had no impact on the 13-13 tie between the Eagles and the Bengals.

Problem is, that isn't quite the issue. The issue is cluelessness, the sort of vague, disconnected fog that McNabb seems to emanate these days. The issue, as colleague Sean McCann of the Courier-Post in South Jersey put it, while we were trooping into NovaCare on Monday, is that "McNabb sees himself as just a passenger on the bus. The fans want him to be driving the bus. Peyton Manning drives the bus. Tom Brady drives the bus."

I said something along those lines, though I didn't frame it as well, after last month's loss to the Redskins that I wanted to see McNabb take ownership of the situation, and the team. He more or less did that through the next three wins, more in San Francisco, less against the Falcons and Seahawks. Now, the Birds seem rudderless again, and a quarterback who doesn't know the game is about to end as overtime licks away is the perfect symbol of that.

A McNabb spokesman said Monday that the QB did not want to make a clarifying statement, and that he agrees he should have known the rule. I think McNabb – who compounded his problem by musing about what would happen at the end of OT in the playoffs or the Super Bowl, unaware of the obvious fact that those games could not end in a tie – probably understands now that he will be part of overtime lore for a very long time. (In the same way that before every overtime coin toss, somebody brings up Marty Mornhinweg, who famously opted not to take the ball as Detroit's head coach.)

"I think that's absurd," Reid said Monday, when asked about the McNabb criticism. "You play to win in that time, whether you think you have another overtime period or you don't ... He threw a beautiful 'Hail Mary' (on the final snap). I don't think that had any effect on the game."

McNabb's problems, and the Eagles' problems, go way beyond arcane OT rules. McNabb wasn't the only Eagle on the sideline who didn't know the game could end in a tie. Most teams, you figure there would be a coach or coaches gathering their guys, discussing scenarios. Somehow it isn't a surprise that on Reid's sideline, that didn't happen.

Communication. Chemistry. Leadership. All reasons why a team that ought to be a contender isn't.

DEVELOPING STORY LINES

Donovan McNabb seems to want to make Kevin Curtis his go-to guy again, now that Curtis is recovered from sports-hernia surgery, but the timing just isn't there. Sunday, if McNabb wasn't surprising Curtis with a back-shoulder throw that bounced away and was picked off, Curtis was brick-handing a well-thrown ball because the receiver was looking upfield instead of focusing on the catch. Curtis still caught a team-high seven passes, for 64 yards, but he might have been the intended receiver for twice that many throws.

Hey, at least David Akers is straightened out. Akers hit through a biting Cincinnati wind for field goals of 42 and 27 yards. He has made good on 12 attempts in a row, last missing on the blocked try in San Francisco, which wasn't Akers' fault. Akers is 4-for-5 this season from 40-49 yards.

Jim Johnson was prescient last week when he fretted about his corners not picking off many balls. Ryan Fitzpatrick launched quite a few floaters among his 44 passes, but the Eagles couldn't take advantage. Frankly, three picks isn't that many for Asante Samuel, given that he jumps the route instead of defending the man at every opportunity, flirting with disaster. And you'd think $57 million would buy you an occasional decent attempt at tackling.

WHO KNEW?

That the NFL didn't go to a shoot-out following the 15-minute overtime?

(This query submitted by a Mr. D. McNabb of Moorestown, N.J.)

OBSCURE STAT

The Bengals managed 79 yards on interception returns, more than either team gained rushing in the 75-minute game.

EXTRA POINT

Sixty called pass plays Sunday. 58 throws and two sacks. Eighteen run attempts.

Even for an Andy Reid team, this is absurd. What gives?

Two explanations on Monday, one of them made sense. In the NovaCare auditorium, Reid asserted that he went into the Cincinnati game thinking the Bengals were more vulnerable to the pass than to the run (even though Cincinnati entered the game 10th against the pass and 25th against the run).

A more plausible explanation appeared a few minutes later, when Eagles players began gathering to review film. Brian Westbrook shuffled down the hallway like Fred Sanford intent on upbraiding Lamont. Westbrook's left knee and his right ankle were wrapped. His progress seemed more halting on the ankle than the knee, but clearly, neither was pain-free.

"I'm a little sore today," Westbrook said, the day after he accounted for just 71 total yards against the Bengals, in a 75-minute game. Westbrook's 60 rushing yards on 14 carries were a bit misleading: he had 6 yards on four carries at halftime, then hit on a couple of draws that badly fooled the Bengals in the second half. However hobbled Westbrook might be, he can still scamper through a huge hole. But I'm not at all sure he can dart and cut back and leverage a loss into a gain, the way he did last season, in setting a franchise record with 2,104 yards from scrimmage.

Even as a pass receiver, Westbrook sees only the occasional screen these days: nothing downfield. Westbrook's receiving yardage high this season is 51, on six catches, vs. Washington. Westbrook averaged 51.4 receiving yards a game last season.

I think when all this is over, we will find out Westbrook has been playing at way less than 100 percent. Which still doesn't explain why you can't run a little with Correll Buckhalter, who is averaging 4.1 yards per carry, the same as Westbrook this season. Asked about Buckhalter on Monday, Reid said: "Trying to get Brian going is what you're trying to do."

under him as an assistant at Memphis for eight years, were honored by the crowd.

"Absolutely. It felt great," Kellogg said about getting a standing ovation from the crowd of 18,254 at the FedEx Forum. "It felt like they appreciated the eight years of service I gave to the Memphis program and the university. It was kind of surreal walking out, seeing all sorts of family, friends and former players out here. But when the game got started you kind of forget you're at the FedEx Forum."

Despite the poor shooting (20-for-66, 30 percent) and 23 turnovers, Kellogg was mostly pleased with his team's effort against a much more physical and talented team.

"To come over as banged up as we are, as inexperienced as we are, putting in a new system and really expecting to win may be a little farfetched," Kellogg said. "But I did expect for us to compete and play hard, and I thought at times – maybe not for the full 40 minutes – but for 30 minutes of the game we did compete."

UMass has a full week off before its home opener Nov. 24 against Jacksonville State. Bonner isn't expected back until mid-December, and Kellogg didn't seem optimistic after the game that Hill will be available anytime soon.

"From all indications, it wasn't real good what happened to him tonight. He may have torn his Achilles [tendon] again," Kellogg said.

GAME NOTES

Memphis finished 2-of-19 from 3-point range in the game (10.5 percent). UMass was 20-8 percent (5-of-24). The score was 9-9 eight minutes into the game, with the teams combining for 7-of-33 (21 percent) from the field and 1-of-11 from long range. UMass turned the ball over on six straight possessions midway through the first half, leading to a Memphis run which pushed the lead to 26-16. Only four different players (Harris, Gaffney, Lowe and Anthony Gurley) scored in the first half for UMass.

his fault because the pocket collapsed behind him and he didn't see the oncoming rusher and was blindsided, fumbling the ball on his way down to the ground. But, during a must-win game, giving up four interceptions is unacceptable.

UMass running back Tony Nelson provided the only bright spot, not only the offense but for the Minutemen as a team. The redshirt junior ran for 154 yards on 22 carries and scored a touchdown while averaging 6.4 yards per rush.

Nelson surpassed the 1,000-yard plateau for the season, the seventh straight time the Minutemen boasted a 1,000-yard rusher.

FORGOTTEN D

Once the staple of the Massachusetts football team, the UMass defense is now the weakest link. In its past, the defense has sported hard-hitting, tough nosed defenders that have, in the Minutemen's last three losses, surrendered 526, 296 and 184 yards rushing, respectively. The defensive line is non-existent, letting opposing offensive linemen have their way, carving holes, letting their running backs reach the UMass secondary more often than not.

With a less than formidable front seven, the Minutemen were forced to pick up more yardage to support the run stopping effort. In doing so the front defense, which has been suffering for the past few weeks due to the injury of cornerback Sean Smith, has handicapped further.

Despite moving two more players to the hard-hitting Jeromy Miles up near or beside the linebackers the UMass running defense has continued to struggle. Its opponents have taken control of the clock and the kept the ball out of the Minutemen hands, which, until Saturday, was solid.

The UMass passing defense hasn't performed on the same level as the run defense, but part of the reason is the game plan opposing coaches come in with facing the Minutemen. They know UMass has poor run support which forces most of their plays are set up to exploit the weakness.

The Minutemen have allowed 295.1 and 307 yards passing in their last three games, respectable numbers albeit the last three opponents have had far more rushing attempts.

Big presence proposes problem for UM

Recruiting strength, turnover weakness for Minutemen

BY JEFFREY R. LARNARD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts basketball team has a hole in its game. A big hole.

That hole is the presence of a big man down low. Last week when UMass (1-2) played Southern Illinois in the 2K Sports Classic, the Minutemen took a blow when center Luke Bonner went down with an injury. The senior is expected to miss about a month with a strain of his medial collateral ligament.

During Monday's loss to No. 13 Memphis, UMass took another hit when forward Matt Hill went down as well. The 6-foot-7, 210-pound sophomore is believed to have torn his Achilles tendon. Hill was supposed to see a doctor on Tuesday and, if he has torn his Achilles, he is expected to be out for the season.

The Minutemen still have senior Tony Gaffney who came up big in the national spotlight, scoring 16 points to go with his 19 rebounds and five blocks. But the forward cannot do it all for UMass. The Tigers attacked UMass in the paint on Tuesday, scoring 52 of their 80 points in the paint.

Filling in for Bonner has been freshman Tyrell Lynch, who has dealt with foul trouble through two games. Against Memphis, Lynch had two fouls on him through the first half and then quickly got two more within 2 minutes, 10 seconds into the second half. Lynch leads the team in fouls through three games with 12 despite only playing 55 minutes.

RECRUITING TRAIL

UMass Basketball

Derek Kellogg was known for his recruiting abilities at Memphis, and it appears he didn't just do it by selling the success of Memphis.

While at Memphis, Kellogg was credited with recruiting Derrick Rose. Rose, who was the No. 1 overall pick in last year's NBA draft by the Chicago Bulls, led the Tigers last year to the National Championship game last year. While he may not be bringing in someone of Rose's caliber, Kellogg has signed a top 100 recruit.

Just a few hours before the Minutemen took on Memphis, UMass announced the signing of 6-foot-5, 175-pound, Freddie Riley. The guard out of Florida is ranked as the 87th best according to scout.com and ESPN has him rated at 89 on a scale of 100.

Riley is the second recruit that Kellogg has signed to a national letter of intent. The first was 6-foot-5, 190-pound Javorn Farrell who is out of Maryland.

Kellogg has also brought three transfers to UMass. The first, forward-center Hashim Bailey, who Kellogg brought with him from Memphis. The junior stands tall at 6-foot-10 and weighs 275-pound and will be a much needed big man. Another forward-center is Sean Carter out of Oregon State. Carter is a class below Bailey, but not as big. Carter weighs in at 225 and is 6-foot-9. The last is Doug Wiggins who transferred from Connecticut, a 6-foot-1, 160-pound junior.

GIVING IT AWAY

In UMass' previous two games, one thing has been the Minutemen's downfall: their turnovers.

Tuesday night against Memphis UMass turned the ball over 24 times, led by guards Chris Lowe and Anthony Gurley, who each had five. The 24 turnovers turned into 26 points for the Tigers, including 17 in the first half.

UMass turned the ball over fewer times in the previous game against Southern Illinois, 20, but 10 of them came from Lowe also had no assists in the contest. The Salukis turned the 20 turnovers into 26 points. Eighteen of the points off turnovers came in the second half where SIU overcame an 11 point deficit to advance in the 2K Sports Classic.

New game plan spells win for Minutewomen

By Nick O'Malley
Collegian Staff

When the Massachusetts women's basketball team went to the locker room at halftime Sunday, they found themselves with a 19-point deficit to a Manhattan team that they expected to blowout.

The Minutewomen's sloppy play was reminiscent of a year ago when the team averaged 18 turnovers per contest over the course of 30 games. If Sunday's game is any indication, UMass will have to limit their mistakes this season if they want to outplay their low expectations.

The Minutewomen (1-1) struggled to get any consistency in their offense against Manhattan, committing 17 turnovers while making only 11 shots in the first half.

The team's shoddy first-half play had UMass coach Marnie Dacko and her staff searching for answers.

"I was stunned," Dacko said after the game. "We had 17 turnovers the first half, unforced turnovers. Trying too hard, not coming game ready – I think that maybe our team didn't respect Manhattan, and that's not coming from the coaching staff."

Turnovers told the tale of the game for the Minutewomen as their performance waned as their giveaways increased. UMass finished the game with 24 turnovers – including 10 traveling violations.

"We just played like crap in the first half, there's really no other way to explain it," senior Stefanie Gerardot said. "I don't even think half of our team was even here in this game with us."

The problems were only compounded by the Minutewomen when, just under two minutes into the second half, sophomore Teya Wright left the game with a minor injury.

However, just when the Minutewomen were put into their worst spot of the game, the turnovers that plagued them in the first half gave way to crisp passing and ball movement.

Dacko attributed the team's turnaround to the players changing their mindset and focusing.

"I think the one word is intensity," Dacko said. "I think just playing intense and focus and seeing the next pass and being able to execute with a purpose. We were trying to make plays rather than just run around with no purpose and I think that makes the difference."

With an offense that improved in passing and execution, UMass stormed back from their halftime deficit by limiting their second half turnovers to seven.

The Minutewomen outscored the Jaspers 46-24 in the second half to finish with a last-second 71-68 victory.

The difference in the game, though, was the halftime adjustments for the Minutewomen. In the first half, UMass failed to produce any momentum on offense and failed to stop Manhattan on defense.

In the second half, the Minutewomen looked like a completely different team. Even with Wright out of the lineup, UMass established an inside presence as sophomore Valerie Adebe stepped up in her first minutes of collegiate playing time.

With the arrival of coach Derek Kellogg to the Massachusetts men's basketball team, Dacko decided to incorporate Kellogg's dribble-drive motion offense to her team.

In the first half, though, the Minutewomen, with 10 traveling violations in the game, showed trouble dribbling in addition to failing to drive and control the paint.

Despite being dominated by the Jaspers on the scoreboard in the first half, the Minutewomen were only beaten badly in turnovers and 3-point shooting. In fact, UMass had the higher field goal percentage heading in to the second half.

The Minutewomen continued to shoot the ball well in the second half, shooting 53.1 percent from the field while the Jaspers were limited to 32 percent shooting.

"We picked it up, got our heads on the same page and played to our potential," Gerardot said of the team's second-half play. "We should have blown the team out of the water but we at least came back and won. That's all that matters."

UMass can't solve problems in time

Offense and defense contribute to Minutemen downfall

By Ryan Fleming
Collegian Staff

It's now official. Massachusetts football team is eliminated from the playoffs. With their loss to New Hampshire Saturday, the Minutemen can only play this weekend's game with motivation to win based on pride and pride alone.

UMass (6-5, 3-4 Colonial Athletic Association) was touched, losing 52-21 and found themselves in a 31-0 hole near the start of the second quarter. The Minutemen defense was nonexistent allowing 621 yards of total offense.

UMass Football

The Minutemen offense was just as miserable – turning the ball over six times, four from Liam Coen interceptions and two fumbles.

UMass enters Saturday's contest with Hofstra (4-7, 2-5 CAA) losing three out of its last five games and with its only motivation being to end the season on a high note.

Offensive crisis

There was an offensive meltdown last Saturday against the Wildcats (8-2, 5-2 CAA). Coen threw four interceptions and coughed up a fumble, personally giving the ball back to the UNH offense five times.

Coen's fumble wasn't completely

ESPN to televise five A-10 games before December

By Holly J. Galvin
Collegian Staff

Unranked Rhode Island came approximately 40 seconds away from a would-be monumental upset Sunday, nearly becoming only the fifth non-ranked opponent ever to beat No. 5 Duke at Cameron Indoor Stadium.

But despite leading the Blue Devils in shooting percentage from the floor (59.3-58.6 percent), three-point shooting percentage (71.4-23.5) and rebounds (31-29), URI lost 82-79.

Led by eight second-half 3-pointers from senior guard Jimmy Baron, URI controlled much of the momentum and led heading into the final minute of play.

Instead, Duke twice proved its capability to ramp up play in clutch situations, mounting an 11-0 run to end the first half and clinching the game in the final minute of play with two key free throws from reigning ACC Rookie of the Year Kyle Singler.

Singler was tightly guarding Baron, URI's leading scorer, when Baron narrowly missed a potentially game-winning jumper with 4.9 seconds left.

Christmas boosts Temple

On the wings of a preseason All-American candidate, Temple has compiled a 2-1 record to begin its Atlantic 10 title defense.

Senior guard Dionte Christmas recently became one of only two players in the A-10 and 50 players nationwide to receive a John R. Wooden All-American Player of the Year nomination.

A–10 Basketball

The Philadelphia native, who led the conference with 19.7 points per game last season, could become the first three-peat scoring champion in A-10 history. After totaling 26 points in each of the Owls' first two wins and launching a comeback that nearly defeated perennial powerhouse Syracuse, Christmas took home the eighth A-10 Player of the Week honor of his career.

Temple's close 76-72 loss to Syracuse in the Charleston Classic final capped an early run in which the Owls defeated the College of Charleston, 70-65, and East Tennessee State, 79-65.

This week's conference MVP nod seals Christmas into an elite group of only three other players in A-10 history to earn as many. The 12th all-time Temple scoring leader will need two more selections to overtake UMass legend Marcus Camby's total of nine in order to move into the top three, and six more to become the leading A-10 Weekly MVP of all-time. Former Xavier star David West currently holds that distinction.

Brown, Xavier roll to 3-0 Start

Xavier junior Derrick Brown joins Temple's Christmas as the other A-10 preseason All-American nominated for the Wooden Player of the Year Award. The nominations, announced last week in Los Angeles, selected 50 players from 13 different conferences nationwide and narrowed an early field for the most prestigious individual award in college basketball.

Brown leads a hungry and thus far undefeated Xavier squad coming off of an Elite 8 appearance and school-record 30 wins during the 2007-08 campaign. In early action the Musketeers have defeated three teams in the Puerto Rico Tipoff: Findlay (79-76), Toledo (81-65) and Indiana-Purdue Fort Wayne (71-41).

XU was voted by league coaches to finish first in the preseason A-10 poll.

Xavier was ranked 19th in October's Sporting News Top 40 poll that also saw A-10 representation with Saint Joseph's coming in at No. 32 and Temple at No. 38.

Televised Action

ESPN will feature five nationally televised A-10 games within the next month. Next Monday and Tuesday (Nov. 25-26) viewers can see Saint Joseph's vs. Indiana-Notre Dame and Saint Joseph's at the Maui Invitational, times TBA. The A-10's official release notes that ESPN may switch these broadcasts to ESPN2 or ESPNU, depending on previous game outcomes.

December's featured A-10 action includes two matinee games on Saturday, Dec. 13, both slated for the ESPN channel: Tennessee vs. Temple (12:00 p.m.) and UMass at Kansas (2:00 p.m.).

Memphis proves too much to handle

Too many turnovers, missed opportunities doom UMass

BY ELI ROSENSWAIKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Massachusetts men's basketball coach Derek Kellogg wished he could have cloned Tony Gaffney Monday night against No. 12 Memphis.

Anyone big enough to battle with the Tigers inside would have been just fine, as a thin UMass frontcourt couldn't contend in an 80-58 loss to Memphis against former UMass coach and Kellogg mentor John Calipari at the FedEx Forum in Memphis, Tenn.

"I just want to say how unbelievable I thought Tony Gaffney played tonight 16 points, 19 rebounds and five blocks - we just needed one more Tony Gaffney out there, a guy who could do all the little things," Kellogg said after the game.

The Minutemen played without 7-foot-1 starting center Luke Bonner (sprained knee) and lost 6-foot-7 reserve forward Matt Hill (left leg) early in the second half.

| UMass | 58 |

The Tigers made UMass pay downlow, scoring 52 points in the paint.

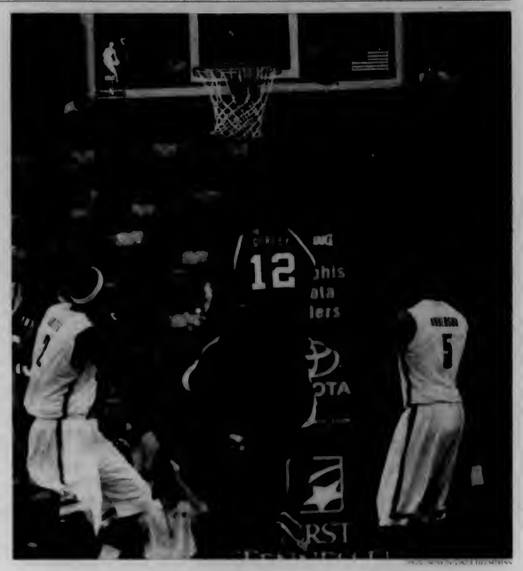
"Boy I'll tell you, I thought we were thin before the season started with anyone 6-foot-6 or over. Calling all students, calling all students," Kellogg joked.

Both teams struggled from the floor and with turnovers, but UMass' 23 giveaways led to a 24-4 Memphis edge in points off turnovers - and the easy Memphis victory.

The Minutemen (1-2) made it tough on the Tigers (2-0) defensively, keeping the game close - and even jumping out to an early lead - before entering halftime down 33-25. But Memphis' talent and athleticism came out in the second half as the Minutemen wore down physically.

"I thought we did a great job in the first half. If the ball had bounced the right way a few times, it could have been a little closer," Kellogg said. "Memphis is a really long, talented and athletic team - they go 10-11 [players] deep and all those guys are top 50 high school players, let's call it the way it is."

Gaffney's stellar performance on both ends of the floor and Ricky Harris' 12 first-half points kept UMass in the game entering the break. Even with 15 turnovers in the first 20 minutes, UMass was down just eight points thanks to 34.2 percent shooting from Memphis, including 1-of-11 from 3-point range.



"There were some things on the turnover part that I just couldn't believe we did. It's what gave the game away," Kellogg said.

Memphis shot better in the second half to pull away, led by the 19 points from freshman sensation Tyreke Evans. Robert Dozier added 18 points and Antonio Anderson had a double-double with 15 points and 12 rebounds.

UMass point guard Chris Lowe struggled for the second straight game, scoring just five points on 2-of-8 shooting. Lowe, who had 10 turnovers and no assists in his last game against Southern Illinois, had three assists and five turnovers.

With the victory, Calipari became the all-time winningest coach at Memphis with 221, eclipsing the previous mark set by Larry Finch. But both Calipari and Kellogg, who played under Calipari at UMass and served

Minutewomen look to keep momentum rolling after win

UM takes on New Hampshire tonight at the Mullins Center

BY DAVID BRINCH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After a dramatic 24-point comeback in its home opening win against Manhattan on Sunday, the Massachusetts women's basketball team looks to make it two in a row when it takes on New Hampshire tonight at 7 p.m. at the Mullins Center.

UNH lost to Bryant last Friday, 69-66, the Wildcats 2008-2009 season opener. Although leading for most of the game, the Bulldogs regained the lead with 42 seconds left in regulation when Courtney Schermerhorn hit two free throws to break the 64-64 tie.

The Wildcats also were defeated in an exhibition by Bentley, 70-55, on November 9th.

Senior guard Sakera Young hit one-of-two free throws to seal the second-half comeback by the Minutewomen, as UMass went on to win, 71-68.

"I think it's a great moral boost and learning is a lot easier with a win then with loss," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "Hopefully our kids can make some adjustments and learn from the game in a positive way and so we don't put ourselves in this position again."

Despite back-to-back losses, UNH will look to freshman guard Kelsey Hogan to get the Wildcats their first victory of the season, and the Maroon and White will look to tighten up their defense against the visiting squad.

The Nashua native was named the America East Rookie of the Week after scoring a game-high 20 points on 7-for-14 shooting against the Bulldogs in her collegiate debut. Hogan grabbed eight rebounds while giving out four assists, leading UNH in both categories and put the Wildcats within one point with a lay-up with 24 seconds left in the game.

UNH enters the 2008-2009 campaign with a new head coach and an assistant coach that has ties to the Minutewomen program. Head coach Kristin Cole comes to the Wildcats after serving as an assistant at Xavier from 2002 to 2007, while assistant coach and UMass alum Katie Nelson also is new to the staff.

Nelson is currently the Minutewomen all-time leader in career 3-point field goals made (191) and assist-to-turnover ratio (1.36).

UMass has seen impressive play from senior guard Stefanie Gerardot, who leads the team with six steals while averaging 26.5 points and 7.5 rebounds per game.

Along with the veteran leadership in the back court, the Minutewomen has seen production from their young forwards, with sophomore Teya Wright averaging ten points and eight rebounds a game, while sophomore Valerie Adebie played a big part in the Minutewomen's comeback against the Jaspers on Sunday.

"She's a great defensive player, and when she doesn't think she's good," Dacko said. "She can defend and jump with anybody, and she played with a lot of determination and heart."

UNH is the second America East team that UMass has faced so far this season, as Vermont defeated the Minutewomen in their season opener, 83-69, on Nov. 14th.

Gerardot, Wright and Young each had career high point totals in the loss to the Catamounts and hope to come out with the same offensive production against the Wildcats.

The Minutewomen have a 15-12 lead in the all-time series against UNH, which dates back to the 1974-75 season, with both teams facing each other more than once a year.

The last meeting between UNH and UMass was in 2006, a game in which the Minutewomen fell 59-43 in Durham. Tough competitive play has defined the all-time series, with three games being decided in overtime in which the Wildcats have won two games.

Hockey East proves to be strong force

Minutemen move up four spots in most recent poll

BY NICK O'MALLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Despite its loss to UMass-Lowell on Saturday, the Massachusetts hockey team's win over then-No. 1 Boston University was enough to move to team up in the USCHO.com/CBS College Sports Poll rankings from the No. 20 spot to No. 16.

The Minutemen's new ranking marks the team's highest position of the season since beginning the season unranked.

After facing the top team in the country, the Minutemen will be facing off against another one of the nation's top teams in defending national champion Boston College.

The No. 4 Eagles, Minutemen and No. 2 Terriers are three of the six Hockey East teams included in the top 20 poll. No. 6 Northeastern, No. 13 New Hampshire and No. 15 Vermont round out the ranked teams while UML and Maine received votes.

With only two teams not mentioned in the polls (Providence and Merrimack), the Minutemen will be facing some of the nation's top teams every week as they continue in conference play in the latter parts of the season.

The second half of the season will be key for the Minutemen this year. In 2007, the team began to struggle after the Holidays. In what UMass coach Don Cahoon calls "the men's league," the Minutemen must flourish where they floundered a year ago if they are going to get home ice in the Hockey East tournament this season.

UMass Hockey

LEAGUE INCONSISTENCIES

UMass' victory over BU is the team's second win over a top-5 team this season. The Minutemen defeated then-No. 4 North Dakota as part of the Ice Breaker Invitational at BU on Oct. 11.

The top ranked teams, however, have not been the problem for UMass this season. The Minutemen are 2-1-1 against ranked teams this season. It has been the middle-of-the-road teams that have bested the Minutemen.

Against Hockey East foes Merrimack (3-5, 1-4 Hockey East) and UMass Lowell (5-4, 3-2 Hockey East), UMass was defeated by a combined score of 5-1.

In both games, the Minutemen were coming off great performances. A week before playing at Merrimack, UMass swept Providence while the loss to UML was a day after the Minutemen upset BU.

The conditions for both matchups received part of the blame for the loss. Merrimack, which is known for its small playing surface, has caused problems for UMass over the years. Against the River Hawks at home, though, the humid conditions in the Mullins Center led to soft ice - making the puck bounce unexpectedly and slow down the usually quick skating Minutemen.

Pay differences for UM profs.

BY TINA LAGERSTEDT

Some University of Massachusetts professors may be amongst the highest paid state employees according to recent information released by the University.

According to The Daily Hampshire Gazette, UMass professor Derek R. Lovley, a professor in microbiology department, earned $591,763 in 2007.

George Langford, earned $284,807 as the dean of the College of Natural Science & Mathematics before leaving the University in 2007.

While these figures are high, they are rare among UMass professors.

The American Association of University Professors (AAUP) reported that in the 2006-07 school year, the average earning of a Professor at UMass was about $112,900, nearly $20,000 below national average. The average salary of a U.S. professor at $130,161, according to the AAUP reported that.

Higher salaries are more commonly reported amongst faculty and coaches of UMass. Robert C. Holub, the newly appointed chancellor of UMass, has a base salary of $375,000, the Gazette reported. Derek Kellogg, the new men's basketball coach, is reported to receive $450,000 as his base salary.

Many students were surprised when they heard about the salaries.

"[The salaries] seems a little high," said Craig Darmetko, a UMass junior and computer science major. "I don't know the professors personally, but the number sounds a little ridiculous."

"I think that the coach's salary should be at least equal to that of a professor's," UMass SOM junior David Piper commented. "The coach of the UMass basketball team shouldn't be making more than the chancellor or a professor."

It is doubtful that professors salaries will be changed in the near future considering the current economic situation. The Massachusetts Society of Professors, the union that represents UMass professors, recently received 2.5 percent raise though they had hopes it would be 4 percent.

"When you compare us to our peers and especially when you adjust for the cost of living in this area, we look quite low," said Max Page, MSP president, in a statement to the press. "The situation is only getting worse now that UConn, Rutgers and now Vermont have negotiated three-year contracts of 4 percent and 5 percent."

Voter registration falls short

Some students rejected at polls

BY DINAH GORELIK
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Although Nov. 4, 2008 was a memorable, historic day for all students, it was a disappointment for those who couldn't vote.

Quite a few students who thought they were registered by the Voter Registration/Get Out the Vote Drive, a project sponsored by the Student Government Association, arrived at the polls only to be turned down and prevented from casting their vote.

No reports of problems were heard of on the day of the election by the SGA, but it later became evident that some individuals who had registered through the SGA lost their right to vote because of mistakes made.

The Voter Registration Drive, a campaign effort to get more students voting, took off with classroom announcements, tabling, setting up a registration station at the office of the SG and providing transportation to the polls on the day of the election.

Every form received was supposed to be checked, separated by location, stapled, and then sent in by the Massachusetts Voting Registration Deadline.

With about 25 volunteer students involved in various tasks pertaining to the Voter Registration Drive, 10 trained students were appointed to specifically focus on checking the forms.

However, problems arose when errors were identified during the checking process. In order to fix them, the individual needed to be contacted. The SGA called the voter's phone number, if it was provided on the form. If they had not provided a phone number, they were looked up on people finder. Two e-mails were also sent out so that students could come to the office and fix the forms.

"Despite these efforts! some students did not come in to correct their form, and after many attempts to contact them, we chose to send in all forms that we had in our possession by the deadline," said a statement from the SGA. "We are confident that any form that was checked and sent was accurate however we recognize that some mistakes or irregularities can occur in this complicated process."

It is not known whether the particular mistakes were made by the SGA or the registrant. The many students who missed

Opinions differ on new gay marriage bans

BY ANGELA HELSMAN
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

On Nov. 4, Americans voted in the first black president. That same day, California, Arizona and Florida banned gay marriage in their states.

Today, the only two states where same-sex marriage is legal are Massachusetts and Connecticut.

Some UMass students think the ban on gay marriage is a challenge to equality.

"At this point in time, we have reached a level where we should treat every people equally," said UMass freshman, Ken Kamicha. "Why should it be banned?"

His roommate, Chisenga Nyendwa, had a different take on the issue.

"I'm against gay marriage," he said. "But only because it is taboo where I am from," adding he is from Zambia, in Africa.

"But in America it is different. Americans have a different way of thinking. I see that there is nothing in the Constitution about it, so it should be fine," he continued.

Lemur skeleton reconstructed

BY JOSHUA WALWITCH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Scientists in Madagascar, Vienna and New York alongside a University of Massachusetts professor have been the essential collaborators in a century-long discovery and reconstruction effort regarding an almost complete skeleton of an extinct lemur.

"What in the world could be more interesting than lemurs?" said UMass anthropology professor and primate paleontologist Laurie Godfrey.

The reconstruction effort began in 1899 when an expert fossil collector Franz Sikora found the first specimen of the recently extinct Hadropithecus stenognathus, one of the most poorly understood species of lemur. The discovery was made in the Andrahomana caves located in south-eastern Madagascar.

More recently in 2003, Godfrey and colleagues made an important discovery of additional lemur bones and fragments belonging to the same species that was discovered over 100 years ago.

Anthropology Professor Laurie Godfrey is working with an international team to reconstruct the complete skeleton of a now-extinct lemur species.

The reconstruction effort has been a long process, but the 2003 fossils has lead to valuable information regarding the lemur species. This past August, Godfrey and Natalie Vasey, an anthropology professor at Portland State University who was part of the 2003 excavation, had casts made of all the bones in an effort to mend the two sets of fossils.

"Because pieces actually fit together like a jigsaw puzzle, we knew we were dealing with a single individual, and that we had the most complete skeleton of this species ever discovered," Godfrey said.

The majority of the fossils can be found at the Vienna Natural History Museum in Austria where scientist are able to perform further research.

"Laurie has been able to reconstruct the growth rate of the lemur by looking at the growth lines in

Man charged in student death

BY SHRUTI SEHGAL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A 21-year-old Northampton resident was charged with involuntary manslaughter for his alleged involvement in the death of University of Massachusetts journalism student Darby Fassett, who overdosed on heroin last May.

Justin P. Morin of 20 Jackson St. confessed to the Hadley Police that he sold four glassine bags of "American Gangster" heroin to Fassett the day before Fassett was pronounced dead at Northampton's Cooley Dickinson Hospital.

Although Morin was then charged with distribution of a Class A substance in the Northampton District Court, he pleaded not guilty and was released after a $1,000 bail.

Since then, a Hampshire County grand jury has found what it said is sufficient evidence to indict Morin for involuntary manslaughter.

However, the legal circumstances upon which Morin is being indicted have not yet been revealed to the public. According to a Representative of the Clerk's Office at the Hampshire Superior Court, Morin is scheduled to appear in court on Dec. 5 for this new case.

Presently, Chief of Hadley Police Dennis Huckowicz and Assistant District Attorney and Chief of Narcotics Mary Lou Szulborski have not commented on Morin's upcoming indictment.

McNair confirmed by SGA

BY MICHAEL FOX
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After over a month of deliberations and an hour of questioning last night, Sean McNair was approved for chancellor of elections by the Student Government Association senate.

McNair was first appointed by Central area governor Dave Robertson and approved by the senate at a meeting on Oct. 8. The appointment was than vetoed by SGA President Malcolm Chu.

He made his veto because the senate at the time was newly elected and he believed they needed more time to learn senate procedures before approving important appointments.

A vote to overturn Chu's veto failed at Oct 30's senate meeting. McNair was than reappointed by Robertson with his approval hearing set for last night's meeting.

During their time to question McNair, members of the senate questioned him on his background, qualifications, plans for the position, past-SGA activities and reasons for pursuing the position.

Specific attention was paid to his activities with the activist group "Change SGA" during his freshman semester, the concept of moving SGA elections online and his overall ideas on increasing the teeth. Additionally we have lots of parts of the thorax, ribs and vertebrae and we think that the lemur had a narrow chest cavity," said Vasey. "This is an indicator that the lemur was more of a terrestrial animal unlike most lemurs who do not use the ground a lot."

Godfrey's research isn't always as boring as it may sound to non-anthropologists.

On first day of excavation, when hiking from the campsite to the cave, she was hit by a tidal bore endangering her life.

"I was hit by a great bore wave, and found myself in a whirlpool of raging water near the entrance to the cave," Godfrey said. "I suffered only head wounds, but it was pretty scary for the others who just saw me disappear under the wall of water not to emerge for almost a minute."

For decades Godfrey has been researching lemur fossils and searching for new specimens. She is currently writing a book about her adventures excavating sites around the world.

"Science is supposed to be very objective but parts of it are really truly exciting for scientists and it was emotional reuniting this animal that has been separated or over 100 years whose fossils had survived for more than 1,000 years," Vasey said. "This whole story is pretty dramatic, the life story of an animal becoming a fossil then being found by humans to be studied and in turn giving the humans the opportunity to learn more about the species."

New social network casualties

Users find out about dangers of the Internet the hard way

By Lorenzo Perez
McClatchy Newspapers

It has never been easier to get in trouble while catching up with friends.

Social networking sites such as Facebook and MySpace are great ways to reconnect with old acquaintances and meet new ones. But posts can be problems – the work rant you didn't expect the boss to see or the photos your old roommate posted that document your familiarity with keg stands.

In the past week:

Charlotte-Mecklenburg, N.C., Schools suspended an elementary school teacher who wrote on her Facebook page that she was teaching "in the most ghetto school in Charlotte." Four others were disciplined for postings that included sexually provocative photos of female teachers and a black male teacher listing as an activity "Chillin with my n-iggs!!"

In Durham, N.C., two police officers were the subject of an internal investigation after derogatory remarks about President-elect Barack Obama were posted on their MySpace pages.

A backup center on the University of Texas football team apologized for his "terrible decision" to post a racially offensive text message he received about Obama's victory as a status update on his Facebook page. The post by the player, Buck Burnette, suggested that hunters "gather up," because a black man would be occupying the White House. Burnette was dismissed from the team.

More than 70 million users have registered online for Facebook accounts this year alone. With recent college graduates, older professionals and other adults flocking to the site, some are learning the hard lessons endured by teens and college students when they overshare online.

North Carolina State associate professor Sarah Stein teaches courses on digital media and researches the cultural and social implications of new technologies such as social network sites.

When it first emerged in 2004, Stein noted, Facebook was open only to college students, faculty and staff at a handful of academic institutions. In those first years, there was a sense among Facebook users that this was a very contained community where outsiders without a university e-mail account could not snoop.

"We can say about a 19-year-old it's hard to project 20 years into the future ... when you'd have an employer looking at (photos of) your half-nude body," Stein said of the online postings of younger users. "But to say the same thing about teachers who presumably are in their upper 20s and police officers in a similar age range ... you'd expect their experiences would have given them a sense of restraint."

Stein said people need to be educated on how public their information is on the Internet, regardless of any log-in requirements or privacy settings on a Web site.

Though many companies do not have the resources to monitor employees' Facebook and MySpace postings, they are checking these sites as they screen potential hires.

Glenn Patton is a Duke University graduate and Atlanta-based partner with the Alston and Bird law firm, which specializes in labor and employment practice. He said many of their clients monitor social networking sites as part of the application process.

"People need to be particularly cautious, I think, to make sure that they're making an appropriate appearance on their social networking sites," he said. "If they happen to find themselves between jobs or are out there actively looking, the chances are much greater that a prospective employer is going to be out there taking a look and trying to get a sense of what you're about."

Melynn Glusman, 36, offered similar advice to a young woman who recently came to her for advice on how to get a job at Duke, where Glusman works as a program coordinator for the Center for Documentary Studies.

"When I checked out her Facebook page, there were a lot of status updates about drinking and about how many beers she would drink," said Glusman, who cautioned the woman to tone down the party-girl tone of her page.

Clicking on a social networking site's privacy setting to ensure that only specific people can view your page may increase peace of mind. But people such as Damon Circosta, 31, prefer to keep the privacy restrictions fairly low.

The director of policy for the N.C. Center for Voter Education, Circosta started using the site about a year ago to play "Scrabulous," an online version of Scrabble. Today, he uses his page to network and broaden his professional contacts, as well as to brag about the political future of his 8-month-old son.

The best defense against people finding dirt on you online, he said, is not to provide any. "It's always an exercise in keeping your life seamless, so that your online life will follow."

Web site funds students

By Adrienne Y. Lee
Harvard Crimson

CAMBRIDGE — Raising money to make tuition payments just got more high-tech.

GradeFund, a new Web site created by a Harvard U. alumnus and his Princeton brother lets outsiders pledge money towards a college student's finances. They can even base it on grades or encourage a specific major or concentration.

The Web site was created by entrepreneuring brothers Michael E. Kopko '07 and Matthew Kopko, who are also responsible for DormAid, a housekeeping and laundry service available on several college campuses, including Harvard's.

The GradeFund site uses the "marathon model," said Matthew, a member of the Princeton class of 2008. Just as marathon runners can ask friends and family to pledge money toward a race bid, GradeFund allows students to invite family members, friends, doctors, coaches, and other community members to pledge money towards their education.

Donors can calibrate their pledges to reward students for better grades. Students upload their school transcripts directly onto the Web site, and if they indicate good marks over the course of a semester, Gradefund collects sponsors' money and sends it to the student's school. Donors can also support specific "causes," such as a field of study.

Sponsorships per grade can range from a few dollars to upwards of $1,000. "There are no limits on how much students can raise. The sky's the limit," Michael explained.

Michael said inspiration for the project came from seeing students graduate with thousands of dollars in tuition loans.

"We're trying to do two simple things: bring the concepts of community and incentive into student achievement," he said. "We believe small incentives help encourage students to perform well academically."

Eliot House resident Tony W. Wang '11 is helping publicize GradeFund through word of mouth, on Facebook, and via E-mail. "I thought it was very innovative and something Harvard students should know about," he said of the site.

Republicans and democrats both split on same-sex issue

Other students favor the ban. Greg Collins, President of the Republican Club here at UMass, believes "the ultimate purpose of marriage is child-rearing. I feel a child deserves both a father and mother, because each is responsible for instilling certain types of values in the child."

Collins said the members of the Republican Club were split on their support of gay marriage, however, with some like Collins supporting civil unions.

"Marriage is a union between a man and a woman," said UMass student Mike Rossi. "I voted for Obama, and I am a democrat, but that is what I was raised to believe [about marriage] ... but gays should be allowed 'civil unions' with the same rights as married couples."

According to the New York Times, more than 40 states now have bans or laws against same-sex marriage, and there has been speculation recently about Massachusetts following that trend.

"I think we're much too liberal to ban gay marriage," said UMass student Brian Clark. "But I am ashamed that the rest of the country is so intolerant of differences. Isn't that what makes this country great?"

Some UMass students belive it should not be up to the government to define marriage, others belive it is a civil rights issue.

"Marriage has always been a religious thing; the state cannot define religious concepts," said Justin O'Donnell, student at the Massachusetts Maritime Academy.

"It's a major infringement on civil rights," said Katie Feeley of North Attleboro. "I mean, gay people pay taxes just like the straight people, they work hard like everyone else."

publicity for SGA.

Senator Ryan McCarthy from Southwest South began the session with several questions centered on McNair's commitment to the position, but voted to approve him at the end of the night.

"I felt that he had a deep well of knowledge on important issues," McCarthy said. "I believe that he has a vision for the office that will take it in the right direction and that his heart is in the right place in regards to the SGA."

Senator Maria Payano, a member of the ALANA caucus appointment, also asked a number of question of McNair, but did not end up voting to approve him.

"I feel that a person's past is important. He mentioned that he has made a mistake in the past but there were several mistakes that he made," she said. "I am also worried about him spreading himself too thin with the possible online voting system in the four months that he has in the position."

McNair acknowledged that he faced more intense scrutiny during this meeting due to many senators' desires to understand not just what he wanted to do with the position but how he would handle the position.

"I stand by the fact that there were elements in the SGA I disagreed with," he said. "But we all make mistakes and we have to own up to them and the fact that we can shows how we are able to develop."

Doctor visits drop off

Some choose money over health in faltering economy

By John Bachmann
Northern Star (Northern Illinois U.)

DeKALB, Ill. — Some are choosing not to go to the doctor to save money, while risking their health at the same time.

Northern Illinois University associate economics professor Virginia Wilcox-Gok said the situation with unemployment is one reason why some people are avoiding the doctor's office.

"There's a higher population of those that are unemployed who don't have health insurance and have to pay out of their own pocket," Wilcox-Gok said. "And with a reduced income, people can't afford medical services like before, thanks to losing their jobs."

Karen Grush, DeKalb County Health Department administrator, said she thinks being unemployed makes it understandable for going to the doctor less.

"When a person loses their job or can't find one, health care is something that people will do without," Grush said.

Grush also said more people are canceling their doctor appointments to save money.

"More cancellations are occurring with appointments lately," Grush said. "If a person feels that they aren't that sick they cancel their appointment to save on money."

Wilcox-Gok said those who have health insurance are paying a lot for it.

"People who have health insurance have larger co-pays," she said.

Senior psychology major Chuck Bessler said he thinks people might be going to the doctor less because of rising prices in the economy, including medical expenses.

"Going to the doctor less is a way for people to save money," he said.

Wilcox-Gok also said while people are saving money they are risking their health.

"They want to avoid the medical expenses and give up taking care of their health to do so," she said.

She said the federal government is working to help the unemployed by trying to give them extra money.

"The federal government is talking about expanding unemployment insurance in an effort to help people have more money available," Wilcox-Gok said. "And having more money could help people afford medical expenses."

the SGA.

"I am not surprised that this happened – they were very unorganized, and it was the responsibility of the SGA to send all the forms in correctly," said freshman Ali Zaidi.

Therefore, the decision of putting such a big responsibility into the hands of a student run organization is questioned.

"It is unfortunate to be disenfranchised at 18 years old," said UMass student Gaby Shapiro.

In a statement by the SGA, the organization noted that they regretted any individual who was unable to vote on Election Day.

In terms of any changes being implemented for the next election, the president of the SGA, Malcolm Chu, stated, "While I will not personally be here for the next election and have no bearing on what future administration do, I will be sure to pass on the knowledge gained from this year to future leaders."

U. Arizona Mars Lander ceases operation after 150 days

By Ian Friedman
Arizona Daily Wildcat

MESA, Ariz. — The University of Arizona's Phoenix Mars Lander discontinued operations Monday after NASA officials announced that the Lander could no longer be operated with the lack of available power on the Martian surface. The Lander touched down on Mars on May 25.

"At this time, we are pretty convinced that the vehicle is no longer available for us to use, so we are actually ceasing operations, declaring an end of mission operations," said Barry Goldstein, Phoenix project manager at NASA's Jet Propulsion Laboratory.

The mission that was originally scheduled to last 90 days went on for 150 days before a dust storm caused the Lander to lose power and become unresponsive to messages from the Earth-based team. The Lander was last heard from on Nov. 2, Goldstein said.

"Since we have been surprised by the robustness of this vehicle for so much, we're going to continue listening," he said. "We'll constantly turn on the radio and try to hail Phoenix to see if it is alive, but at this point, nobody has any expectations of that happening. But we do hope that the vehicle will surprise us once again."

The main goal of the mission was to investigate a hypothesis that there may be ice on the Martian surface, said Peter Smith, the mission's principal investigator.

"When we landed, we looked around and saw a field of dirt and rock that was spread out to the horizon, and we didn't see ice right away," Smith said. "It wasn't until we looked under the spacecraft that we found out we were standing on it."

Once Phoenix found ice, Smith said the team was then able to devote their time to truly studying the Martian weather in an attempt to understand where the ice had come from.

"You cannot study the surface of an ice layer without knowing the atmosphere above it," Smith said.

Now that the Lander's mission has come to a close, the first university-led mission to Mars should be considered a complete success, said Doug McCuistion, director of the Mars Exploration Program at NASA Headquarters in Washington, D.C.

"NASA has gotten what they wanted out of this mission. We achieved full mission success back in August, which is obviously the objective," McCuistion said. "Phoenix is past its prime, and its demise is a little earlier than we had hoped, but we've certainly gone much longer than the initial 90-day mission that had been proposed and that we anticipated and counted on."

With the total cost of the mission reaching about $47 million, McCuistion used lyrics from an Elton John song to summarize Phoenix's presence in allowing us to get their money's worth.

"'Don't let the sun go down on me.' I think that Phoenix has been caught that song, but with the dust storm, I think that it was got the best of it," McCuistion said.

Certain particles in the soil are believed to indicate there may be water present on the Red Planet, but Smith said no one can be sure until the soil has been put through some final tests.

"On Earth, we could conclude unequivocally that there was liquid water in this soil," Smith said. "But Mars, we have to be a little more careful. We're going to be a little more careful as we decide if this soil is or was at one develop our data, but definitely I would consider ice has been a part of this soil."

TEGA, another instrument that gained a crucial success of this mission, Smith said.

"I think what we have done here is prove a number of the different instruments that they were designed to do. The instrument has been very successful, and we've learned a lot to this environment of their own future," Smith said. "They provided a funding for a and ensured it's enough of an operations center, so I think in the future, other missions [will] have an opportunity to work with the University of Arizona and do their missions from that center that we've developed."

Although operations may be coming to an end for the mission, McCuistion was quick to point out that this is not the end of Mars exploration. Rather, it is a step in a leaping direction, he said.

"Phoenix is passing the baton. Hopefully the science program is alive and well. The next mission is MAVEN, which is an orbiter mission. It's a mission to orbit the craft – it's an orbiter," McCuistion said. "This is coming in 2013, and that mission, from the University of Arizona to the University of Colorado, will help find how the MAVEN mission."

"[NASA] is very pleased with the result of this mission and the scientists and data are pleased," McCuistion said. "I think the taxpayers should be pleased and pleased with the science that's been done. It's been an exciting mission on the North Pole of Mars for the very first time ... reaching the water that we have been looking for so many years."

Budget cuts necessary

Nick O'Malley

There are 11 million reasons why our wallets all might be getting lighter pretty soon.

The economy's terrible, funding for public education's disappearing and the budgets cuts at UMass are going to start affecting student fees as soon as next semester.

Unfortunately, upping the cost to go to school at UMass is not something that the administration will implement quietly. The student body has made is quite clear that they oppose anything that messes with fees, fees yo, fees.

As opposed to last year, though, the students can't plead ignorance. This year's administration, under Chancellor Holub, has been more than open about the status of the budget situation at the school. That is, of course, if you check your e-mail. You do read those things, right?

Regardless, the administration has released more information than past administrations imagined. Even if you missed the e-mails, the school has set up a Web site, http://www.umass.edu/chancellor_budget.html, to provide even more information on the situation.

However, all the information in the world can't cover up the fact that the university's plan includes an increase in the cost to go here.

The students at UMass can't strike their way out of this one. There are going to be changes.

Beyond the preferences of the students, and their parents' bank accounts, is the fact that having a low cost is UMass' calling card. The ability for this university to attract top students is almost directly related to the low cost of tuition here.

There's a budget crisis at UMass and the country at large. The simple solution, raising fees, is not the best option for the university's future.

In fact, the weakened economy is one of the best things that have happened for this school in a while. Though it's insensitive in perspective, the fact that some families won't be able to pay for top-flight schools will tempt them to choose UMass because of its lower costs.

The underlying problem of the UMass budget situation is not one that requires a great deal of explanation.

Sure, the University of Massachusetts is a fine institution of learning, but its reputation of "ZooMass" has a tendency to deter some students. As long as the fees stay low, UMass still has the potential to shed its party image.

Therefore, the option of raising fees is not one that the administration should pursue. There are countless other outlets to shift the burden of the financial cuts. Changing spending and making cuts across the board doesn't sound fun, but it has to be done.

As we all know, that future has been the prominent focus of UMass administration for some time. But raising fees would place emphasis on UMass becoming the best. Research Institution Ever.

The underlying problem of the UMass budget situation is not one that requires a great deal of explanation. Rather, it is a dilemma that can be resolved within the simplest of terms.

Stop spending money on all this stuff. No, seriously, stop spending so much money.

Look around this campus and tell me that there isn't spending that's about. There's a new studio arts building, we have a new nursing building, a new rec building is under construction and there's a new building for the marching band that's in the planning stages. The "Split Dirt" project, which has been incredibly popular to students and has not been an inconvenience to anyone, has run the school a little dollar.

If it's necessary, the school should go to the extremes in order to keep fees down. There are countless advertising angles that this university has yet to pursue. But under the current economic situation, they may be necessary.

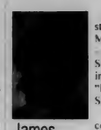
The current contract with Coca-Cola isn't the worst thing to grace our campus, so other deals with companies to bring in revenue could be considered.

However, if conventional advertising proposals don't work, the school should just put a giant billboard on top of the library. You'd be able to see it for miles. Sure, it would be an eyesore and everyone would hate it, but fees would be lower and the school would attract better students.

In all honesty, though, I wouldn't mind living in "NAPA Auto Parts" hall or telling my friends that I'm living in "Office Depot" next semester. If it works for NASCAR, it could work here.

Plus, making such radical moves to maintain lower fees would provide some good press for the school. Who wouldn't want to look at a school that will do anything within the realm of possibility to keep fees down?

Regardless of what the university decides to do, it must be done soon. Holub has made is clear that, rather than steadily bleed money, Dartmouth is going to take one large cut at once.



So board up your windows, the cut's a-comin.

Peace protests preferrable

James Mathews

On Tuesday, a coalition of student groups – including the Muslim Student Association – held a speak-out on the Student Union steps, protesting the continued presence of "Islamophobia" in the United States.

Speakers at the rally struck a consistent note: the election of Barack Obama was a momentous step for race relations, but, in America, there is much more work to be done.

Much of the rally centered on the recent pepper-spraying of a Mosque in Dayton, Ohio, during the month of Ramadan.

Unlike most political gatherings held on the student union steps – that invariable yearly cycle of anti-war, "support our troops" and pro-marijuana rallies – Tuesday's event was something to take notice of. It was, in fact, quite a stirring sight.

Islamic students, members of a generation whose political awakening came early – with the morning of Sept. 11 – were standing on the grounds of an American university, proclaiming and defending their rights to equal treatment. They were speaking from within a long tradition of American civil resistance. They insisted on the promises of the Bill of Rights. They demanded that the United States live up to its mission. They made a direct and irrefutable appeal to the democratic heart and the democratic mind.

At times, however, the speakers at the rally missed the point entirely.

One student insisted that anti-Islamic sentiment in America comes "from the top," and launched into a discussion of the Federal government's reaction to the World Trade Center attacks. A student in the crowd shouted an unprintable insult, directed at the current occupant of the White House.

This kind of antagonism hurts the cause of positive change.

When citizens take a stand against hatred, they run the risk of getting involved in the fight to the point that they themselves become hateful.

In a democracy, problems are not solved via the blame game. Every citizen bears responsibility for the flaws of the nation. When hatred arises in America, we do not look to someone else for the cause.

We look within ourselves, and we do what we can to make things better.

Event participants led the small crowd in various chants: "Islamophobia has got to go!"; "racial hatred has got to go!"; and the more confrontational "no justice, no peace!"

This last chant was completely out of line with a rally in which various protesters held signs reading "Islam = Peace."

If the chant was meant to convey that civil resistance will not cease until all citizens are treated as equals, then it was as good a chant as any.

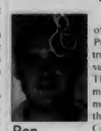
If, however, it was meant to convey that acts of physical violence – like the Dayton pepper-spraying – will be met with acts of non-physical violence, it was entirely inappropriate.

When citizens take a stand against hatred, they run the risk of getting involved in the fight to the point that they themselves become hateful.

Those who promote peace ought to do just that. They cannot afford to allow their good intentions to mutate into a hatred masquerading as righteousness.

Taking all of this into account, Tuesday's rally was successful. Most of what was said was said with a spirit of genuine concern. Those who spoke did so to remind the crowd that when things go wrong in America, it is up to the citizen to set things right. The telling missteps mentioned above did not, in the end, spoil the rally as a whole.

At this point in its history, the United States is facing a rather unprecedented identity-crisis. We have elected an African-American president of Islamic descent. We are negotiating the still-pressing issues surrounding gay marriage. Immigration remains a pressing matter and every year, more and more groups of Americans demand that their right to equal treatment be enacted.



As Americans make their way through this time of transformation, they ought to do so in a spirit of peace and compassion.

When there is a problem in our country, can we blame anyone but ourselves? Ours is a nation capable of solving almost any problem that presents itself, so long as we do not waste our days pointing fingers at each other.

Prop 8 protests defy democracy

Ben Duffy

The success of California's Proposition 8 was truly a David-versus-Goliath tale. The traditional marriage movement stood up to the judges, the California attorney general, the newspapers, the religious Left and the governor to win a major victory in the on-going culture war.

The anti-Prop 8 camp had home-field advantage on America's Left Coast, to boot.

The uphill battle was made even more difficult because the advocates of same-sex "marriage" framed the debate on their terms. California Attorney General Jerry Brown took it upon himself to give Prop 8 a different title than the one chosen by the people who did the legwork to put it on the ballot.

With the stroke of a pen, Brown reframed the debate by altering the title from "Limit on Marriage" to "Eliminates Right of Same-Sex Couples to Marry."

Mr. Brown claims to have made the change for the sake of "accuracy," which is ludicrous on its face. The title of the initiative was wholly accurate as it stood. Brown's title contains a number of unexamined assumptions and a slew of overtly prejudicial language that undoubtedly cost Proposition 8 a number of "Yes" votes.

Despite Jerry Brown's attempt to sabotage the proposition, it still passed by a margin of 52.2 percent to 47.8 percent. It's game over, right?

Not quite. This is where the shadiness of the homosexual lobby becomes blatant cheating. The same Jerry Brown who tampered with the initiative's title declared that he didn't believe that the new amendment applied to same-sex couples who were already "married," and that was how he would enforce the law as attorney general.

Someone ought to fetch Mr. Brown his spectacles so that he can read the unambiguous language of the amendment: "Only marriage between a man and a woman is valid or recognized in California."

There is no wiggle-room here. Same-sex "marriages" are null and void in California, regardless of where or when they were performed. Brown's refusal to discharge his duties in accordance with the newly approved constitutional amendment proves that he is more interested in being an advocate for homosexuals than he is in doing his job. I don't know who has the authority under California law to fire him, but someone needs to do it.

To lose this victory now because of lawyerly hair-splitting would be nothing short of sucker-punching democracy.

The day after the election, the ACLU (et al.) filed a suit to invalidate Proposition 8. The problem with the suit is that it brings the problem of same-sex "marriage" right back to the same court that the voters had just trumped.

The court had decided in May that the state constitution required a revision of the only definition of marriage that California – and the vast majority of humanity – had ever known.

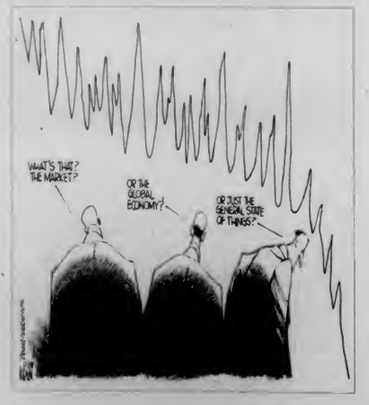
Traditional marriage advocates correctly believed that this was a misrepresentation and were forced to take the only recourse that voters have when the court declares something "unconstitutional" – to amend the constitution.

A constitutional amendment cannot, by definition, be unconstitutional. If traditional marriage advocates wanted to correct judicial arrogance, they had to go over the heads of the court, directly to the people. To bring the issue right back to the same court is asking the judges to validate their own snubbing, which is a little too much humble pie for most judges to swallow.

The argument that the ACLU makes is that a constitutional revision is required in this case rather than a simple amendment. Article XVIII of California's Constitution is relevant here.

Unfortunately, the document is everything that a constitution shouldn't be – thick as a brick, murky, and filled with Legalese rather than plain English. The article makes no real distinction between a revision and an amendment, other than to say that a revision must first pass through the legislature before being voted on by the masses.

It doesn't state which changes can be done by amendment and which must go through the revision process. It fails to even define the two terms, which are basically synonymous.



My first thought when I heard about this new challenge was that the homosexual lobby should have raised this objection before the election, rather than playing (and losing) by one set of rules, then demanding that the rules be changed afterwards.

Then I found out that in fact, they had made the identical legal challenge in July in a desperate attempt to save California from democracy. The court ruled against them, essentially acknowledging that Proposition 8 need not meet any higher standard than that of an amendment. This new lawsuit is as vacuous as the first.

In any case, arguing after the fact that the initiative never should have been on the ballot in the first place is childish. The ballots were printed, the people voted, and the homosexual lobby lost. Tough rookie.

In a major victory of the silent majority of judicial supremacists, supporters of Prop 8 were forced to use their only safeguard against a runaway court – the constitutional amendment. To lose this victory now because of lawyerly hair-splitting would be nothing short of sucker-punching democracy. I guess sucker-punching democracy is what liberals do best.

Justice for whom?

S.P. Sullivan

When Barack Obama was elected as the 44th president of the United States of America, some people wondered if it marked the end of racism in this country.

Three hundred people gathered at Pulaski Park on Main Street in Northampton yesterday gave an emphatic "no."

The Committee for Justice for Jason Vassell (CJJV), along with several hundred members of the community, held a rally yesterday to deliver a petition with 4,500 signatures to Northwestern District Attorney Elizabeth D. Scheibel. They were there to defend Jason Vassell, a black man, against charges brought up in the wake of an altercation with two white men that resulted in several injuries.

In 200 or so words it said this: Let the man go.

Jason W. Vassell was an undergraduate at UMass when he was harassed and threatened by John C. Bowes, 20, of Hancock, N.H., and Jonathan Bosse, 19, of Milton, Mass., in and around his Southwest dormitory.

What sparked the interaction between these men is unclear, but it is clear that racial slurs were used, a window broken and three lives changed in a span of a few short minutes.

In the end, both Bosse and Bowes had been stabbed, Vassell's nose was broken and a controversy that would last almost an entire year gripped the UMass campus. A member of the community is facing 20 years in prison. That much is known for certain.

The rest has become an issue of debate.

There are those who say that this isn't a race issue, that Vassell just happened to be black, and his assailants, or victims, depending on whom you ask, just happened to be white. To me it seems unlikely, but possible.

But the CJJV has been quick to point out that nobody's contesting that Bosse and Bowes started the fight, yet only one, Bowes, is facing any charges.

Misdemeanor charges.

It remains unclear whether Vassell's stabbing of Bosse and Bowes can be legally construed as self-defense. It's pretty obvious, though, that their role in the incident – from the racial slurs to the broken window and Vassell's [illegible] – call for more than misdemeanor charges.

But it's dialogue, and not finger pointing, that's going to bring about justice.

Vassell has also been criticized for calling a friend, Vishan Chamanlal, instead of the police. If Vassell was innocent, it has been said, why didn't he phone the police and sit quietly in his room?

Two things:

For one, I've never been a black man. But I've been told it makes dealing with police a slightly different experience. That's not to say that the University of Massachusetts Police Department wouldn't have handled the situation ably, but I'm not going to hold it against a person of color for not thinking to dial 911 before he called his buddy.

What's more, now here in any statutes involving assault and battery, attempted murder, self defense – the whole nine yards – does it say anything about innocence or guilt hinging on whether you called the police. Not calling the cops is not an admission of guilt.

For what it's worth, the CCJV is doing a very noble thing in protecting a member of the community. They have, however, been unabashed in their claims to a monopoly on truth. A column that ran in The Collegian questioning their motives drew demands that the paper print an 1,800 word response, unedited, to "correct" factual errors in the piece.

The column in question came with several police reports from the Belchertown courthouse as sources. The "correction" came with none. Of course, a police report is hardly the objective truth, and there wasn't much in the column that I agreed with.

But it's dialogue, and not finger pointing, that's going to bring about justice.

And while the CCJV has called for a dismissal of all charges, Vassell's attorneys haven't requested anything of the sort, according to a statement from Scheibel to The Daily Hampshire Gazette.

"All victims, and defendants, no matter how popular or unpopular, have a right to a fair trial before an impartial jury, with the benefit of rules of evidence and procedure," Scheibel wrote, "not in the court of public opinion."

Regardless of whether community members are leaning one way or another, it's important that they know the facts of the case, many of which will unfold when Vassell is tried early next year. Wherever justice falls, a UMass student's life is at stake.

In an interview yesterday, SGA President Malcolm Chu, a member of the CJJV, said the purpose of Wednesday's rally was to send a message to the D.A.'s office "not to under-judge how strong the will of the community is."

"This is not a student issue, it's a community issue," he said.

That much is true.

It's not easy being green, but it helps

Solmaaz Yazdiha

Here and now, global warming is as much of a buzzword as "that's hot," and I say so with no pun intended. But what do we really know about it? The other day I heard two guys outside Bartlett discussing the weather.

"Dude, I can't believe it's snowing. My mom told me it would rain today."

"Global warming, man, it's a bastard."

Global warming can be mistaken for many things, including a mother's false advice, but there are certain things that people fail to realize. For one, if we continue to live and consume as a society the way that we have, there will be no world for our children to live in.

We live in the most glorious of capitalist societies, with every possible good at our disposal. We can order out for warm baked cookies, get anything from socks to sofas delivered right to our door, and charge now, pay later.

God Bless America and God Bless Black Friday. Nielsen reports that the day after Thanksgiving in 2007 yielded 21.2 million online shoppers, up 10 percent from the year before. Most were hunting for plasma TVs and Nintendo Wiis.

The market nature of America is all fine and dandy for credit card companies and gold diggers, but it's quite a pain in the ass for our atmosphere.

There are many common misconceptions that meddle with our knowledge of global warming. For one, that it's a theory, rather than fact. The truth is global warming is a frightening reality for all of us.

Scientists are not disagreeing over the threat of global warming, despite the image the opposition aims to create. In Al Gore's "An Inconvenient Truth," he explains that out of 928 scientific articles reviewed, none disagreed with global warming. The danger it poses is a problem that need be urgently addressed.

Polar bears are drowning, lakes are drying up and we are losing natural resources. Gore explains that $CO_2$ levels are rising more rapidly than ever before. Unlike our shiny gadgets and toys, the higher the $CO_2$ levels, the worse our chances are to host sustainable life on Earth.

An ecological footprint is the amount of productive land and resources required to sustain one human being. On Earth, there is a decent 1.9 hectares available per person.

However, the average person already uses 2.3 hectares, i.e. in order to live sustainably, we need another half an Earth. Now where can I find one of those? Why do I waste the check out to? Of course, in the United States, bigger is better and that doesn't exclude our ecological footprint, weighing in at a stifling 9.57 hectares, the largest footprint in the world.

This is not a problem that can be ignored and left for future generations to deal with. If we don't make more efforts to "go green," there will be no world left to wander.

According to Boston College professor Juliet Schor, we are overspent Americans living the "visible lifestyle." What this means, is that we buy things in order for them to be seen, to gain status.

Polar bears are drowning, lakes are drying up, and we are losing natural resources.

Why else do we wear shirts with little men on horses but to prove we shopped at Polo? Schor notes a study by Robert Kelly that reported that one third of museum visitors entered only to purchase a souvenir and return to the tour bus.

Why? To prove they'd been there to others. What ever happened to experiencing? Living for one's own happiness? When did we sign up for this endless status game? And how do we get out without being cast off as a social misfit?

The bottom line is high consumption leads to damaging effects on more than just your wallet. Families are working longer hours to sustain the high status lifestyle they've devoted themselves to.

We're taking time away from life to pay for life. Is a life that may seem luxurious on display, but requires overtime, multiple jobs and missing your daughter's dance recital really worth it?

There are plenty of simple methods to reduce your footprint, ones that won't even lead you out of your way. You can buy energy efficient appliances, like light bulbs. Walk or bike, take the bus when it's ridiculously cold out, carpool. Call your power company and ask them for green energy.

You can plant trees, smoke some afterwards to reward yourself, though no, that does not count as going green. Reduce carbon emissions, spread the word. This is a real threat to the future of our world. Sure, we might not be around when the world comes to an end, but shouldn't we make sure our children won't as well? Get up, speak up, go green.

CIVIL RIGHTS ISSUE

Dear Editor

(Re: "Gay is not the new black," Brad DeFlumeri, Editorial, Nov 19)

One of the worst kinds of bigot is the one who, almost in the same breath as he tells you that you don't deserve any rights, pulls reasons out of his butt for why he isn't really bigoted at all, and in addition to the rights he's already denying you, says that you don't have the right to call him one.

And yet, you seem to be perfectly OK with letting such people write for your miserable excuse for a newspaper. I'm sorry, Brad DeFlumeri, but I see nothing "rational" about refusing to let people marry the person they love.

And while I grudgingly admit that he's right in that racism and homophobia aren't directly comparable, they both ruin people's lives. If wanting to see my gay and lesbian friends have the same rights and the same chance at happiness that I have by virtue of the fact that I was born with the ability to find the opposite sex attractive makes me a "radical homosexual activist," then, well, I guess Brad's going to have to pin that pink triangle on me, isn't he?

In my three years here I've seen the Collegian be hijacked by the interests of the small, but vocal and obnoxious, right-wing minority on this campus, and while it's acceptable to publish differing viewpoints, it's taking it too far when people are essentially gloating that other people's rights were taken away.

Rachel Goggin
UMass student

UNFAIR STEREOTYPE

Dear Editor:

(Re: "Militant gay-rights activists strike out," Alana Goodman, Editorials, Nov 14)

It is one thing to debate gay marriage from a legal or civil perspective. There have been legitimate questions raised about where the issue fits in; for instance, whether it's a church versus state issue, a constitutional concern, or a debate that should be left to the states.

What's disturbing is when people enter the debate and support their perspective through the usage of stereotypes and outlier extremism.

Last Friday's article "Militant gay-rights activists strike out" by Alana Goodman somehow manages to blend extremist views (which she supposedly denounces) with a conglomeration of stereotypical insinuations about gay rights advocates.

I wholeheartedly agree that violence against the religious community is wrong; what I don't agree with is the depiction of all gay rights activists as "nipple-pierced, leather-clad" throngs of angry delinquents.

I can't remember the last time I passed by a gay friend, turned around, and said, "Golly, I'm sorry, John. I didn't recognize you without the nipple piercing." Claiming that such a caricature actually represents the LGBT community is beyond laughable – it's simply stunning.

I also don't agree with the portrayal of the gay rights community as a group of God-hating, sex-crazed freaks. I know many activists who attend church regularly and are strong believers in the presence of a Christian God.

And personally, I too disagree with the idea of teaching 8 year olds about sex change operations; children of that age are not mature enough to understand the subject matter from any perspective. But I hardly believe that there exists a gay rights agenda that reads: "get groceries, do laundry, destroy all sense of God, corrupt the children of the wholesome heterosexual world."

Are there people that take their beliefs too far? Yes, of course there are. Look at the handful of McCain supporters who yelled racial epithets at rallies. If anything, I'm sure that the McCain campaign was embarrassed by this extremist fringe, just as gay rights activists should be ashamed of anyone who wants to burn churches to spread a message of tolerance.

But to claim that such a small group of extremists represent a larger, more sinister "gay agenda" – people who use their free time outside of schoolwork and jobs to break into wholesome American homes and infect the population with the horrid thought of equal marriage rights?

Someone's been watching a little too much television.

All in all, I'm not writing this rebuttal because of the article's stance on gay marriage. I'm writing this because that stance was supported by a flagrant misrepresentation of the gay rights community.

As for myself, I believe that the ultimate solution to the dilemma of gay marriage is simple.

Don't like gay marriage?

Don't get one.

Dear Editor

I've read the litany of comments posted on Ms. Goodman's column and I have noticed at least one individual praising her "courage" for writing an unabashedly "conservative" column for a newspaper which serves an equally unabashedly liberal school.

While I agree that voicing an unpopular opinion from the minority can be a courageous act, outright intolerance and bigotry cannot be considered an act of valor. I respect Ms. Goodman's opinion and though I could not agree less with her views, she has every right to compose a column espousing her beliefs.

This column, however, is not journalism; it's merely an oft-repeated, offensive tirade against a segment of the population. Ms. Goodman's column cites several alleged examples of both intolerance and "offensive" behavior taught to children by the homosexual community without stopping to provide context or even really explain her evidence or her feelings.

It's beyond easy to find incendiary quotes floating around the blogosphere or to make sweeping generalizations about an entire group of people, but it's not good journalism.

Ms. Goodman provides no analysis of the issue beyond an overly-distilled, black and white message that says "foxy lesbians," and "nipple-pierced, leather-clad activists" seek to destroy religion and defile "conventional" morality.

For example, Ms. Goodman's amazement that "[s]ome gay activists are even attempting to strip the Mormon Church of its status as a religious organization," does not clearly explain the reasoning behind the petition.

Religious groups' tax-exempt status is a give-and-take relationship. The government does not force religious groups to pay taxes if the religious group agrees not to use a "substantial part of its activities to influence legislation."

This agreement is meant to keep the wall separating church and state from crashing down. While I do not believe that the Mormon Church will lose its status as a religious organization, the citizens of California have a right to be angry with the Church.

As Ms. Goodman openly admits, "it's true that the Mormon Church gave millions of dollars to "Yes on Prop 8" efforts," making them a very active part of the "yes on 8" campaign.

I understand the passion people on both sides feel about this subject. The problem I have with this column is not that my opinions differ from Ms. Goodman's. My real problem is that this column labels several items "facts" without providing context or insight into the issue at hand. Gay-bashing is not, and never should be, a valid excuse for a column.

MORALS OVER MILITARY

Dear Editor

(Re: "Keeping Guantanamo Bay and ideals of morality open," Greg Collins, Editorial Nov 18)

In his Tuesday column, Greg Collins calls on President-Elect Obama to announce that "America already has," and continues to, display the moral high ground during the war on terror." The columnist, after an excruciatingly contrived defense of Guantanamo, is asking our future President to lie. We ceded the moral high ground years ago. It is the task of the new president to ensure that we get it back.

Collins' point is that morality must be trumped by military necessity. To the columnist, Guantanamo is a necessary evil, maintained by military officers whose responsibility it is to protect us from "enemies who are intent on blowing up and killing as many Americans as possible." He mocks the "professors and human rights activists" who in their disgust with Guantanamo have clearly forgotten 9/11.

Let's just get this "military necessity" question out of the way. In June of 2004, The New York Times reported that of the nearly 600 detainees in Guantanamo not more than two dozen were closely linked to al-Qaeda and that only a very limited amount of information could be gleaned from the questionings.

Why? Simple. When we invaded Afghanistan in 2001, many Afghanis turned in their neighbors in exchange for the enormous cash bounties we'd promised in leaflets dropped during the bombings.

These innocents made up the bulk of those first sent to Guantanamo from Afghanistan in 2002. Deemed "enemy combatants" and therefore not subject to U.S. law or the Geneva Convention, many of these men have been held without charges ever since. We stole years from the lives of innocents with no explanation. Even if we hadn't caused them to suffer terribly, this would be a scandal.

Let me put this plainly. We torture our prisoners. Despite the Bush Administration evilly raising the bar for what can be legally called torture to "actions that can cause death or major organ failure," we have been torturing Guantanamo detainees for years.

The worst offenses – waterboarding, stress positions, extreme temperatures, and face-fucking – are so clearly torture that there is a near-unanimous international condemnation of these practices.

Collins pretends that torture is some malleable concept that deserves debate. Really, this is a far less controversial issue than it seems. Torture is wrong, but we do it. We have gleaned little or no actionable information from this torture.

Torture at Guantanamo (and Abu Ghraib, and the military prison at Bagram Air Force base in Afghanistan, and at countless other faceless "black sites") has not made us safer, in fact, just the opposite. By shirking the Geneva Convention, we have given our enemies more reason to hate us and less reason to treat decently any American soldier they might capture.

In 2006, Colin Powell put it best when he said that "We have shaken the belief the world had in America's justice system by keeping a place like Guantanamo open ... we don't need it and it is causing us far more damage than any good we get for it."

If we ever hope to reclaim our moral stature, we must close Guantanamo.

Intimate setting perfect for Norwegian songster

By Ian Nelson
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — Scandinavian singer-songwriters sure have a way with words, even here in the Pioneer Valley. Sweden's Jens Lekman performed just weeks ago at a benefit for Clara Gardner at Northampton High School, and a couple of weeks later, Norwegian songster Sondre Lerche serenaded the seated Iron Horse dinner crowd last Monday.

Lerche, who hadn't made a Northampton appearance since 2004, pleased the crowd with his guitar and as a duo, was accompanied by opening act Sylvie Lewis for a couple numbers.

Before playing a single note, Lerche addressed the crowd regarding his last show at the Iron Horse. He whole-heartedly apologized for being sick last time, and attributes his illness to anyone not enjoying themselves.

"This time if I suck," he explained, "that's just who I am." Lerche did not, to use his wording, "suck." He performed rather well, in fact, treating the audience to a slew of new songs as well as older standbys.

"Tell me what you think about this song," he ordered before jumping into his first ditty, "Heartbeat Radio," which will appear on his new record due out next year. This related to his brand new marketing format, one in which he joked about creating t-shirts for songs before he puts them on records.

"The t-shirt is really hot cakes," he said using a broken idiom, meaning he has apparently sold a lot of the shirts and is therefore ready to put the song on the album, an example of his odd, often dry humor.

The song itself was pleasant, not varying too much from his past work's simple pop sensibilities. Lerche strays not from the normative singer-songwriter in that he performs his songs, supplies engaging banter, and does not do much else. This is not a large venue artist, instead better suited for clubs or small auditoriums, swaying back and forth shyly on his heels while ticking his head to the rhythm.

The Norwegian continued with interesting choices, including "The Tape" from his "Phantom Punch" LP, an upbeat track provoking Lerche to fits of dramatic gestures and miniature flailings to correspond with the song's inventive dynamics. He followed with another new song, "Good Luck," before ditching the acoustic for an electric guitar.

Lerche prefaced the next song, "Airport Taxi Reception," also from "Phantom Punch," with a story of an 80-year-old man denouncing the song as the only one of Lerche's which he hated, claiming it would be his downfall.

"I was surprised that an 80-year-old man had all my records," Lerche said.

The song's not half bad, in contrast to the elderly man's opinion. In fact, it's probably one of the better songs on the album. At the song's final seconds Lerche went into a little spastic burst, nearly knocking himself over.

Soon thereafter Sylvia Lewis took the stage with Lerche to perform the duet "Hell No" (originally performed with Regina Spektor for the "Dan in Real Life" soundtrack), which Lerche claimed didn't work at all as a solo piece due to his past failures performing the song well.

The two then performed a song which they penned together through the power of the Internet, "Words and Music," which will also appear on Lerche's next record. Lewis didn't impress much in her opening set, emitting an awkward air, playing sub-par songs standing off to one side of the stage. However, when coupled with Lerche, she sounded great.

Lerche also mentioned another marketing endeavor he recently dove into with his alliterate "Polaroid Pumpkin Party." LP, a short offering of songs home-recorded, each with a unique Polaroid photograph taken over the past couple months including documentation of Lerche's first pumpkin carving. Whether or not it was worth $15 is hard to say, but it's an interesting concept. Anything limited and/or hand-crafted by an established artist will surely sell.

Lerche finished off the night with a couple more tunes, including "Two Way Monologue," before which he called the night "a privilege" and asked the audience to sing the chorus. The crowd's vocal was on, apparently, as Lerche piped "This gives me so much pleasure! I hear harmonies!" After leaving the stage momentarily into the small curtained-off room behind the stage, Lerche returned due to much applause.

"I was hoping you'd do that," he said, referring to the encore-prodding. "It was getting lonely back there." He closed the night with another "Phantom Punch" track, "Tragic Mirror," his near-perfect falsetto bringing the crowd to the end of the performance and into the night.

Canadian band Enter the Haggis combine multiple influences into their evolved sound. The band will perform two sets Saturday at the Iron Horse Music Hall.

Celtic-fusion in NoHo

By Michelle Fredette
Collegian Staff

One might think that to get a taste of traditional Celtic music, folk, rock, bluegrass and Latin would require attendance at five different concerts.

Think again.

Canadian band Enter the Haggis will be fusing all of these elements into two shows this Saturday at the Iron Horse Music Hall in Northampton.

While the Celts, influence stays at the forefront of the band's music, the band has experimented with a multitude of styles throughout its career of over a decade.

The quintet is currently made up of four native Canadians: Brian Buchanan, Trevor Lewington, Mark Abraham and James Campbell, and one Scotland born man, Craig Downie.

The four Canadian-born members are from various parts of Ontario, including Ottawa, Hamilton, Sault Ste. Marie and Toronto, where the band is based.

Despite hailing from Glasgow, Downie ended up moving to Canada with his parents at the age of seven.

Judging from the bands expansive range of instrumentation, it is clear that Enter the Haggis is constantly experimenting. While the band uses the usual drums and guitars, Buchanan also plays fiddle and Downie has added tenor saxophone, tin whistle, Jew's harp, harmonica and even the highland bagpipes to its repertoire.

It was, in fact, the bagpipes that truly led to the development of Enter the Haggis. Downie had played the bagpipes for quite some time, but had abandoned them while he pursued an acting career. When that didn't pan out, he returned to the bagpipes. His reunion with the instrument and the influence of some Celtic rock helped him envision a band that took musical fusion even further.

The band's name is said to reflect its unique style, since Haggis, a traditional Scottish dish, is a unique combination of things. It, like the band, combines different elements. Haggis is typically made of a sheep's heart, liver and lungs, along with oatmeal and other ingredients, boiled in a sheep's stomach for about three hours.

Downie, the mastermind behind the band, toyed with Electric Haggis and Won-Ton Haggis before settling for Enter the Haggis.

"It's like Enter the Dragon, but a lot messier. It ended up sticking … but it's not the sort of name we expected to go with," he said of the name.

Enter the Haggis' first album, "Let the Wind Blow High," was released in 1998, two years after the group's formation. Downie is the only current member who was involved with the initial album's production. Since its release, the band has undergone extensive member turnaround.

Enter the Haggis found much success with its third album, "ETH: LIVE" (2002). Through this release they attained fans all over Canada and the United States.

Even so, it wasn't until its 2005 release of "Casualties of Retail" that the group left its familiar Celtic party band status to incorporate other elements such as Latin and funk.

The success of "ETH: LIVE!" is just one demonstration of the band's focus on live performance. They've appeared at an abundance of music festivals and events, such as the Central Florida Scottish Festival, the Vancouver Island MusicFest and the Chicago Irish Fest.

Touring is what the band really loves, and it often encourages audience members to get up and move during its shows. This may be difficult at the Iron Horse, with its dinner tables and wait-staff moving about.

However, Enter the Haggis is no stranger to the Iron Horse Music Hall. Its most recent release, "Northampton" (2007) was recorded at the Iron Horse music hall over a two-night period. The album is described on the band's website as "effectively a live 'Best Of' album" with 18 tracks.

Enter the Haggis will continue to push the envelope with its performances this Saturday. "I would like to see Celtic rock become a dominant force in music," Downie has said. "Rock music has really become kind of homogenous. I don't know where it's going to go these days. You turn on the radio and one song sounds like the next. I would like to take Celtic rock to its epitome."

Enter the Haggis will perform two shows at the Iron Horse on Saturday, November 22. The first show begins at 7 pm and the second at 10 pm. Limited tickets are available at the door for $20.

Paula's comedic homecoming

By Angela Stasiowski
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — On Friday, Nov. 21, Massachusetts native Paula Poundstone will be presenting her offbeat, topical humor to Iron Horse Music Hall.

"Adults are always asking little kids what they want to be when they grow up because they're looking for ideas," comments the comedienne and author during her recent Bravo special, "Look What the Cat Dragged In."

Poundstone, however, has had no such trouble with the conundrum of life purpose. From her kindergarten years, Poundstone has had a knack for making people laugh with her sharp commentary and sarcastic wit.

Her kindergarten teacher, Mrs. Bump, also proved to be one of her greatest influences, remarking in a letter to Poundstone's parents that, "I have enjoyed many of Paula's humorous comments on our activities."

Poundstone took this positive reinforcement to heart and ran. At only 19 years old, she began touring the nation via Greyhound bus in the hopes of earning various stand up gigs.

Since then, she has relocated to various comedy capitals, moving from Boston to Los Angeles and San Francisco to spread the laughs beyond the east coast.

After features on Jay Leno's "Tonight Show" and "Saturday Night Live", Poundstone accrued various awards for her hilarious commentary, particularly during Leno's Presidential election special. She acquired her own television program, "The Paula Poundstone Show" in 1992.

Poundstone is currently one of the weekly panelists on NPR's "Wait Wait … Don't Tell Me," a weekly quiz-show that simultaneously tests participant's knowledge of current events and satirizes the typical media perspective.

Life was not always easy for Poundstone, however. After facing various alcohol related charges, she made some serious life changes and has since found success in the literary world.

Ever developing as a creative individual, Poundstone wrote her first book in 2006. Entitled "There is Nothing In This Book That I Meant to Say," the publication served the dual purpose of profiling famous historical figures and providing the reader insight into her own life.

"I was court-ordered to Alcoholics Anonymous on television. Pretty much blows the hell out of the second A, wouldn't you say?"

Inevitably, Poundstone's experiences have been infinitely influential towards her stand up material, which makes no secret of her struggle. The comedienne's often self-depreciating humor comes as a direct result of them.

One of Poundstone's current passions is the promotion of reading and literacy in today's American youth. She is a fervent supporter and national spokesman of Friends For Libraries U.S.A. (FOLUSA). The organization promotes literacy by providing monetary support to libraries across the country to fund summer reading programs and expand book collections.

Further promoting her cause, Poundstone herself has penned several children's textbooks, including "The Sticky Problem of Parallelogram Pancakes."

Her standup, however, is a dish best kept for the adult diner, since her routines are both controversial and sharp witted.

Poundstone's live performances are an entirely new species of comedic animal. According to reviewers at The Boston Globe she, "improvises with the crowd like a Jazz musician … swinging in unexpected directions without a plan, without a net."

Before she even takes the stage, her personality announces its arrival. Her enthusiastic speech and attention to the audience makes clear her passion for comedy.

Poundstone's signature style of dress sets her apart as an individual in every sense. Her stage garb generally consists of a modern take on menswear, complete with colorful tie and dress shoes. Appearing as a sort of wayward political figure, her suits fit her comedic persona to a T.

"I have terrible short-term memory loss, which I like to think of as Presidential eligibility," quipped Poundstone on one of her infamous television specials.

The national tour that she is currently promoting has consisted of two hour comedy routines that wander everywhere from the nation's political climate to her past experiences with alcohol abuse, taking a sharp detour to discuss her precious cats. Nothing is taboo for the veteran performer.

Her penchant for crowd interaction is well suited to small venues such as Iron Horse, and the performance comes at a time when the currents of political affairs are rich in comedic material.

Between her fiercely original style and a lifetime of experience, there is no stage Poundstone cannot conquer.

Poundstone will be performing at the Iron Horse Music Hall in Northampton on Friday Nov 21 at 7 and 10 p.m. Limited tickets are available for $28 at the door.

Bond gets modernized

By Morgan Meagher
Collegian Staff

In a year dominated by blockbuster action flicks – "The Dark Knight," "Iron Man," "Hancock" – "Quantum of Solace" rode in on a wave of high expectations. Add that to the excitement that accompanies a new addition to the beloved James Bond series, especially the follow up to one as good as 2006's "Casino Royale," and the anticipation is off the charts.

Unfortunately, the latest installment in the rebooted Bond series fails to live up to the hype.

"Quantum of Solace" brings Daniel Craig back for his second go around as the MI6 agent. "Quantum" begins almost exactly where "Casino Royale" ends, with Bond in Sienna, Italy.

The film opens with the quintessential Bond car chase, with 007 racing through winding coastal roads and precarious construction sites, hotly pursued by henchmen from the terrorist organization Quantum.

The fast-paced chase sets the tone for the film, and reveals its major technical flaw. With a cut every second or so, it's nearly impossible to follow the action. Obviously one of the black sports cars is operated by Bond and the other by his enemies, but at any given point during the chase the viewer would be hard-pressed to decipher who is chasing whom, unless they can easily distinguish between an Alfa Romeo and an Aston Martin flying through a hail of bullets.

The rest of the film digresses rather sharply from many of the traditional characteristics shared in the Bond franchise. The latest incarnation of Bond veers away from the suave, debonair hero of the first 20 installments. Craig's 007 is rougher, more reckless, ruthless and meaner than his predecessors. This is due in part to the fact that "Casino Royale" reveals the origins of Bond, and his development as an agent. He's unpolished still, and stays so throughout "Quantum of Solace." Only at the very end of the film at times is a hunt that he may be evolving.

Unlike previous Bond films, which were always full of high-tech devices (think the slew of exploding everyday objects throughout the series), "Quantum" is relatively light on gadgets, and is missing the character of Q, who used to provide Bond with his various devices. The two objects that have long held extraordinary hidden capabilities throughout the franchise, Bond's watch and car, are apparently just what they seem to be. The only cool gadgets are Bond's ultra-advanced cell phone and the touch screen interfaces at the MI6 offices.

Most shockingly of all, this Bond doesn't always get the girl. Camille (Olga Kurylenko), the female lead in "Quantum," is no cheap eye candy. She's a female mirror of 007. Like Bond, she's a secret agent, and like Bond she is bent on getting revenge for the death of her loved ones. She's strong and determined, and contrary to the typical formula. Although they spend much of the film together and the sexual tension is rampant, Camille does not fall into bed with Bond. In fact, Bond has only one lust interest in "Quantum," the fiesty and fiery Strawberry Fields (Gemma Arterton).

"QUANTUM OF SOLACE"
STARRING:
DANIEL CRAIG,
OLGA KURYLENKO
C

Both actress and character play their roles well, and Fields is the subject of a reference to the 1964 Bond movie "Goldfinger," which is perhaps the film's only nod to the history of the franchise.

Craig is certainly not the ladies' man that Sean Connery and Pierce Brosnan were. In "Casino Royale" he has a definite love interest, Vesper Lynd, whose betrayal and death shape Bond in the sequel.

"Quantum" seems to shift the focus away from sex and on to Bond's relationship with his boss. M (Judi Dench). M is more of a central character than ever before, and her interactions with Bond are a big part of the film. At one point, when Bond vaguely references M, Camille asks if she is his mother, to which Bond replies, "She likes to think so." This transition to stronger female characters, particularly the older, more nurturing and decidedly non-seductive M, is another step away from Bond tradition. Franchise veteran Judi Dench is certainly capable of carrying the role as it develops, and it will be interesting to see where this path takes the series.

Efforts have been made to update the themes of the new Bond installments, bringing the franchise into the 21st century. The super spy was created during the Cold War, with the Soviets out of the picture, Bond needs a new enemy. That's where the shadowy terrorist organization Quantum comes in. Quantum's motives are a mystery, but their activities are one focus of this film. Bond's official mission is to thwart one of Quantum's members from buying a large tract of Bolivian desert, which he plans to obtain by aiding a dictator who's staging a coup.

The value of the land is also a mystery, but everyone speculates that it contains oil.

From here, "Quantum of Solace" veers into the territory of political commentary, taking on a number of issues. The film touches heavily on themes of government corruption and hypocrisy, and the consequences of commandeering natural resources.

Despite its many flaws, "Quantum of Solace" is not completely unredeemable. Daniel Craig and Judi Dench carry the film, bringing plenty of nuance and personality to their characters, and plenty of chemistry to the screen.

Between Bond's inner torment over the loss of Vesper and the reminders of all that is wrong with the world today, "Quantum" ends up somewhat dismal and dark.

There is more depth to this film and this Bond than there is in many of the older films, and if it were not for the fact that "Quantum" neglects so much Bond mythology, it could be quite good.

As it stands, it makes a decent sequel to "Casino Royale," and aside from the hectic strobe-like, overdone action sequences, a decent film in its own right.

As an addition to the Bond franchise, however, it just doesn't quite measure up.

Morgan Meagher can be reached at mmeagher@student.umass.edu

Despite a strong performance by Daniel Craig, the latest installment in the Bond franchise fails to live up to its predecessors.

Love isn't flowering in 'Eden'

By Susan King
Los Angeles Times

HOLLYWOOD — The intimate Irish drama "Eden" revolves around a seemingly happily married couple who realize their union is fraying at the seams as they approach their 10th anniversary. But there's another major character that defines and shapes Billy (Aiden Kelly) and Breda (Eileen Walsh) — the quiet country town where they live with their two children.

"Eden" is set in Edenderry in County Offaly, a far less picturesque locale than the charming Dublin or the lush green countryside usually seen in Irish films.

"We are right in the middle of the country between Dublin and Galway," says director Declan Recks, who hails from Edenderry. "It's very flat compared to the rest of the country. There are no big cities in the Midlands. It is a slower pace here. Though it's changed a bit in the last 10 years, life is more centered around the pubs as a social outlet."

"It is so flat and brown," says Walsh, who won best actress at the Trifle'a Fifth Festival as Breda. "It's a heavy scenery to be surrounded by day to day, because you have got the big that's reflected into the sky and back again. I think to live in it is oppressing. I think it very much adds little to their lives, so your own problems are as claustrophobic as the surrounding colors."

The setting is more than appropriate as Breda realizes there is something wrong between her and her husband. It has been ages since the couple has been intimate. Billy spends most of his time away from work at the local pub, where he has developed a crush on the beautiful young daughter of a colleague. Breda decides the only way for the couple to reconnect is have a date at a pub on their anniversary.

"I don't think they are aware of what relationships can be," Walsh says. "No matter where you live now, you have cable TV, so you can see what is the 'ideal' (of life). But I think when you come from somewhere small, all you know is your own parents and family and neighbors. I think there are plenty of people just muddling through and not necessarily happy or dealing with things."

Breda isn't asking for the moon; she just wants her share of happiness. "She is a small-town girl in the sense of her aims," Walsh says. "She wouldn't necessarily be aiming for the stars. She would have done what her mom would have done … settle down and have a nice family. She would be happy if she could be content with the marriage, but with cracks starting to appear, I think it suddenly reflects a huge amount on herself. Like all women, she blames herself."

Although set in Ireland, the story of how "Eden" was made began in Los Angeles. In 2000, Recks and writer Eugene O'Brien were here screening their short films at an event for the now-defunct nonprofit organization the Irish Screen. During the festival, O'Brien, who also comes from Edenderry, began telling Recks about his new two-character play called "Eden."

"You could identify the characters straight away," Recks says, "and see a few people that you knew in the play or thought you knew." Plus, he says, "Eden" was a rare opportunity to have another area of Ireland represented. "A lot of media and theater is very Dublin-centric," he says. "It's not coming out of rural Ireland."

The play, composed of monologues, premiered to great acclaim in Dublin in 2001. Walsh's older sister Catherine played Breda onstage and has been performed around the world. Recks tried to adapt the play as a feature film, but ran into problems because of the play's structure.

"The difficulty was finding a device or a way to know what was going on in their heads," he says. "In the monologues you could tell everything. I kind of wanted to preserve two points of view, which kind of goes against all basic screenplay-writing principles that there should only be one central point of view."

Eventually, Recks put it aside and directed episodes of the Irish TV series "Pure Mule," which O'Brien wrote and was also set in the Midlands. The series was such a hit that the same producers agreed to make "Eden" with Recks directing. But this time O'Brien wrote the screenplay, with Recks and producer David Collins assisting with structure.

"We went back and completely forgot the play and concentrated on the two people and tried not to include everything," Recks says.

Walsh, who worked in "Pure Mule," was their only choice for Breda.

"I think it was important for them to go younger for the film, because you needed to feel this was the first time the couple had approached this problem," Walsh says. "Catherine's Breda was very beautiful. I think we have similarities in the sense that we tend to play women that are very earthy and very grounded and yet are kind of lost at the same time."

Eileen Walsh stars along side Aiden Kelly in the Irish drama "Eden." The two play a married couple struggling to stay together after a decade of marriage.

Vampires, heroic canines highlight weekend premieres

By Jennifer Turner
Collegian Staff

"Twilight" (PG-13)

There is no argument that this vampire love story is the most anticipated movie of the holidays season. Based on the best-selling novel by Stephanie Meyer, the film stars Kristin Stewart, Robert Pattinson and Billy Burke. It is rumored that "Twilight" has created such a fervor that it caused "Harry Potter and the Half-Blood Prince" to move its release date to mid 2009.

Stewart plays teenager Bella Swan, a newcomer to the town of Forks, Wash. Bella falls for the mysterious and alluring Edward Cullen, played by Pattinson, yet she starts to notice that he is different than the other kids at school. She discovers that he is a vampire … don't worry, that isn't a big secret … and they embark on a timeless romance.

Edward isn't like the other vampires; he has evolved and knows how to curb his "appetite" for blood. When trouble arrives, in the form of some not-so-reformed vampires, Edward must do what he can to protect the girl he loves.

Opens on Friday, but there will be special showings at 12:01 A.M. and 12:05 A.M. on Thursday night.

"Twilight" is one of the most widely anticipated films of the season.

"Bolt" (PG)

This animated film about an action star dog includes the voices of John Travolta, Miley Cyrus and James Lipton. Bolt the dog, voiced by Travolta believes he actually has all the powers that he exhibits on his hit show. A mishap leads Bolt to believe that his owner and costar, Penny, played by Cyrus, has been kidnapped. When he breaks out to the big, bad streets of New York City, he discovers that life is a lot harder without superpowers.

Bolt makes friends with a housecat and a hyperactive hamster along the way, and together they help him find his way back home. This family film is sure to be a hit with kids who are going to see "Twilight" and tweens excited by the fact that Hannah Montana herself is voicing a character.

Opens Friday. Showing in 3D format in certain select theaters.

Jennifer Turner can be reached at jturner@student.umass.edu

Disney's latest animated film, "Bolt," promises to be a hit among younger audiences.

UM keeps on giving

By Jeffrey R. Larnard
Collegian Staff

The holiday season is a season of giving; the Massachusetts football team got started early.

Starting two weeks ago against Maine, UMass gave the ball back to its opponents at an alarming rate. In the previous two games against Maine and New Hampshire, UMass has turned the ball over 10 times. Both weeks the Minutemen (6-5, 3-4 Colonial Athletic Association) have lost with their playoff hopes gone as well.

The No. 17 Black Bears (8-3, 5-2 CAA), intercepted UMass four times, three of which came at critical moments in the game. Down 21-20 and in the final 12 minutes of the game, UMass got the ball three times on big stops by the defense. All three drives ended with an interception.

Last weekend when UMass traveled to No. 11 UNH (8-2, 5-2 CAA), the Minutemen did not turn the ball over in critical moments, but instead faced critical moments for the final three quarters due to their turnovers. UMass started the game right where they left off against the Black Bears. The first two drives ended in interceptions, while the third ended by a fumble.

The Wildcats took advantage of the extra drives and capitalized on all three. They returned the first interception for 100 yards and a touchdown. The next two turnovers resulted in one-play drives, a 43- and a 48-yard rush, that resulted in touchdowns. All three turnovers occurred in the first 8 minutes of the game and helped UNH amass a 24-0 lead.

The Wildcats quickly added another score shortly into the second quarter putting the Minutemen in a 31-point hole, making every possession there after a must-score drive.

Through the final three possessions against Maine and the first three against UNH, UMass turned the ball over six consecutive times, the first five of which were interceptions.

This weekend's opponent, Hofstra, is not as good of an opponent as UNH or Maine, but UMass coach Don Brown knows to stop the bleeding of turnovers. It starts with this weeks practice.

"We have to have a great week of practice. We have to focus on execution and being sharp, paying attention to detail," Brown said Tuesday before practice. "That is what it comes down to, you have to pay attention and take care of the little things and then big problems don't occur."

Many of the interceptions UMass has given up have been due to minor things such as a mistake in execution, a little luck by the defense or simply because the defense knew what was coming. The interception that was returned for 100 yards was off a tipped ball and the final interception against Maine was on a last-second hail mary attempt.

"All you have to have is one guy run a route three feet off, have the ball tipped in the air or just a simple miscommunication," Brown said. "At this time of the year those things are so important especially when you're playing against a very, very good football team."

The Minutemen hope to eliminate those issues against the Pride (4-7, 2-5 CAA) on senior night this Saturday. With their playoff hopes lost, the seniors will play their final collegiate game and try to set the record for most wins in a four-year span at 37.

"This senior class has been a great group. They have a great chance in front of them," Brown said. "They have tied the last two senior classes as the winningest in UMass history. But to separate themselves and to be No. 1, that is kind of special. This group deserves it."

the field like he has this year. Thomson scored his first career goal, and game-winning goal, in UMass' 2-0 win against George Washington on Oct. 26.

Henshaw has played in 17 of the Minutemen's games (starting in 14). After his first few games he began to gel with the team and has earned more playing time. Henshaw has scored a goal and tallied an assist in his freshman campaign.

"[Henshaw and Thomson] are key in the fact that the defense is now much more together," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "Brownie and Danny Lepone, you knew they were going to play well. To be honest, Danny struggled at the beginning of the season, but he certainly cleaned it up and has been playing very, very well down the stretch."

This weekend, in the first round of the NCAA tournament, the Minutemen's defense will need to continue its strong play when they take on No. 26 Harvard (11-5-0) on Saturday at 12 p.m. at Rudd Field.

Harvard has scored 34 goals this season – averaging 2.12 goals per game. Crimson forwards junior Andre Akpan and senior Michael Fucito have each scored nine goals this season.

"[We have to] do whatever we can to stop their two front runners," Koch said. "I think we're defending well, certainly playing better than we were at the beginning of the season, which is a good thing because we want to keep playing."

The Minutemen have allowed 17 goals this season. Simmons has earned seven shutouts in the 255 shots that he has faced. His save percentage is one of the best in the Atlantic 10 (.827) averaging less than a goal per game to be scored (.80).

If the Minutemen continue to play a team defense, with help from center midfielders sophomore Ben Arikian and senior Mike DeSantis, it will be hard for Harvard to penetrate the back line, and if it does, Simmons has shown his capability to handle tough situations.

points. Prince Olusu (five goals, one assist), Mark DeSantis (four goals two assists) and Ben Arikian (two goals, seven assists).

However, to advance in the tournament, the Minutemen have to get the ball past Crimson goalkeeper Austin Harms. The freshman has gone 8-2, allows 0.48 goals per game and was named Ivy League Rookie of the Week, twice.

One edge that the Maroon and White has over the Crimson is the depth of its bench. Both squads have relatively equal starters, but Koch feels that his team has better players if he needs to make substitutions.

"One good thing we have is a bench that is pretty deep," Koch said. "When we go to our bench I don't feel our play drops very much and I don't think Harvard can do that."

However, the weather may not allow Koch to rotate his players as much as he might like. The temperature at kickoff will be in the 30 degree range, so he wants to make sure his substitutes are properly warmed up when they enter the game.

"When you are sitting in 36 degree weather your body just doesn't all of a sudden turn up the temperature and go, it takes awhile," Koch said. "It will be very important for players on the bench to keep warm, stay loose and every 10 minutes get up and get some runs in. If we can do that we will be in good shape."

UMass is coming off a tough loss to Dayton last Sunday. The Minutemen accidentally scored on their own net. It was the first loss since Oct. 12 against Rhode Island, 1-0. UMass went 8-0-1 between losses to find two victories over Saint Louis who were ranked in the top 25 throughout the season.

The loss was may have cost them a conference championship, but it may turn out to be a positive for the Minutemen.

"I think maybe we thought we didn't have to work as hard, I don't know I'm not sure," Koch said. "I feel that mentally we were [not going into that game [against Dayton] having played Saint Louis twice.

"I'm not sure I understood quite how much that took out of us mentally. But now we've had a chance to look at what we did and didn't do [in that game] and now we're ready [for Harvard]," Koch continued.

The Winner of Saturday's match goes go to face South Florida, in the second round of the NCAA tournament.

"The winner of this game usually goes to a nice warm climate and that's something that helps you play so maybe that's in the back of some of the guy's minds," Koch joked.

action pass. This will draw the safeties closer and allow Hofstra to take shots downfield.

Christopher has 106 attempts on the ground for 435 yards and five touchdowns.

Brock Jackolski could see playing time from the backfield. Jackolski has 75 rushing attempts for 516 yards and eight touchdowns.

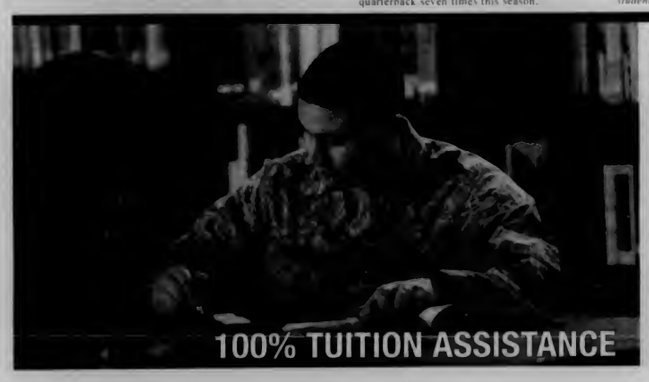
Aaron Weaver is Hofstra's main receiving threat. Starting all 11 games, the sophomore has caught 66 passes for 572 yards and four touchdowns, but only averaging 52 yards a game.

Anthony Nelson and Ottis Lewis have caught 35 and 28 passes, respectively.

UMass quarterback Liam Coen won't have to think twice about stepping up in the pocket because Hofstra has only sacked the opposing quarterback seven times this season.

The Pride's leading tackler, Luke Bonus, could be one of the main reasons that the Minutemen will be successful at running the ball. The junior linebacker has 90 tackles, which includes nine tackles for loss – both leading the team.

Bonus has also registered two forced fumbles and a sack.



In the Pride's secondary, Coen will have to keep an eye on defensive backs Ray McDonough and Nick Altomare.

The two corners have picked off three passes each – McDonough returning his interceptions for 74 yards and Altomare for only eight. McDonough has two forced fumbles and 48 tackles this season.

In order to be successful the Minutemen will have to mix up their game plan to keep Hofstra's star players on their toes – guessing all game.

Marcou's vision leads

BY MELISSA TURTINEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Standing at 5-foot-8-inches, James Marcou may be one of the smaller men on the ice, but his presence does not fall short.

Marcou leads the No. 16 Massachusetts hockey team (5-3-1, 3-2-1 Hockey East) in points and goals this season, and without his natural ability to play the game the Minutemen would be lacking offensively and defensively.

He has the knack for reading the ice and anticipating plays. He sees where he should go and where to make passes with little or no hesitation.

"James sees the ice better than anybody," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "There is no one out here that has a command for where everybody is on the ice while he's playing at a high speed and then has the ability to get the puck. He shares the puck with everyone, makes great plays and he's very creative."

Marcou makes up for what he lacks in height with his strength and speed. He is an aggressive forward who forechecks deep into the offensive zone. He puts a lot of pressure on the opposing defenders and such aggression has resulted in goals for the Minutemen.

Last Friday, in UMass' 5-1 win over then-No. 1 Boston University, Marcou challenged BU defensemen Colby Cohen and picked up the puck to make a pass to line-mate Cory Quirk. The senior was streaking into the slot and backhanded Marcou's pass into the top netting for the first goal of the game.

Marcou has tallied five goals and seven assists for 12 points so far this season. He and his line-mates Quirk and senior Alex Berry led the Minutemen. The top line has earned 33 points so far this season, contributing 11 goals and 22 assists between the three forwards.

Marcou plays a significant role on UMass' first power-play unit. He, with Quirk and senior Chris Davis play key offense while typical line-mate Berry and junior Justin Braun man the points. Marcou's aggressiveness benefits the team even more during man advantages.

He has scored two power-play goals this season, the second most on the team behind Michael Lecomte. His playmaking ability is also present on the power play. He has earned two assists while a man up.

Marcou, led the team in scoring (eight goals, 24 assists), has improved his game, benefiting the Minutemen even more.

"He's that much stronger [compared to last year]," Cahoon said. "He shoots it a little bit better. He's much stronger on his feet. He certainly has the advantage from all that game experience, so he's a little bit more developed."

Marcou's strength, speed and playmaking ability will contribute to the success of the Minutemen throughout the season, especially this weekend when UMass challenges defending national champion No. 4 Boston College in a home-and-home series starting Friday night at Conte Forum (7 p.m.).

second half and we kind of let them in and they cut the lead to three."

Just as the Wildcats were looking to get back into the game, the UMass defense stepped up to put an end to the UNH rally.

Sakera Young went up and battled for a rebound, ripping the ball from the UNH player. Young then lofted the ball over the Wildcat defense to sophomore Stephanie Lawrence who was streaking down the court. Lawrence received the pass in stride, putting it in with a layup and a foul.

With the rally stopped, the Minutewomen regained their momentum and closed out the game, going up by as many as 16 with 2:14 left.

The Minutewomen dominated the Wildcats in the paint, outscoring them 18-6. Led by Wright, UMass dominated inside not leaving an open lane to penetrate, forcing UNH to settle for jump shots.

The Minutewomen limited the Wildcats to 17 points in the first half and 51 in the game. But their biggest success came in shutting down UNH freshman guard Kelsey Hogan. Hogan scored 20 points in her collegiate debut against Bryant. Against UMass, though, Hogan was limited to four points, going 1-for-11 from the floor.

Shutting down the freshman was a one of the keys coming into the game for the Minutewomen. However the main goal for the defense was to stop a UNH team that had the ability to score from behind the arc.

"They all pose a threat. They all shoot the ball very well," Dacko said. "What we were trying to do was meet them at the three-point line, so they couldn't settle in, because they do shoot the ball extremely well."

Press perfection secures win

BY MIKE GILLMEISTER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

If defense doesn't win basketball games, it at least plays a large factor in the outcome.

In the first half alone, the Massachusetts women's basketball team had 11 points off of turnovers against New Hampshire.

The Minutewomen (2-1) executed their press to perfection for the entire game. The Wildcats (0-2) seemed flustered when trying to get the ball to standout freshman guard Kelsey Hogan. Hogan had a poor handle on the ball during the game and lost focus because of the defensive pressure that she saw from UMass.

Hogan had a team-high eight turnovers and went 1-for-11 in the game.

Redshirt sophomore Diatiema Hill led the defensive effort for the Minutewomen.

Junior guard Kim Benton, known for her assists, had three defensive rebounds and two steals. By game's end, four out of UMass' starting five had multiple steals and at least one defensive rebound.

UNH had little chance on offense because the Maroon and White denied the Wildcats on the offensive glass. Overall, the Minutewomen outrebounded New Hampshire, 44-39.

"I was really happy with the first half when we came out," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said of how the Minutewomen utilized the press on defense to stifle UNH and prevent them from getting into an offensive rhythm. "I felt we had an opportunity to put them away in the first 5 minutes of the game. The bottom line is we wanted to come out and put a lot of full-court pressure on them."

The Wildcats had five turnovers in the first five minutes of the game and finished with 26 team turnovers.

"Marnie basically wanted us to put a lot of pressure on the ball," Hill said of how Dacko prepared the Minutewomen for this game. "She didn't want any guard or anyone [else] to get by us really easy or see the court really easily. If that means giving them pressure full-court then we have to stop them."

Hill's defensive assignment was junior guard Amy Simpson, last season's leading scorer for the Wildcats. Simpson was second on the team in points, with 14, but Hill bothered her enough that she shot below 50 percent in the game.

Although the Minutewomen got one block in the game — by guard Sakera Young, who had two steals in the game — they had the defensive edge in other ways. UMass had 13 steals to the six by New Hampshire.

The Wildcat starters went a combined 17-for-43 from the field — 43 percent.

"In the second half, we kind of let them in," Dacko said of UMass' lesser defensive pressure when they had a large lead — the Minutewomen led by as many as 19 points. "We were able to refocus on defense and get back into the game to take the lead."

With just over 13 minutes left in the game, UMass let its lead slip to three points, letting the Wildcats chip away at an 11-point deficit to get them back within one possession.

At that point, Dacko substituted Young in for Benton, which proved to be a key move in closing out the game. At 12:30, Young made the only Minutewoman block of the game, which swung the momentum in favor of UMass. After this, UNH made two consecutive turnovers, followed by two consecutive fouls and the Minutewoman defense stifled New Hampshire for the final time. The Wildcats missed key free-throws toward the end of the game, but it was already out of reach.

By the end of the game, the Minutewoman defense scored 27 points off of Wildcat turnovers.

Stefanie Gerardot and the Minutewomen have won two games at home since losing the season-opener to Vermont, 83-69, on Nov. 14.

Third recruit signed

The Massachusetts men's basketball team signed its third recruit yesterday to bolster its front court for next season.

Sampson Carter, a 6-foot-8-inch forward from Memphis, Tenn., signed a National Letter of Intent to join the Minutemen next season.

Carter is the third recruit that UMass coach Derek Kellogg has signed this season, he joins guards Freddie Riley and Javorn Farrell.

He graduated from Ridgeway High School in Memphis last season and is currently playing in Massachusetts at the Winchendon School. While at Ridgeway, Carter averaged 17 points and seven rebounds with a 59 percent field-goal percentage.

His school was one of the Top 25 high school teams in the nation.

Kellogg praises him as a versatile forward capable of playing multiple positions. Kellogg has known him for awhile, Carter has a connection to the school through his brother, Shyrone Chatman, the UMass Director of Player Personnel.

SPORTS THURSDAY

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 2008 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Destination Dallas

BY SCOTT FELDMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Second chances are rare.

The Massachusetts soccer team thought its loss in the Atlantic 10 tournament meant its season was over. However, the NCAA selection committee felt the Minutemen deserved one more game. Now UMass has to make the most of it.

This Saturday, the Minutemen will take on No. 26 Harvard at Rudd Field in opening round action of the NCAA tournament. The Minutemen (10-7-3) received an at-large bid to the tournament after losing in the finals of the A-10 tournament to Dayton, 1-0. It is the first time in program history that UMass has earned an at-large bid.

Both Harvard (11-5-0) and UMass made the NCAA tournament last season, and Koch emphasizes that his team faces nothing but top competition from now on.

"About 155 teams aren't playing right now, there's 48 teams that are, and those 48 are the best teams," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "We feel fortunate that we are among those 48, and we want to make sure that we're in the next 32."

Last year, the Minutemen advanced to the College Cup, an experience that has taught them to stay calm in high-pressure games.

"I don't think that the nervous jitters will be there, because we've all been [in the tournament] before," Koch said.

The Minuteman offense has found its stride over the last month, scoring 13 goals in the last eight games. UMass has three players who have scored more than 10

See SOCCER on page 9

Sophomore midfielder Ben Arikian leads the Minutemen in assists and points this season. After a 1-0 loss to Dayton last weekend, UMass recieved an at-large bid to the NCAA tournament.

Henshaw, Thomson integral on defense

BY MELISSA TURTINEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

If a team lacks defense, it doesn't matter how many goals it can score.

The Massachusetts men's soccer team (10-7-3, 7-1-1 Atlantic 10) has nothing to worry about defensively. Since the start of the season, its defense has meshed together to make a back line that can rarely be penetrated.

Starting for the Minutemen in the back is anchor Chris Brown and junior Stuart Thomson in the middle, Dan Lepone and Andrew Henshaw play the sides, and the best goalkeeper in UMass history, senior Zack Simmons is the voice on the field.

Henshaw and Thomson have stepped up and filled a hole left by Doug Rappaport and Kenny Cook.

At the beginning of the season it was unclear how well UMass' defense was going to be with two core defensemen gone, but Henshaw and Thomson have filled in perfectly to create a strong force in the back.

Thomson has gained a lot of experience this season, starting in 19 of the 20 games the Minutemen have played. In his two previous years playing for the Minutemen he earned playing time but didn't make an impact on

UMass to face No. 4 Eagles

BY RYAN FLEMING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After moving up four spots to No. 16, the Massachusetts hockey team is coming off an up and down weekend.

After beating the former No. 1 Boston University, 5-1, on Friday night, the Minutemen fell to UMass Lowell, 2-0, the following night.

Heading into this weekend's home-and-home series against No. 4 Boston College (6-3-1, 4-2-1 Hockey East) the Minutemen (5-3-1, 3-2-1 Hockey East) have to put their disappointing loss last Saturday behind them.

Friday night, UMass travels to Boston to the Conte Forum and Saturday night returns to the Mullins Center for the second part of the series.

Fortunately for the Minutemen, they are facing the Eagles at their lowest point in the season, albeit the season is only around 10 games in.

"We need to come out fast," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "We need to minimize turnovers and it's going to come down to three things I'll say all year: effort, execution and discipline."

BC is 2-2-1 in its last five games, including losses to Maine, No. 5 Notre Dame and a 5-5 tie at Merrimack.

The Eagles boast a powerful offense and goaltending that is suspect this year.

Brock Bradford was recently named the Hockey East Player of the Week. In BC's previous two games, against New Hampshire and Merrimack, Bradford tallied five goals and three assists, which included a hat trick and one assist in the tie to Merrimack.

In 10 games played, Bradford leads the Eagles with 19 points and 47 shots, the next closest player has 22 shots.

Forward Brian Gibbons is right at the top of the list with 15 points for BC. Gibbons has scored five goals and has added 10 assists. Bradford and Gibbons have registered five and three power play goals, respectively.

The Eagles as a team are successful on the power play having a success rate of 22 percent (17-for-77). And with a man down, BC is just as successful – holding opponents to a 15 percent success rate. Most of the reason for the penalty-killing units' success is the few shots they let up with a man down. The Eagles have allowed only 54 shots on 51 penalties, which comes out to only 1.06 shots per penalty.

The UMass power-play unit has struggled, going 0-for-13 in the last three games.

"We're neither totally satisfied with it or totally disappointed by [our power-play unit's performance]," Cahoon said. "We need to get a little sharper."

Boston College net minder John Muse, who was a star all of last year, hasn't found the right track so far this season.

Muse has a 3.27 goals-against average and a save percentage of less than .900 (.882).

Another weakness that the Minutemen can take advantage of is in the face-off circle. Boston College is winning less than 50 percent of its faceoffs, while faceoffs are one of UMass' strong suits.

Minutemen host Hofstra to regain pride in final game

Postseason nonexistent for teams in Saturday's match up

BY RYAN FLEMING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Coming into Saturday's game, the Massachusetts football team has only one reason to win this game, it's pride. Oddly enough, Hofstra, its opponent this Saturday, is nicknamed the Pride.

With both of the team's postseason chances over, both teams are expected to leave everything on the field in their last game of the season.

Before the Pride's (4-7, 2-4 Colonial Athletic Association) overwhelming 42-14 victory over Northeastern last weekend, it had lost four in a row. Hofstra, like the Minutemen, has lost to James Madison, Maine, Delaware, New Hampshire and Richmond. And like the Minutemen (6-4, 3-4 CAA), they have both beaten Albany.

Saturday's game will be as evenly played as any game the Minutemen have played all season.

The quarterback position hasn't been exactly the Pride's strong point. Steve Probst and Cory Christopher have been splitting time, five starts to seven. Both quarterbacks have thrown more interceptions than touchdowns and average under 200 passing yards per game.

Christopher's 66.8 completion percentage and his 1163 throwing yards would make him the most efficient quarterback on Hofstra's roster.

UMass has seen a certain strategy all season long and for the final game of the season, it should be ready for that strategy.

Hofstra runs with more than one running back, like most teams in the CAA.

Tyerette Benjamin leads the Pride with 119 rushing attempts for 550 yards and four touchdowns. At 4.6 yards a carry, the Minutemen will have to subdue Benjamin if they want a chance.

Again, the Minutemen have seen this before; a quarterback that runs. Like a few of the teams UMass has faced, opposing quarterback would use the option play to break it to the outside, and use draw plays to move the ball up the middle. The Pride will be more likely to use the run to set up the play

Minutewomen stay energetic

Mosgrove, Wright scores put team up early in first

BY NICK O'MALLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After the Massachusetts women's basketball team fell flat early in its home-opening victory against Manhattan Sunday, the Minutewomen came out strong in the first half and never looked back, cruising to a 67-51 victory over New Hampshire last night at the Mullins Center.

UMass, which struggled early on in its first two games, was explosive offensively in the first half. The Minutewomen cut down in their turnovers that plagued them in the first half last game.

Sophomore guard Cerre Mosgrove started off the game with a 3-pointer from the left side for the Minutewomen (2-1). Sophomore center Teya Wright followed by taking a Stephanie Gerardot pass in the paint and putting it in for the easy lay-in. After the ensuing score by Diatema Hill, UMass had stormed out to a 7-0 lead.

The Minutewomen's play in the opening minutes was a far cry from their first-half performance against Manhattan, something the team was trying its best not to replicate.

"We definitely didn't want to come out like last game, and that was our focus in practice," Gerardot said. "Our focus in warmups was to be ready to go right from the tip."

While the Minutewomen were sharp in their passing early in the first half, the Wildcats were beating themselves with turnovers. UNH stepped out of bounds twice, and committed a shot clock and 5-second violation early on preventing them from producing and momentum offensively.

It took UMass until 4 minutes, 30 seconds into the game to commit its first turnover. And by that point, the Minutewomen had built up a 16-5 lead.

The Maroon and white continued to pressure UNH, forcing 15 first half turnovers and limiting them to 7-for-27 from the field. UMass meanwhile seemed to score at will against a porous interior Wildcat defense.

At the half, the Minutewomen held a 30-17 lead and looked to be in position for a blowout.

In fact, the only struggles the Minutewomen had in the first half was on the foul line. As a team, UMass went 0-for-6 on free throws with four of the misses coming from Gerardot.

The Minutewomen came out quickly in the second half, with Mosgrove scoring the first points. Getting on the board first was a huge factor for the Minutewomen as they looked to prevent coming out flat from the locker room.

"We've been talking about having to pick up our energy and starting games and second halves with a lot of intensity," Mosgrove said. "Sometimes we lose that a little bit, but I think that it's really important because it got us fired up and helped us throughout the game."

However, after the first few minutes, UNH began to cut down the UMass lead. The Wildcats, plagued by sloppy mistakes in the first half, played smarter and beat the Minutewomen press.

"I was really happy with our first half, how we came out and held them to 17," Dacko said. "I though we had an opportunity to put them away in the first 5 minutes of the

New cancer dectection

BY EMILY REYNOLDS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Breast cancer screening may have a new detection method: microwaves.

Professor Anatoliy Boryssenko, from the electrical and computer engineering department at the University of Massachusetts, has received funding to develop a portable breast cancer screening device that will use microwaves instead of X-rays.

"It's quite a hot topic with other people," said Boryssenko. "This topic has been in development for some time."

Boryssenko has come up with a design that will be smaller, cheaper and easier to use to detect breast cancer in women. It doesn't replace current X-ray mammography, but it works with the technology already in place.

To screen for breast cancer, X-ray mammograms are currently used to detect tumors.

"X-ray mammography is an expensive device," said Boryssenko. "Using this to prescreen, it would help with this problem to get more people screened earlier. My goal is to develop a microwave chamber free from drawbacks of current systems."

Assisting Boryssenko with the building of the machine is UMass senior and electrical engineering major Christopher Merola, who became interested in the project after working with Boryssenko and fellow professor Daniel Schaubert in microwave labs.

"I help with a lot of the physical measuring of the device, and measuring the electrical properties of the device and building the test apparatus," said Merola.

According to Boryssenko, the breast will be surrounded with transceivers that transmit energy through the breast to transmit an image, using microwaves. If there's a tumor in the breast tissue, it will appear in the image.

As of right now, Boryssenko is still developing the machine and testing it before it can actually be used.

"We're not working with an actual breast," said Merola. "We're trying to look at background scans and data to see if we can get a clear picture."

Merola described the process as using the device to scan nothing and collecting the data, then compare that data to more data collected after scanning something that reacts with the microwaves. This will create an image comparable to images created by healthy breast tissue and tumors. Boryssenko said the

Teen pregnancy talk at UM

BY NETHA GILL
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

On Thursday, Nov. 13, Sigma Gamma Rho Sorority Inc. hosted an event in honor of their founder's week along with Kappa Alpha Psi Fraternity Inc., entitled "To Keep or Not to Keep."

The event took place in the Malcolm X Center at 5:30 p.m. at the University of Massachusetts.

Before the discussion began, there was a round of introductions, followed by an icebreaker. The icebreaker required participants to physically take sides by moving to a particular area in the room in response to certain questions on the topic of teen pregnancy.

Some of the issues addressed were parental notification on abortion, likelihood of pregnancy based on the age of one's partner, whether or not it was a man's responsibility in regards to providing and using contraceptives and the difficulty in surviving economically for a teen parent, among other questions.

Everyone in attendance was highly involved and had many valid points that stayed throughout the discussion. The question of abortion as a choice that women should be comfortable with making was brought up.

Harream Purdie, a former UMass student, said he didn't think the choice is ever a comfortable one.

As the conversation continued, other questions were asked, such as "Why talk about teen pregnancy in college," and "In regards to pregnancy in general, how are we affected in college?" Based on the input of many students, it was determined that it affects college students just as much as teens in high school or even middle school.

Jessica Toussaint, a sophomore at UMass and a member of Sigma Gamma Rho, provided some statistics on teen pregnancy. The conversation then continued with the question, "How does it affect one's family and one's community?" Many students had a lot to say about family based on personal experiences.

Mohammed Vundi, a senior at UMass, brought up the point that it could be quite a burden on families, especially when it comes to babysitting.

The next topic of discussion was relationships after pregnancy. Would the couple stay together? Get married based on beliefs? It was agreed upon that there would be tension and arguing, because the relationship is strained.

Rose Delorme, a sophomore at UMass, stated that the focus may not always be on the child and that the motives of arguing may be due to "personal drives." Another point brought up by Rick Pierre, a UMass junior, was that tension could be stirred up through the questioning of one's parenting skills.

The perception of peers and the an effect on the person and their relationships was the next topic of discussion. Many people determined that females would take the brunt of negative comments, and would be gossiped about more. One student suggested that some people think that it would be

Go 'green' in Springfield

BY SHALINI JAYARAMA
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The recently announced partnership between the University of Massachusetts and the Greater Springfield area has resulted in the first annual Clean Energy Connections Conference and Opportunity Fair, which will be held this Saturday, Nov. 22 at the MassMutual Center in Springfield.

The event, which is organized by the UMass Amherst Office of Research Liaison and Development and sponsored by several entities such as WGBY and Greendustry Park, will feature speakers, panel discussions and over 30 area employers during the opportunity fair. These will serve to inform attendees of the "green" jobs, industries and economy that the present and future hold.

The keynote speaker, Bracken Hendricks, co-founder of Apollo Alliance and a senior fellow with the Center for American Progress, will be discussing the numerous benefits of a clean-energy economy. Hendricks recently worked with UMass economist Robert Pollin to identify the employment benefits a clean-energy economy would provide as a part of a study entitled "Green Recovery."

Pollin will also be speaking at the conference. In addition to founding and co-directing the Political Economy Research Institute, Pollin has published research on ways a "green" economy can benefit the American public.

UMass graduate student Ryan Harb will also be speaking about the new Green Building program, which is a non-thesis master's degree program with courses belonging to a variety of departments.

"[The fair is] one way that we can get people thinking about how they can participate in the clean energy economy," said Ed Blagaszewski, UMass spokesman. "This is a good example of how UMass experts can get people to think about the possibilities."

Loren Walker, manager of UMass' Advanced Energy Research Initiative, said he's excited for the conference.

"The University has so much work in clean energy," said Walker. He added that he wanted to "connect this work with the public."

According to Walker, the notion of holding such an event was first discussed as early as one year ago with Paul Kostecki, UMass' vice chancellor for research and engagement. The initial planning began in June of 2008.

"[We] joined forces," Walker said of the UMass-Greater Springfield area partnership's role in the organization of the event. He added that what makes this event special is "the people that came together to make it up."

Over 410 people have registered to attend. Walker expects a lot of people to attend and looks forward to seeing "people connect with one another."

In addition, over 190 organizations, companies and groups will be represented.

"[We have the] potential to build a 'green' economy here," said Walker.

The event is open to the public, but registration is required. The conference will run from 9 a.m. through 4:45 p.m., and the free opportunity fair will begin at 1:45 p.m. For more information, or to register, visit the Clean Energy Connections Web site at Umass.edu/green or call 413-545-2706.

"dumb" if someone were to get pregnant in college, especially with all the available resources on campus.

Finally, the question of the night, "To keep, or not to keep?" was put out in the open by discussing three options that someone can choose once becoming pregnant other than keeping the baby: emergency contraception, adoption or abortion.

The main debate with emergency contraception was whether or not it's just another form of abortion.

One student said that technically it would not be, because it would be more likely that someone wouldn't know if they were pregnant, since it is taken in the span of 48 hours.

Some believed the opposite.

"It could be a potential child that you are killing," said Delorme.

One thing that was agreed upon was that emergency contraception should not be a substitute for condoms or other methods of birth control.

The discussion was concluded with Coleman and Toussaint discussing the numerous resources on campus and in the Amherst community that are available, such as University Health Services, Men's Resource Center, Everywoman's Center and the Women of Color Leadership Network.

Anonymous mailer leaves town puzzled

BY COLIN MCDONALD
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

This Monday, almost half of the 247 town meeting members of Amherst received anonymous postcards in the mail. Though there was no threat in the message, some of the recipients found the mass mailing unsettling.

Known only as "a concerned citizen," this mystery mailer has certainly caused a stir in local communities. But without proper cause to investigate, the case may never be solved.

In an e-mail to the town meeting coordinating committee, Town Moderator Harrison L. Gregg addressed the issue and said there was no reason for any members to be alarmed. Gregg assured them that the Amherst Police were contacted about the matter.

Two versions of the same letter were released to the town meeting members. Both letters included the statement that meeting attendance would be recorded and mailed to all of the Amherst citizens. The longer of the two also stated the "concerned citizen" would also mail how each member voted at the meeting.

None of the intended actions are illegal, as the town meetings are open and the votes are public. However, the mailer stressed that if members did not attend the meeting their votes would not be recorded and mailed to the entire town.

Amherst was not the only town to be hit by the mysterious mailer. Dartmouth, Falmouth and Brookline all report receiving the same message from Nashville.

Many people in these towns are just as perplexed by the message.

"The post cards were unusual, and some people – myself included – were a little spooked by them," says town meeting and Selectwoman Stephanie O'Keeffe. "To find out that they were also sent to town meeting members in other towns takes away the concern factor, but makes them even more mysterious."

While the police are allowed to look at the facts, it would be illegal for them to take any true action. To do so would infringe on the First Amendment.

On his blog "Only in the Republic of Amherst," self-proclaimed community watchdog and town meeting member Larry Kelley confirmed himself as a recipient of the mailings. In an e-mail, he also stressed that there should be no investigation. The lifelong resident is taking the situation lightly, stating many Town Meeting members "overreacted."

While the idea that an anonymous person would mail so much postage is baffling, some are bewildered at the cost of this postage.

According to Kelley, if all 247 town meeting members in Amherst were contacted it would cost $67 in postage. If the mailer follows through with his plans to mail the vote positions to all citizens in the town of Amherst, he's looking at over 8,000 more postcards.

The price for postage would be staggering. Assuming the individual did the same for residents of the other three towns, it would cost several thousand dollars.

Kelley stated there are no real controversial issues that will be brought up at the next public meeting.

Why someone might dissuade attendance to the town meeting is still unclear. Without proper incentive, nothing can be done about one "concerned citizen."

microwave sensors will be assembled in the next few months and that he can start testing breast simulators with phantom tumors inside. He is hoping to move onto animal tests over the next year.

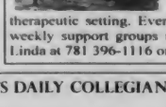
This is not a new idea, but a new take on another one started in 2002.

"It achieved some level of maturity with other groups, but it's not complete," said Boryssenko. "There's an expensive. It's bulky and not for wide use. Just a couple of people a day can use it."

His goal is to develop a device that can be taken out of hospitals and into other countries for affordable mass use. However, making it inexpensive may take some time.

"We used existing components from other projects and adapt them because the cost is not cheap," said Boryssenko.

The chamber itself, the microwave transmitters and the software to develop images all has to be created.



"We're looking for a different way to power it," said Merola. "Australia is looking for a different method that will be faster and cheaper. We're trying to make it look promising to get more funding."

Boryssenko has been working at UMass since 2000, and has been working on this particular project for two years, and was previously a professor at the Kiev Polytechnic Institute in Ukraine.

"I see the research that other people are doing and I think I can contribute to that research with my experience and ideas and my knowledge," said Boryssenko.

Prep offers students quality

Local makeup store schools students on beauty bounty

By Eden Unver
Collegian Staff

College students are constantly on the go, but that doesn't mean they don't want to look their best. A new store that just settled into the Amherst community is making this tricky task a breeze.

Lauren Frank, Prep Cosmetics' creative director, realized there were no high quality beauty product stores around her while she attended the University of Wisconsin – Madison. Not long after, Frank opened the first location of PREP on State Street right in the busy college district of Madison. The company has since expanded, and a Prep Cosmetics opened in May 2008, less than a mile from the University of Massachusetts campus. This store brings easily accessible beauty products to local students. Prep is the first store of its kind in the Amherst area.

Prep's President, Emily Kulmer, had a similar experience closer to home.

"I went to college at Smith and remember there were few options for us," Kulmer said. "Given the complete lack of skin care and makeup stores in the area, prior to the opening of Prep Cosmetics, we are proud to bring a much-needed addition to the Amherst community."

Frank emphasizes the mission of the store to enable locals to find high-quality beauty without risking their own comfort.

"Our goal is to be a neighborhood store. It's the opposite experience of going to the mall and feeling pressure to buy at the counters of a department store," Frank said.

Also, unlike the department store makeup counters, Prep can customize a look with a variety of brands, not just the one brand a salesperson has available at one makeup counter.

"What's great about our store is that we can pick Napoleon Perdis mascara matched with Julie Hewett lipstick and a Becca foundation for a customer, getting the perfect look for them," said Kulmer. "We don't have to recommend just one line."

This small scale shopping experience mentality is echoed inside the store itself. Prep is a brightly lit, cozy store filled with colorful rows of makeup and sweet-smelling products.

"Our store isn't huge, like a Sephora, so by design we've tried to keep the experience intimate while offering the best range of products," said Kulmer. "If you think of Sephora as being a supermarket, then Prep would be the specialty, gourmet charcuterie."

The store, however, is not a far departure from the generally health conscious Amherst atmosphere. Prep carries a few product lines that are paraben-free.

"As we learn more about the effects the chemicals in our products have on our health, the more we want to provide alternative options that could be healthier," Kulmer said.

The idea of high quality products and a small store environment may leave many college students fearing for their wallet's safety, but Prep has something for everyone.

"We're also super conscientious about carrying products in a range of price points," said Kulmer. "Prep, as a brand catering to college students, understands that students are on budgets and we want to make sure we have something for everyone."

UMass sophomore Vanessa Lashua would not mind popping into the store sometime if the price was right.

"I would definitely check it [Prep] out if they were fairly priced products," said Lashua. "I've always wanted to go to a department store to get my makeup done, but I'm afraid they're going to make me buy too many products."

The store aims to get students to try new things and experiment with new looks without feeling pressured to buy too much. Kulmer noted that college is a great time to play with new looks and have fun. Some might have skin problems during this time too and they can find the high quality products they may need inside Prep.

"I try new looks when I'm at school," said UMass junior Gina Angiolillo. "I'm more adventurous with makeup."

Lashua also tends to be more daring with her makeup while at college.

She said she likes to experiment with bold eye shadows and different colors. Lashua said the brand of make-up doesn't really matter to her because if she tries something and likes it, she'll use it regardless.

Luckily, in the makeup world right now, experimentation is what it's all about. According to Frank, the use of color in creative ways is hitting the beauty and makeup scene hard right now.

"The red lip is a classic, but it can be kind of overwhelming," Frank said. "You could try a lip gloss instead of a lipstick."

For a twist on this classic, Frank recommends a lip gloss by Stila Cosmetics in the "Cranberry" shade, and a stain by Stila called "Cherry Crush" Lip and Cheek Stain.

"It's very natural looking, but you can play it up for night," Frank said.

Looking good at college tends to be important, but who has the time? That's why college students cut corners to save some of their precious time.

Kelsey Whiting-Jones, a UMass junior, shares her time-saving secret: makeup remover wipes.

"[Makeup remover wipes] are good for the gym, for washing your face on the go and you can just put them in your bag when you go out if you don't know where you'll end up," Whiting-Jones said. "Or if you go out drinking and you want to still make sure you're face is clean by the end of the night."

Taking care of your skin, even at the latest hour, can really pay off, Frank says. It may be tempting to fall asleep with makeup on at college, so a good makeup remover is amazing. A busy college student can really appreciate something that saves them both time and money.

"I cut, highlight and style all my friends hair. Boys, girls, everyone," said UMass junior Dina Shulman.

Shulman also finds that mineral powder foundation is an easy way to make skin look even. She said you don't even need to look while you put it on and it can be done in as little as 30 seconds.

One product that can do double or even triple duty is another way to save on time and cash.

"I use Oil of Olay moisturizer like it's my job," said Whiting-Jones. "It removes my eye makeup, I use it on my lips, and it's good for dry skin anywhere."

Sometimes it's as easy as a squirt of perfume. Angiolillo says as long as she smells good, she feels good even in her sweats.

To help keep the getting-ready routine as quick and painless as possible, Kimberlyanne Moriarty, the Amherst store manager of Prep, recommends three products that no college girl should do without.

First up is concealer.

"Whether you're going on a date and a huge pimple just showed up on your forehead, or you have a job interview at 6 a.m. with no sleep and need to hide those awful dark circles under your eyes, concealer can be a lifesaver."

Moriarty recommends Stila's perfecting concealer because of its silky texture, its ability to blend well and the fact that it comes in 10 shades.

Next is mascara because it helps draw attention to your eyes. Eye contact is key in a competitive professional atmosphere; why not make it memorable and glamorous?

Moriarty recommends Napoleon Perdis Mme Fantasia Mascara in a dark black or Julie Hewett Rose Scented Mascara in a soft brown.

And last but not least is face wash.

"A fresh face is memorable under scholarly stress and life in a co-ed dorm."

A good one to pick up, according to Moriarty, is the Mario Badescu Orange Face Cleanser, which is soft and creamy, but really removes dirt and oil built up in pores. Another bonus is that the fairly large bottle is only one or two dollars more than the typical Neutrogena brand cleaner sold at drug stores like CVS.

According to Kulmer, Moriarty and the rest of the Amherst staff make incredible gift baskets, which make great presents and are also sold at a discount.

Also, keep an eye open for Prep's in-store events with nationally recognized makeup artists. If students give Prep their information, they'll get invited to special events the store hosts. Prep is located at 220 North Pleasant St. in Amherst.

SOM club applies business skills

Assets acquired through running campus coffee shop with ULead

By Alyssa Montalbano
Collegian Correspondent

Whether you're just beginning college or going into junior or senior year, it's always a good idea to join different clubs on campus to get more involved with the college community. It also looks great on a resume. For students looking for a relaxed, fun club where professional and personal development is taught through a variety of activities and events, the Undergraduate Leadership Council is the place to find it.

ULead is a club located in the Isenberg School of Management (SOM), open to all majors within SOM at the University of Massachusetts.

"What sets ULead apart from the other clubs is that it's actually a smaller club and everyone ends up being friends with each other," said Quyen Nguyen, a board member and UMass junior, who joined her freshman year. "If I'm hanging out in the atrium, I might end up sitting with three other ULead members. It's a comfortable club, whereas if you go to a bigger club with 100 to 200 members, people don't actually get to know each other."

Steve Rajcula, a UMass senior, has taken over the reigns as president of ULead, and he has specific goals he's striving to achieve. First off, he wants to get more new students involved with the club.

"My vision of what this club is and what it can also become is a great launching pad for new students, especially students that are undecided in their major to get involved in the school," Rajcula said.

Rajcula's second goal is to get students involved within the community and to let the students know what it's like to help someone else in need. This year, the group volunteered at a Halloween activity for children.

He also wants members to know what it's like to be part of a student run business, like The Morning Grind, which raises money for the group. The Morning Grind, located in the SOM atrium, serves 100 percent organic Pierre Brothers coffee, which is also fair trade and kosher. This is intended to show the members how to run a business on a small scale.

"It's funny, because when you get volunteers instead of paid people, you really get the devoted employees that really want to help, instead of the people that are looking to get a return for it," said Rajcula.

Members are given a taste of what it's like to deal with staffing and inventory sales, and how to deal with customer service and customer complaints or concerns. At each biweekly meeting, members have a chance to give their input on how to make the business better and generate more revenue. All profits made go directly to the club.

"Working at The Morning Grind teaches you skills that you really couldn't learn at a normal job, because the difference between working here and working at, say, Starbucks, would be that we try to get the students involved with inventory and we teach them how to order the supplies and staff the shifts and how to see the profits, revenues and losses. It's just a great experience," said Perry Rosenfield, club member and co-manager of The Morning Grind.

Other than The Morning Grind, ULead's other major fundraiser is working concessions at the UMass football games. The ULead members assist the concession managers by delivering hot chocolate to different booths and by selling cold items, such as peanuts, kettle corn, candy and drinks to fans.

Professional development is a big part of the club. Members have the opportunity to network, write resumes and become prepared for getting a job when graduating. Guest speakers are invited to talk to the students about how they secured the position they're currently working in and how they manage making a profit with community responsibility.

There are also fun events that the students are encouraged to participate in, such as the annual volleyball tournament. Different SOM students and faculty make teams and compete against each other. This year, the group has also taken a trip to Mike's Maze.

"When you're in a boring class with someone, you know them from this boring class. You don't really get a chance to talk to them," said Rajcula. "But when you go on a fun event with them, it's so much different. People open up, you can get to know the people a lot more, and that's going to make you more willing to work with them on projects later."

Another annual ULead event is the Target Proposal, in which different groups within SOM compete to create a proposal to be in leadership with not only college students, but high school students as well. The proposal has to include Target's names and ideas within the event.

ULead came up with the idea to put on a leadership event for freshmen students. The freshmen are given a scenario, for example find the items needed for a mother of six with a two-year-old child, with only a budget of $200. The students then needed to decide what was more important: food or water, diapers or clothing, etc. At the end, the items the students picked were donated by Target to local shelters. Also, the winning club was awarded $1,000. Last year, ULead's proposal won.

ULead members encourage other students to participate in this great opportunity to make new friends and learn different skills in order to succeed in the business world.

"This club is a great way to meet people. You get to choose between all the different events you want to get into and there's a lot of variety," said Andrew Arguelles, club member and co-manager of The Morning Grind.

The next club meeting will be held on Wednesday, Nov. 26 at 8:00 p.m. in SOM, room 106. For more information on the club, e-mail Steve at president@u-lead.org or visit them on the Web at U-lead.org.

Invest wisely

Matthew M. Robare

Last week, the Massachusetts Daily Collegian reported that all Five College Consortium schools had taken hits in their endowments because of the lessening value of the stock market. UMass' endowment took a loss of 5.7 percent and Amherst College's lost 25 percent. The fact that our schools are suffering hits in the pocketbook is just another example of the poor economy — an economy that Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke declared to Congress he had saved on Tuesday.

However, Massachusetts Fourth District Representative Barney Frank pointed out that that bailout funds were being used to shore up financial institutions and not to help homeowners. Ignoring the issue of the correctness concerning a massive bailout for anyone, the fact is that even having the Treasury Department buy up all the bad mortgages would not "save" the economy, and would do little to save college endowments.

It's just too complex a system for one variable to be altered to have a saving grace on the other variable instantly.

The shocks of the initial effect that led to the recession are not through yet, as far as I can tell. Of course, the majority of the public and the politicians have very short memories with regards to economics issues. So when the next domino falls, it will be taken as an isolated entity — a new crisis instead of a continuation of the old one.

Consequently, the fixers and schemers will come up with new fixes and plans for the "new" crisis instead of waiting out the storm and letting their portfolios catch up. The great paradox is that each new fix makes it harder and harder for the economy to adjust to the previous one.

We can therefore expect to see our schools' endowments shrink more, funding from the Commonwealth and federal government continue to be cut and the schools to keep admitting more freshmen far in excess of the residential capacity.

The schools need to act before students are packed like sardines in even smaller dorm rooms, before the Worcester DC becomes standing room only and before they cut heating in half in the middle of winter because it's "environmentally sound" instead of telling the truth: "We can't afford it."

I'd rather not have to wear my winter coat to bed (a bed I'd probably end up sharing with three freshmen).

It's vital that the school protect its endowment through even more conservative investing (if not outright withdrawal and hiding all that cash in a vault beneath Whitmore) like real estate or taking out life insurance policies on students living in the Southwest towers. A good source of quick cash could be selling naming rights to buildings, the campus pond, rooms, chairs, trees, anything. (Heck, we students should try that – I could be Converse All Star Robare or A&W Root Beer Robare)

Bad investments need to be liquidated — and fast.

The boom in campus construction is a sure sign of bad investment. Like the building on Commonwealth Ave. near the Mullins Center, what exactly is that? Could they turn the Studio Arts Building into unfurnished apartments and rent them out? Amherst College is already reigning in its spending by ceasing renovations to the Lord Jeffery Inn.

All five schools are in a hiring freeze (although I notice that we did just hire a vice chancellor and buy a $500,000 supercomputer, along with those signs for residential areas), and I'm hoping that they continue to review all expenditures and make only the necessary ones.

Obviously, I'm not the administrators and bureaucrats and accountants who know all of the information and exactly how things are paid for and by whom. Although as students, we should have access to that information, after all.

As students, we pay for a lot of our education and as taxpayers we (or our families) pay for most of the rest of it. We should have more say in determining how the money is spent and we should know where every dime is going.

Even though institutions of higher learning are not democracies, we supposedly live in one and should demand transparency from our school like we should demand transparency from our government.

Even though institutions of higher learning are not democracies, we supposedly live in one and should demand transparency from our school like we should demand transparency from our government. An awful lot of people think that rising fees and tuition mean the school is fleecing them. Only the accountants and administrators have the numbers to tell us for certain.

The University must act to ensure not only its financial survival, but more importantly its survival as a school. Admitting more and more people to the University tends to mean that standards are being lowered, and what happens when standards hit rock bottom?

For a school to have standards so low that the high school students who should have received Fs in public schools and still received passing grades can attend college as long as they have the money is any University's doom. Hordes of the illiterate are more terrifying than hordes of creditors.

The democratic voice of the dollar

Rachel Dougherty

Californians are changing their minds like a girl changes clothes: compulsively, irrationally and indefinitely.

The passage of Proposition 8, which defines marriage explicitly as the union between a man and a woman and overturns the Supreme Court's decision to legalize same-sex marriage in May of this year, reflects the deep division that exists among the people of California. However, it also reflects the influence that outside interest groups are beginning to have over state legislation.

Last month, CEO Alan Stock of the Texas-based Cinemark Corporation privately donated $9,999 to support the passage of Proposition 8 in California. His contribution was just one of many that came streaming into California from across the nation last month to fuel one of the most expensive campaign wars in the history of California politics.

As Californians shuck same-sex marriage legalization for a more conservative Proposition 8 and proponents of both sides of the issue mobilize to raise money and awareness across the country, we have to ask ourselves: Is the vote an expression of the democratic will of the people or the bank accounts of private contributors?

The campaigns for and against proposition 8 were the best funded and best publicized of any issue on the ballot that day, and the second-best funded of any campaign nationwide after the presidential campaigns. Together, the two sides raised more than $73 million to try to sway the people's vote through advertising and demonstrations.

In the aftermath of Proposition 8, interest groups across the country are already mobilizing to support or oppose the issue in the likelihood that it'll appear on the ballot again.

The trouble is – it isn't up to the country to decide what's right for the state of California. At least, it isn't supposed to be. It is supposed to be up to the citizens of California, a reflection of the will of the majority.

No matter your personal politics, most Americans agree with the basic principles of democracy – the idea that the actions of the government should reflect the will of the people.

Democracies aren't designed to directly protect individual liberties. They're designed to act on the will of the majority with the idea that this will indirectly ensure individual democratic rights. This is the democratic process.

The trouble is – it isn't up to the country to decide what is right for the state of California. At least, it isn't supposed to be.

But when private interest groups use money as a means of interfering with state politics, it corrupts the democratic process and oppresses the basic rights of the people. It's something that's true of democratic politics in nearly every form, the one with the biggest wallet and the biggest mouth gets what they want.

Democracy – the political system that was intended to give everyone a voice regardless of socioeconomic status – is still a rich person's government. And it will continue.

Those against gay marriage will try to buy voters through advertising and campaign contributions. Those in favor will do the same. Each side will protest, argue and bicker. And the democratic voice of the people will be lost.

A false alarm for terrorism and bigotry

Alana Goodman

Walking to class on Tuesday, I couldn't help but notice remnants of a rally decorating the steps of the Student Union. "End Islamophobia!" was scrawled on the sidewalk in chalk, and discarded posters read "Stop Bigotry!"

A flyer inside the Student Union explained that the rally was held to condemn a recent anti-Islamic hate crime that occurred at a Dayton, Ohio mosque. It was sponsored by the Muslim Students Association (MSA), as well as other campus groups like the International Socialist Organization, the SGA and the Office of Jewish Affairs.

The MSA's Facebook page gave more details about the hate crime.

"On Friday, Sept. 26, 2008, Muslims worshiping in an Ohio Mosque were attacked by perpetrators who used chemical weapons against them. The chemical gas used burned at the eyes, throat and lungs of the 300 people inside the Mosque, most of whom were children. This was an act of terrorism perpetrated on American soil against innocent civilians who were engaged in their constitutional right to worship freely," reads the page.

After reading this, I was astonished — as I'm sure you are — that such a despicable act of intolerance occurred in this country.

I was even more surprised to discover the catalyst for this violence.

"This horrific attack occurred shortly after the start of a distribution campaign in Ohio of an anti-Muslim documentary called 'Obsession,' which portrays Muslims as violent extremists, all in order to create an atmosphere of fear right before the Presidential Election," the MSA reported.

So John McCain supporters distributed anti-Islamic propaganda that incited a chemical warfare attack against hundreds of Muslims? How, I wondered, did the media fail to report this startling story?

Until I remembered that they didn't.

The story first appeared in the Dayton Daily News on Sept. 27 under the title "Chemical irritant empties Islamic Society of Greater Dayton's mosque." The article reported that a 10-year-old girl was in the basement of the Dayton Islamic Society when two strange men came up to the window. The girl claimed that they sprayed her in the face with a can of pepper spray, or a similar chemical irritant.

So why are student groups on campus still insinuating that hundreds of Muslims were injured and calling this incident an "act of terrorism" when these claims have been blatantly disproved?

Overeager blogger, Chris Rodda, picked up the story and wrote about it on the Daily Kos on Sept. 28, under the title, "Muslim Children Gassed at Dayton Mosque After 'Obsession' Hits DVD." Much of the information the MSA is dispersing is directly quoted from Rodda's blog entry.

Rodda's sensationalized, third person account of the story drew attention from many bloggers, who cited the incident as proof that anti-Muslim hate crimes are increasing. That was until Dayton officials released statements that put a damper on the excitement.

HAZMAT crews, who arrived at the scene shortly after the attack, reportedly found no chemicals in the area or on the 10-year-old girl.

"Whatever chemical was released dissipated too quickly for us to determine what it was," HAZMAT Team Coordinator Denny Bristow told the Dayton Daily News.

Far from the image of carnage that Rodda's article evokes, only the girl and another woman from the mosque were taken to the hospital after complaining of nausea. Some others at the mosque complained of eye irritation and a medical team cleansed their eyes on site with wet towels. There were no serious injuries.

But the story gets even more interesting. Police soon announced that they found what they believed was the offending can of pepper spray inside the mosque. An Oct. 7 article in the Dayton Daily News reported that police suspected a member of the Mosque may have sprayed the girl, and were questioning a 10-year-old boy in connection with the incident. Dayton Police Chief Richard Biehl also said the incident wasn't a hate crime.

Rodda has since apologized for exaggerating the event.

"I was mad, so I sort of shot from the hip," she told the Dayton Daily News.

When I spoke with the Dayton Police Department on Wednesday, the Superintendent of Investigations said that the case "seems to have hit a dead end...no one [from the mosque] has contacted us after the initial [911 call]."

Others who originally labeled the incident a hate crime have also backed away from the case. The Council on America-Islamic Relations (CAIR), a prominent Islamic activist group, originally supported the Dayton Mosque and even helped issue their press release. However, CAIR currently makes no mention of the incident on their Web site.

I contacted CAIR on Wednesday to ask if they were pursuing this issue on a national level.

"No," was the terse reply from their Media Relations Director Ahmed Rehab. Two months after the incident, virtually no Islamic advocacy organization will touch the case.

So why are student groups on campus still insinuating that hundreds of Muslims were injured and calling this incident an "act of terrorism" when these claims have been blatantly disproved?

Why are they promoting unsubstantiated belief that the movie "Obsession" contributed to this crime, when it's now apparent that the attacker was probably another child at the mosque?

Rallying against bigotry is a noble idea, but basing it on this sham hate crime was irresponsible and unnecessary.

Why is it only the birds and the elderly that get to migrate south for the winter?
Not fair.

O.A.R. played Tuesday night at the Mullins Center to an excited crowd. The band performed a mix of old favorites and new hits to please long time fans and expose newer ones to the band's unique live experience.

Of A Revolution rocks the Mullins Center

By Brittainy Bell Dalphond
Collegian Staff

Tickets for Tuesday night's O.A.R. concert with Virginia Coalition were not hard to come by. General admission floor tickets were still for sale the day before, but don't let that fool you.

Both bands are known for their high energy live performances, and under the bright lights of the Mullins Center, they did not disappoint.

Opposite the stage was the "eco-village," a grouping of green tents with merchandise and information on how to be more eco-friendly. As fans waited outside, people passed out stickers and pamphlets on Reverb's Eco-Concert Program that describe just how "green" the tour is.

General admission floor meant standing room only, but it also meant the opportunity to be up-close-and-personal with the bands. For fans that were there when the doors opened at 6:30 p.m., it meant finding the front of the stage. They were pressed against the barricade, just feet away from the performers.

But there's a price to pay for a great spot, and it isn't the $32.50 they spent on the ticket.

Virginia Coalition and O.A.R. fans were ready and willing to give up the comfort of their personal bubble, and accepted the likelihood of sore legs and feet that they would undoubtedly awaken with the next day.

The crowd was calm as they waited for the show to start, with an occasional shout for O.A.R. or Virginia Coalition. Fans chatted and looked for friends. Those on the floor planted their feet in determination to not lose their spot.

As the lights on stage flickered and changed direction, the crowd erupted into cheers as Virginia Coalition took the stage.

Andy Poliakoff, Virginia Coalition's main vocalist, clad in a plaid button-up, jeans and shoes that looked teal under the lights, introduced the group as "a bunch of friends that have known each other for many years."

After a few of their original songs including "Lonely Cowboy" and "Stars Align," the group opted for a change of pace.

In an effort to send out good energy from the stage to the crowd, they burst into "Lean On Me," and got exactly the reaction they hoped for.

The crowd burst into cheers and joined in on the singing and clapping, but a young man in the very front row was looking increasingly uncomfortable. His dance was not in time to the music, and eventually he decided to dance his way off the floor, never to find his way back to that spot.

VaCo, the fans' nickname for the group, went into a few more of their own songs, including "Sing-Along" before ending their set with "Home This Year," the title-track off their latest album.

As fans waited for O.A.R. to take the stage, crews removed Virginia Coalition's instruments. A security guard at the front remarked that he'd "never seen so many miserable looking people."

This statement received odd looks from fans as they attempted to breathe in their North Faces that were warm enough to protect them from the night's frigid air, but far too warm for the comfort of a concert. The fans all stood shoulder to shoulder with people they had never met before and would probably never see again.

This is just another price to pay for the benefit of a live performance.

As the lights came on a second time, choruses of cheers rang through the crowd as O.A.R. took to the stage.

Marc Roberge, the guitar-playing vocalist, came out in his usual concert attire, a black t-shirt, jeans and sneakers as the band immediately dove into their song, "The Wanderer." The crowd danced and sang along as lights flashed blue, yellow and white above the band.

The group launched into a few more of their older songs like "Destination," "Hey Girl" and "Delicate Few," which made a clear distinction between the long-standing and the newer fans.

When the group switched into music from their latest album, "All Sides" with the song "This Town," the crowd blew up.

Apparently, their new music also called for crowd surfing. While it may have been tons of fun for the inebriated ones being thrown toward the line of security at the front of the stage, the people at the front of the crowd didn't seem too happy with having to turn away from the stage to make sure they weren't about to have a person dropped on their head or take the heel of a girl's boot to the face.

O.A.R. played on, often opting for long instrumental breaks until the crowd calmed a bit, as they went on to play "On My Way" and "Anyway."

The crowd had calmed by the time they broke into "War Song," a song for and about the men and women of the armed forces written after meeting soldiers during their USO Tour of Iraq and Kuwait. The song was an effort to tell a "story about the warriors and not the war."

The group moved into another crowd pleaser with "Lay Down," but the crowd truly erupted when the band began to play "Love and Memories."

A budget-friendly Turkey Day

By Andrew Sheridan
Collegian Staff

As Thanksgiving draws near, most students are looking forward to going home to a warm bed, working laundry machines, and most importantly, a turkey dinner with their family. Not everyone, however, has this luxury.

Many students are too far from home to make the trip for a four-day weekend. Instead, they're stuck in apartments and dorms fending for themselves on our national day of feasting.

For those who are away from home this holiday weekend, do not despair. While you may think of Thanksgiving dinner as an extravagant affair, full of pricey and complicated dishes, the core foods can actually be prepared on a college budget.

The most important thing to remember when shopping for the budget feast is that freshness is not your friend. Cans and boxes are cheaper than fresh fruits and veggies, and are easier to prepare.

Making mashed potatoes from scratch can be delicious. However, it takes a lot of time, a full spice rack and nearly twice the funds as a box of Betty Crocker instants.

Almost any vegetable you could want on the table can be bought canned and pre-cooked, requiring only a microwave to make it delicious. Classics such as cranberry sauce and gravy also come in cans.

Once you've picked your fixings, you need a turkey. Turkeys start at about eight pounds, which is a good weight for a small gathering. If you want to have plenty of meat for leftovers (and everyone does), plan to buy about two pounds of bird per person.

Frozen turkeys are the most common, and for the amateur chef, the self-basting variety is a must. Self-basting birds are injected with broth, seasonings and butter before being frozen, and cook nicely.

The bird itself is only part of the Thanksgiving masterpiece. No real gobbler is complete without a good stuffing, and a little bit of effort (and inexpensive ingredients) can really spice up your average box mix.

Ingredients:

- 1 box Stovetop Stuffing mix
- 1 can turkey broth (optional)
- 1 stick butter
- 1 roll Jimmy Dean's regular pork sausage meat (not links or patties)
- 1 lb. of dried cranberries (optional)

First, thaw the sausage meat. Break it up in a skillet and cook until browned. Next, prepare the stuffing according to the directions on the back of the box. Turkey, or chicken, broth best if you have it, but water works fine. In the last stage of the preparation, mix the sausage into the stuffing mix, for a heartier flavor if you're in the mood for a touch of sweet, add a handful of dried cranberries.

Now, it's turkey time.

What you need:

- A roasting pan or similar pan deep enough to hold the bird and juices. Disposable roasting pans are available for short money.
- Aluminum foil
- Stuffing
- 1 stick butter, salt and pepper

Wine varietals & pairings

By Jennifer Tessier
Collegian Correspondent

"Penicillin cures, but wine makes people happy." – Alexander Fleming (1881-1955), the Scottish bacteriologist credited for discovering penicillin in 1928.

This week, I'll be introducing you to several different grape varietals, and the general rules of food pairing. This is just the tip of the iceberg, as far as wine choices go, but it's best to start with the most well-known varieties and learn from there.

When it comes to breaking wine down into categories, you have the two most common divisions – whites and reds. This can further be broken down into sparkling wines or champagnes, roses or blushes, and dessert wines, such as port. However, for today I will just be exploring popular whites and reds.

Whites

Chardonnay – One of the most popular and easy to find in restaurants. Depending on the style, it may be very dry, with little to no residual sugar and very crisp, or smoother and more oaky, with a buttery finish. Chardonnay grapes are one of the most adaptable and easiest to grow which explains why this wine is found in almost all wine growing regions.

Pinot Grigio – Italian variety of the Pinot Gris grape. Very light-bodied and crisp, slightly acidic, and can vary from semi-dry to dry. It's refreshing on a hot day.

Riesling – Can range from semi-dry to sweet. This varietal varies greatly depending on whether or not it is an authentic German Riesling or an American Riesling. The German style tends to be a bit sweeter and fruitier, with a hint of apple.

Sauvignon Blanc – Originates in the Bordeaux region of France. It's a delicate and elegant wine that works well with many foods, and is one of the only wines to pair well with sushi. It can vary in taste from earthy to tropical, depending on the growing conditions.

Reds

Merlot – One of the most popular single-variety red wines on the market, and is generally smooth and fruity. Not as heavy and acidic as some other reds.

Pinot Noir – The lightest and easiest to drink out of the reds. Originally a French grape, it's also found in California and Oregon. Extremely hard to grow, which accounts for the delicate taste.

Cabernet Sauvignon – The granddaddy grape of Bordeaux, it's very bold and rich. Much heartier than the other grape varieties, and used often for blending. It's excellent with steak.

Syrah/Shiraz – The name changes based on where the grape is grown. Shiraz grapes are from Australia where Syrah grapes are found in Europe, the United States and South America. Full-flavored and can be spicy, especially with Australian Shiraz.

As for pairings, the most basic and elementary rule of thumb is that whites go best with poultry and fish, whereas reds are best with red meat and hearty pasta. The most important thing to remember about this rule is there are always exceptions, and it should only be used as a guide.

Drink to impress this year at Thanksgiving dinner

By Tim McCall, Melissa Garber and Brian Wood
Collegian Staff

The holiday season officially begins on Thursday with Thanksgiving. This holiday isn't just about football, turkey and having the day off from classes. It's also a time to impress your family with your new-found respect for beer.

If you think you'll impress them with Keystone Light you might as well never leave the kids table, ever.

To write this week's column, I recruited two of my friends, Melissa and Brian to find some beers to go with every aspect of Thanksgiving. Some of our picks were successful, others were not. This is Melissa's first Thanksgiving at the grown up table, and her contribution also marks the first time this column has gone co-ed.

The pilgrims were one our nation's first groups to settle in the new world and to love beer. Soon after settling, John Winthrop sent for 10,000 more gallons of beer for the new world. Hell, one of the first buildings to be constructed at Plymouth Rock was a brewery. This is even more impressive when you consider what their basic recipe was (think Colt 45). Regardless, men, women and even children drank beer after a long day of farming.

This holiday season is a great time to stay true to the origins of Thanksgiving. Let's improve on the beer though, shall we?

Mayflower Golden Ale (Plymouth)

Despite the fact this brewery only opened this past January, you could have found this stale ale in the hull of its namesake on its maiden voyage to Plymouth. For better or for worse, a hint of raisin is in this brew.

Samuel Adams Black Lager

Like coffee to keep you awake after feasting on turkey? This black lager is brewed with actual coffee extract. The head fades fast and leaves little lacing on your glass, but the bitter hops and chocolate linger on your tongue after your first sip.

This is the perfect late-night pre-dessert beer.

Saranac Caramel Porter

One whiff of Saranac's Caramel Porter could make any candy lover salivate. It's not the smell of stove top caramel that wafts from this Porter's bottle, though. It's 10-cent hard candy.

When poured, its amber color is far lighter than your standard porters – practically transparent. One sip will bring you back to the misguided saccharine sweet taste of Werther's Originals, melted and added to a mediocre porter. Better to save your calories for a more delicious dessert this Thanksgiving.

Harpoon Winter Warmer + Harpoon Cider

Something went terribly wrong when Brian mixed Harpoon's hard cider and Winter Warmer 50/50. It's not called Harpoon's Apple Pie for nothing, but the smell was more Stop and Shop than Grandma's.

The Winter Warmer defies the traditional lagers of the colder months with its light, but strong nutmeg flavor. The cider was tart and sweet – just what a hard cider should be – but it overpowered the combination. This drink is better suited in latte form at a convenience store.

Butternuts Porkslap Pale Ale

Despite its unorthodox appearance (A childish-looking can with two pigs belly-slapping on the cover) and strange name, Butternuts Beer and Ale out of New York has a winning product with this farmhouse ale. Porkslap is more reminiscent of an English bitter than a true American Ale. It pours a rich copper color with a nice head for an ale.

As for the flavor, there are obvious notes of ginger, and the hops and malts are exceptionally balanced with the hops lingering into the aftertaste. Porkslap is a perfect compliment for any Thanksgiving meal.

Brooklyn Black Chocolate Stout

If spicy isn't your thing, Brooklyn Brewing Company's Black Chocolate Stout is the perfect nightcap beer. At 10.6 percent alcohol by volume, this Russian style imperial stout is also the strongest beer on the list. The stout has a rather mild head for such a robust brew; but delivers where it counts most: flavor and aroma.

The scent of roasted malts and dark chocolate emanate immediately upon pouring. After one sip, intensely rich chocolate comes to the forefront. With each passing sip, notes of caramel and molasses slowly reveal themselves. A limited seasonal offering, this stout is a can't-miss for the holiday season.

Tim McCall is still looking for other avid beer drinkers to accompany him on his adventures. Interested people must be 21 years of age, willing to write a portion of the article after the tasting and willing to pay for their portion of the beer purchased.

If you're stuck on campus and don't feel that you have the funds for an extravagant dinner, don't fret – there are cheap alternatives that are delicious.

A cheap feast fit for kings

First, you need to thaw your turkey. You would be wise to start thawing two days before by leaving it in the refrigerator in its original wrapping. If you're on a time constraint, thaw it in a sink full of cold water, again leaving it in the wrapping. Never thaw at room temperature or in warm water, as this will ruin the texture of the meat.

Next, preheat the oven to 325 degrees and line the bottom of your roasting pan with aluminum foil. Then, check to see if your turkey has been cleaned, or gutted.

Many frozen birds today come pre-cleaned, but if the giblets, or internal organs, are still intact, they have to go. Once it's clean, pack it full of stuffing. If you happen to have an onion lying around, cut it into quarters and stuff those inside the body cavity as well.

Melt the butter, and then brush the skin with it. Once it's nice and buttery, rub the skin with salt and pepper into the skin for that classic crunchy flavor.

Once you've done all this, place the turkey breast side down into the roasting pan. This allows all the juices to flow into the breast meat for the tenderest meat possible. Then cover the turkey in aluminum foil and put in the oven. Roast for three to four hours for an eight-to-12-pound bird.

While the turkey is in the oven, prepare your vegetables and side dishes, and don't forget to heat up the canned gravy. In no time, you will have a feast fit for a prince, on the budget of a pauper, in the comfort of your home away from home.

Good luck, and happy Thanksgiving.

Reputations stay intact

O.A.R. from page 8

O.A.R. fans showed their love as they broke into the third verse of the song during the instrumental break and Roberge showed his appreciation and surprise as he applauded.

If anyone thought the fans couldn't be happier, they wouldn't have been ready for what came next. As O.A.R. played "Shattered," a track from their latest album, the lights and smoke created a replica of the music video on the stage of the Mullins Center, and the crowd knew every word.

They kept the energy high as Roberge invited Andy from VaCo to sing along with him to a classic crowd pleaser, the Beatles' "With a Little Help from my Friends" and ended on a high note with "City on Down." They waved goodbye, but the crowd wanted – they knew better.

Within minutes they were back to play "Black Rock" and the song that catapulted them, "Crazy Game of Poker," before saying their final good-bye to the crowd.

Long-standing fans were surprised that the show went by without "Night Shift" or "Heard the World."

As the house lights came on, and the crowd began to disperse a voice, almost too faint to be heard over fans chatter, a voice came over the loud-speaker to say that the show would be available on reusable flash drives, a quick reminder of the eco-friendly group that had put on the tour.

It was almost 11 p.m. by the time people made their way home.

In all, it was an exhilarating concert with both bands living up to their reputations as outstanding live performers.

Holiday wine ideas

If you enjoy red wine with chicken or white wine with steak, then by all means drink what you like. Don't ever feel like you need to order a specific wine based on what you are eating.

Recommendations for Thanksgiving

So, what pairs best with turkey and stuffing? Chris Charette of Russell's Package Store in Amherst said Rieslings and Pinot Noirs are the way to go, and had some suggestions to fit your price range.

Recommended Rieslings

Budget: Dreitor L 2007 (German), average retail price of $9.99.

Mid-Range: Leitz Dragonstone 2007 (German), average retail price of $13.99.

Premium: Trimbach 2006 (France), average retail price of $17.99.

Recommended Pinot Noir

Budget: Domaine Brunet 2006 (France), average retail price of $8.99.

Mid-Range: Huttenberg 2006 (California), average retail price of $13.99.

Premium: Buena Vista Carneros 2005 (California), average retail price of $17.99.

Though he spoke passionately about all the wine suggestions, the Trimbach Riesling was Charette's top white choice. "It's sweet, but not high in residual sugar with beautiful acidity and a long finish."

When I asked him to describe his premium red pick, the Buena Vista Carneros, Charette said it had a "classic style. It's fruity, smooth, supple, bodied and textured." Sounds good to me.

Whether you choose one of the recommended wines or go with something else, enjoy your Thanksgiving and use the break to explore some wine!

Wine fact of the week: California produces approximately 77 percent of the U.S. wine grape crop.

Two guys, one column

We here at The Massachusetts Daily Collegian – and by we I mean myself and Mr. EIC himself, Michael King – have been covering UMass sports for far too long.

So who better to go to when you want to know the results of Saturday's irrelevant football game – before it even happens?

In every Collegian Weekend Edition for the rest of the year, we will be prognosticating every UMass sporting event – no matter how inconsequential.

Just remember, you heard it here first.

Friday, Nov. 21

Hockey @ No. 4 Boston College. (Rosenswaike) For the record, Michael is a closet BC fan – so it'll be interesting to see which team that he loves he'll pick to win.

Personally, I don't let personal feelings enter the equation. I see a better team (BC) playing at home, so I'm picking BC to win. This isn't complicated. Eagles win, 3-1.

(King) The obvious answer here is to pick the teams to split this series, with each defending its home ice. But there's something about BC's three lines of talented goal scorers that impresses me. Putting possible fan questions aside, Eagles win in Chestnut Hill, 5-2.

Men's and Women's Swimming & Diving at Terrier Invitational (Boston). (King) With eight other regional squads participating, local bragging rights are up for grabs. At this point in the season, each coach will want to see how his swimmers compare against the best competition, not necessarily about winning the meet. Look for the Minutemen to finish second, while the women's team takes a fourth place finish.

(Rosenswaike) These are always tough to predict. It would be easier if swimming and diving was like all the other sports, with a ball and two teams. But this just gets complicated. I say the men's team one-ups your prediction, Michael, and takes the invitation. The women will finish second.

Saturday, Nov. 22

Men's Soccer vs. Harvard (NCAA tournament first round). (Rosenswaike) Make fun of me all you want Mike, but I'm refraining from making a prediction on this one since I'm covering this game for The Daily Hampshire Gazette. You're not a journalism major, so you haven't learned about journalism integrity. It's OK, I forgive you.

Eli Rosenswaike

Michael King

(King) Apparently someone is taking himself a little bit too seriously here. How's the job search going, buddy? Anyway, the Minutemen have proven to be unbeatable in playoff soccer at home. Assuming that no UMass players confuse which net to score in, the Minutemen win 2-0.

Football vs. Hofstra. (King) With UMass completely eliminated from the playoffs, this'll be your last opportunity to sit in the McGuirk Stadium press box and pontificate about how poorly the Minutemen are playing, right Eli? Or maybe it won't since we all know you're coming back for a sixth year. If not, I bet Target will give you Saturdays off so you can cover this team next fall. Anyway, UMass wins 31-14.

(Rosenswaike) Pontificate…is that on your word-of-the-day calendar Mike? I'm not going to even respond to your other comments – taking the high road. Oh yeah, football. They're playing terrible football of late, but I would be legitimately shocked if UMass doesn't win – and do it convincingly. The Minutemen win 31-10 as Liam Coen ends his UMass career with a great game – and deservedly so. I know the football team is Division I-AA (FCS my…), but the student body should appreciate all that he has accomplished.

Hockey vs. No. 4 Boston College. (Rosenswaike) With UMass at home, this should be a better game – but that didn't exactly turn out to be the case against UMass-Lowell Saturday night. I'm going to go out on a limb here and say these teams tie, 2-2. I'm also going to say ties suck. As Herman Edwards would say, "You play to win the game!" But no one will here.

(King) Let's hope for UMass coach Don Cahoon's sake that the Mullins Center crew can keep the ice frozen this time. Otherwise the Minutemen may want to petition the conference to let this one be played on roller skates. Regardless, UMass will skate to a 1-1 tie with the triumphant return of Dan Meyers to the crease.

Sunday, Nov. 23

Women's Basketball @ Maine (Augusta, Maine). (King) The Minutewomen set the precedent for games against regional rivals with a 16-point win over New Hampshire Wednesday. I'll assume UMass keeps it going and earns a 77-59 victory over the Black Bears.

(Rosenswaike) Maine is 0-1 this year and lost by 67 points. Not kidding. Granted, it was to No. 6 Duke, but that is flat-out embarrassing. Even worse, Maine had more turnovers (38) than points (31). Maine's coach should've been fired before the second half started. UMass wins handily, 75-60.

Monday, Nov. 24

Men's Basketball vs. Jacksonville State. (Rosenswaike) The only time these teams played each other (2006), UMass won 100-66. But they had Matt Pennie back then, so I think the Minutemen may be in trouble. Kidding aside, coach Derek Kellogg is smart enough to know to schedule a cupcake-game in his home debut as coach – UMass delivers the Gamecocks an 83-64 defeat.

Tuesday, Nov. 25

Hockey vs. Vermont. (Rosenswaike) There are a lot of hockey games this upcoming week. Since I picked UMass to lose and tie in the previous two, I'll give them the win this time. I'm fair like that. UMass wins 3-1.

(King) Here's another Hockey East team that's been just as hot-cold as UMass. If the Catamounts get strong play from their goaltending tandem, this team is almost unbeatable. But look for the Minutemen not to be looking ahead to turkey time and cruise to a 4-1 victory.

Men's Soccer @ No. 8 South Florida (NCAA second round, if necessary). (King) Unfortunately for the Minutemen, weather will be a factor here, as UMass won't be able to leverage a frozen field to its advantage this time around. If the Minutemen knock off Harvard, I see them falling to a more talented South Florida squad, 3-1. No matter what happens, the Minutemen have had the most impressive fall season at UMass for the second consecutive year.

(Rosenswaike) Hold on a second, chap. Are you forgetting the field hockey team? They made the NCAA tournament too, and were ranked this season – unlike the soccer team. Anyways, if UMass does make it this far, I think they'll give South Florida a great game, but ultimately lose, 2-1. Again, how you predict a team – no matter how good – to score three goals off of Simmons is beyond me.

Scores and Smack

Last week: Rosenswaike 6-3, King 6-4
Season: Rosenswaike 13-7, King 11-10

(King) I'm playing this week under protest. Though it appears that I have an inferior record, I made an effort to pick every game. So how was that story you wrote about the field hockey team last weekend for The Gazette, Eli? Interesting because I thought I saw you following the game via the Internet on our couch … hmm, sounds like good journalism.

(Rosenswaike) At least you acknowledge that 6-3 is better than 6-4. It seems like you've been paying close attention in your SOM classes and don't need that tutor after all. You can protest this week all you want, but there's no debating that I still have the better record this year.

You can't beat me, or anyone in your accounting or law classes. You're pretty much a failure.

UM travels to Maine

By David Brisch
Collegian Staff

After an impressive defensive performance in which the Massachusetts women's basketball team dominated in the paint and forced key turnovers against New Hampshire Wednesday, the Minutewomen will travel to Augusta, Maine on Sunday to face Maine at 2 p.m.

"They will be ready to play," UMass Coach Marnie Dacko said. "They opened up with Duke, and that's tough. But nevertheless, they had enough guts to play them."

The Black Bears won their two exhibition games before getting crushed by the sixth-ranked Devils in their season opener that featured Maine committing more turnovers (39) than scoring points (31). The Blue Devils translated the turnovers into offensive production, scoring into 44 points as Duke cruised to a 98-31 victory on Nov. 16.

The Blue Devils out-rebounded the Black Bears 56-17 and held them to one field goal over the first 12 and a half minutes of the game while not letting them reach double digits until one minute before halftime.

UMass (2-1) defeated the Wildcats (0-2) thanks in part to a team effort on the defensive and offensive sides of the court.

Four Minutewomen scored in double figures, while redshirt sophomore forward Diatsenna Hill added seven rebounds and four assists as UMass held a 17 point lead before UNH went on a 15-2 run to cut the lead to three.

But the Minutewomen made another defensive stand, and stretched the lead to 19 with just under eight minutes left in the game.

"I want us to get better, so we have two days before Maine, so we have to keep going," Dacko said.

UMass will look to exploit the Black Bears lack of size on Sunday, as the team doesn't have a player taller than 6-foot-3.

They've been outrebounded 56-17, while not being able to incorporate their front court in the offensive game plan.

Maine was outscored 50-13 in the paint by the Blue Devils, who have a number of players over six feet.

The Minutewomen outscored the Wildcats Wednesday 28-20, thanks in part to Hill and sophomore forward-center Teya Wright, who added 10 points while recording three steals.

Last year, the Black Bears traveled to Amherst, as 10 Minutewomen scored in double figures on the way to an easy 74-55 victory, keeping UMass undefeated at the Mullins Center nine games into the 2007-2008 campaign.

This contest also saw Dacko's squad playing team-oriented basketball, recording a season-high 24 assists on 27 field goals, while 10 UMass players recorded points. Pam Rosano led the team with 19 points and six assists, while Kate Mills and Kate Benton contributed 16 points and 13 points, respectively.

With Rosanio and Mills lost to graduation, senior guard Stefanie Gerardot and Wright have already established a connection in the offensive zone.

Gerardot leads the team with 22.3 points per game, while Wright is in second with 10 points per game.

UMass and the Black Bears will meet for the 18th time Sunday, with the Black Bears holding a 10-7 advantange in the all-time series dating back to the 1970-1971 season.

The Black Bears have young talent in freshman forward Samantha Baranowski, who scored nine points in her first collegiate game against the Blue Devils. Junior guard Amanda Tewksbury and freshman guard Jasmine Rush each had seven points.

Even though this game looks like a mismatch on paper, Dacko still wants her team to come out with the same intensity that paved the way to a lopsided victory against the Wildcats.

"I told the kids that we are climbing a mountain, and we are still at the base, so we have a long way to go."

Younger players stepping up for Minutewomen inside

By Nick O'Malley
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team lost a lot from graduation last year. However, what the Minutewomen lost more than anything was size and an inside presence.

UMass lost its two top scorers from last year, but retained senior Stefanie Gerardot, who is averaging 22.3 points per game, and is making up for the loss.

In addition to losing its top scoring threats, UMass graduated four of its top five rebounders from last year. Most importantly, the Minutewomen lost forward Kate Mills.

Mills, the team's leading scorer and rebounder from a year ago, was the foundation for the Minutewomen. In addition to leading the team in blocks, Mills accounted for more than half of the team's blocks a year ago with 68.

Of the three upperclassmen on the team this year, Gerardot is the largest at 5-foot-10, but rarely plays inside. The Minutewomen's veteran group also includes 5-foot-5 guard Kim Benton and 5-foot-7 Sakera Young.

Therefore, the burden of the team's inside presence has fallen upon sophomore Teya Wright. At 6-foot-1, Wright has played well for the Minutewomen. She's currently second on the team in scoring and first in rebounds.

Wright's minutes, however, have been cut down due to injury and UMass coach Marnie Dacko taking her out to rest. Wright suffered a minor injury during last week's game against Manhattan, but Dacko kept her out as a precaution.

In her wake, the Minutewomen got major contributions from freshman Nicole Jones and sophomore Valerie Avebe.

It was the first major playing time either player received, and they made the most of it. Jones pulled in five boards, but Avebe, who was in the game late, got two clutch scores that helped the Minutewomen seal the 71-68 comeback win.

The contribution from her young players inside has Dacko pleased with how they've grown.

"I think when you look at her, you look at [Jones], you look at [Avebe] and you look at [sophomore] Stephanie Lawrence, either inside or out. I think they've gotten very strong, but we have to get stronger," Dacko said.

Jones and Avebe were able to contribute once again in UMass' game against New Hampshire on Wednesday. Wright started the game and played well, but Dacko pulled her for rest after she missed some open shots.

"Teya ran out of gas, but I was very happy with her performance," Dacko said. "She was there, she had a lot of post presence. But she missed a lot of easy buckets and I think those buckets, the more times she takes them, the better she's going to be."

Going into the game, the Minutewomen were looking to exploit a weak inside game from the Wildcats.

"I thought their post play was not going to be as strong as ours so we were trying to get more post looks. And then they had to double up on the post, freeing up out perimeter people allowing them to create on the perimeter," Dacko said.

The rotation of young players has worked out for the Minutewomen thus far, as they've dominated their opponents inside. UMass has outscored their opponents in the paint, 108-66.

UMass will look to continue it's dominance inside when it goes against Maine on Sunday. In their last game, the Black Bears were trounced by No. 5 Duke, 98-31. In their rout, Maine was beaten in points in the paint, 50-14. They were also outrebounded by the Blue Devils 56-17.

Swimmers, divers set for Terrier Invitational

By Kyle Preiki
Collegian Staff

The first invitational tournament of the season has finally arrived for the Massachusetts swimming and diving teams. This will be the third year in a row that the two teams travel to Boston to compete in the Terrier Invitational hosted by Boston University.

Three swimmers on the men's team claimed first at last year's event. Juan Molnere finished first in the 100-yard freestyle event, Brian Schmidt in the 200-yard breaststroke, and Mike Berthuame claimed the podium in the 200-yard butterfly. Although the women's team couldn't notch any top spots last year, a few came close. Karen Upperco finished second in both diving events, while Christa Narus placed second in the 200-yard butterfly stroke.

This year, the men look to continue their undefeated record in the Terrier Invitational. With the help of Nate Bromage, last week's Atlantic 10 Performer of the Week, and Jason Cook, last week's A-10 Rookie of the Week, the men's swimming and diving team seems well equipped to do so.

In the competition this weekend, look for the normal standouts to finish in high spots on the final day. Juan Molnere will look to repeat his previous win in his individual event while freshman standout Jason Cook looks to prove himself on the diving boards. Cook will look for revenge at Boston University as his only loss on the diving board came from BU's top diver.

Freshman Joey Sbordon will also add a twist to the competition. Sbordon, with only a single loss in all his individual collegiate events, will look forward to competing in the finals on Sunday.

Nate Bromage and Mike Berthuame will also continue the one-two punch they've had all season. This past weekend, Bromage finished first in his two butterfly events, only to have Berthuame nipping at his tails for second in both races. Berthuame, along with Molnere, Andrew Willbrant, and Brian Schmidt, will compete as part of the 200-yard medley relay team while Bromage and Molnere will assist Sbordon and Max Butler in the 400-yard freestyle relay.

On the other side, the women's swimming and diving team will be looking for an inaugural first-place finish at this year's Terrier Invitational. In previous years, the women's team has always had a strong showing, but couldn't keep the consistency throughout the entire weekend. This year will hopefully be different for the Minutewomen.

As predicted at the beginning of the season, Elizabeth Walsh has turned up the heat for the women. Walsh, who keeps putting tallies in the first place columns, swims her strongest in the 100 and 200-yard backstroke but is now expanding her reign onto the 100-yard freestyle as she took first this past weekend at Binghamton.

Senior Christa Narus, who came close to a winning spot last winter, has the ability this year to claim a first spot in one of the butterfly events.

Rounding out the women's team in the diverse roster is Kayla Tegeler. The freshman competed in two events last weekend at both ends of the swimming spectrum, finishing first in the 1000 yard freestyle and 200 yard butterfly stroke. Tegeler, an example of how the team is built of well-rounded swimmers, should be put to the test in her first collegiate invitational tournament.

The three-day event is always a favorite for both the men's and women's teams. Both are built around events like this, which is similar to the Atlantic 10 Championships in the future. The men have the skills to continue their undefeated record, 4-0, while the women's team will try for their fourth win of the season.

Breaking down the dribble-drive

UMass assistant coach Vance Walberg created the dribble-drive offense back when he coached high school. The offense is currently being used by numerous Division I basketball teams and even some NBA teams.

Walberg brings offensive creation to UMass; simplifies the Xs and Os of the dribble-drive

By Jeffrey R. Larnard
Collegian Staff

Memphis was just 2.1 seconds and a miracle 3-point shot by Mario Chalmers away from an NCAA Championship last season.

It wasn't Vance Walberg's team, but it was his offense.

Walberg created the dribble-drive motion offense while he was coaching in Fresno City, Calif. He experienced success with the scheme at both the high school and community college levels, but it wasn't until he went to study former UMass coach John Calipari that it started to get national recognition.

Six years ago, Walberg went to Memphis to study Calipari, but instead he became the teacher.

"Every year since 1987, I would go to a different coach to watch his practice," Walberg says. "I would spend the week with them and I did that just so I could get to know more myself, get better and do different things that way."

One night while Walberg and Calipari were discussing their philosophies at a Memphis steakhouse, Calipari – the Division I and former NBA coach – asked the community college coach what he ran.

"You really don't want to know, it is a little bit off the wall," Walberg told Calipari.

But Calipari insisted, and using salt and pepper shakers and sugar packets, the two discussed the X's and O's of what Walberg ran. Five years down the road, Calipari was playing in the NCAA championship game with the offense he had adopted from Walberg.

With just over 2 minutes, 12 seconds remaining, Calipari and his Memphis team had a nine-point lead over Kansas. The Tigers had executed the dribble-drive offense to a 31-1 record and were on the brink of the most coveted prize in college basketball.

Memphis proved that the offense could be used to win a national title; it was just a few missed free throws and one memorable shot that prevented it.

While Calipari and the Tigers made their run through the NCAA tournament, Walberg spent time with the team, including its assistant coach, Derek Kellogg. As soon as Kellogg knew he was coming back home to coach the Massachusetts men's basketball team, he asked Walberg to join his staff as his assistant coach.

Kellogg planned to implement the dribble-drive offense with the Minutemen, and who better to help him than the man who created it.

THE PLAIN AND SIMPLE

The dribble-drive motion offense was originally named AASAA, or attack, attack, skip, attack, attack, by Walberg to get the point across as to what he wanted his players to do.

"Obviously it says attack, attack, skip, attack, attack. So there are four attacks, which means what? Attack. We want to get to the hoop as much as possible," Walberg says.

The offense is based on the premise of getting the most points per possession; by either driving and getting a three-point play the old fashion way, or by hitting one from 3-point range. As the AASAA title describes, the main focus is to attack and for the point guard to get to the hoop.

The offense gives the point guard a lot of freedom and encourages him to take his man on 1-on-1. To help with this, the offense tries to open the court up as much as possible, opening up gaps for penetration. The offense creates the needed space by having its basic set-up with four players on the perimeter. It also creates space by moving the post player to the opposite side to leave the driving lanes less cluttered.

If the point guard begins to drive but is unable to beat his man, he is given numerous options, such as a lob pass to the four-man or a skip pass to his three-man who may be open to shoot a three. Where the point guard distributes the ball has to do with where he is on the court, and who comes in to help on defense.

When a guard drives to the basket, most teams are taught to collapse in on him, closing the lanes as he tries to go for the layup. When this happens, the guard running the dribble drive must recognize where the help is coming from and quickly make a decision.

With the dribble-drive offense, there is no need to call plays. Once players are proficient at running the offense everything just flows into one another.

PICKING YOUR TEAM

The dribble-drive offense is an offense that requires players who are skilled at driving to the hoop as well as others who are knockdown shooters. Strong guard play is essential to the offense.

The prototypical one-man according to Walberg is a point guard who can get to the basket and set everyone else up. The guard must be quick on his feet to understand what zone he is in and to make decisions on whether to continue to the goal or dish the ball off to an open teammate.

As for the two-man, a guard who is a sniper first and thinks drive second is best. The same can be said for the three-man who will help keep defenses honest on the perimeter and stretch the defense out for the point guard to penetrate.

The four-man is what Walberg calls the biggest key to the offense. He is also a player who needs to be able to run the court. It's also essential for him to have an understanding of the offense, because the four-man needs to know when to "clean-up", "T-up" or "relocate".

As for the five-man, he is another player who thinks drive first and 3-pointer second, just as the one-man.

The personnel that UMass has fits well into what works best for the dribble drive according to Walberg. Chris Lowe is a speedy guard who knows how to get to the basket and score, while at the same time understands how to set others up and make them better.

The tandem Kellogg and Walberg have at the two- and three-man are almost exactly what they would want.

"Ricky [Harris] can shoot the ball very well; there is no doubt about it. Anthony [Gurley] can score from the three, so you have two pretty darn good perimeter guys right there that can do it," Walberg says.

The only concern for the assistant coach comes with Gurley (6-foot-3, 185-pounds) and Harris' (6-foot-2, 185-pounds) size. Walberg says it's best to have one of the two be in the 6-foot-5 to 6-foot-6 range.

At the four-man, the Minutemen have Tony Gaffney who Walberg feels is perfect for the role.

"Tony is one of those guys who just has high energy, high motor, complete team player and he is just one of those guys who is really good at that spot," Walberg says of the team captain.

Luke Bonner also is helpful to the offense because of his versatility. Bonner is a big man who can also move outside and shoot the outside shot, giving the offense another threat from beyond the perimeter.

THE ZONES

There are four zones that the offense must know when playing the dribble drive: the breakdown zone, drop zone, drag zone and rack zone. Depending on how deep the guard gets in as he drives, the offense must react according to what zone the guard is in. The guard, who will be the player most often driving, must have an understanding of the zones as well, so he knows when to pick up his dribble, pass the ball or continue to the hoop.

The first zone is the breakdown zone which is located above the 3-point line. While here, the offensive player must decide whether he will be able to beat his man to get to the hoop, or how far he can get in the key, whether it is to the drop or drag zone. The main goal is always to get to the rack zone, located below the low blocks on each side of the key. Getting there gives the offense a chance for the two highest points per possession plays in lay-ups and free throws.

The sooner the attacker realizes he cannot get to the rack, the better. If he is able to pick up his dribble in the drop zone, located on the left and right side of the key between the free-throw line and the 3-point line, it gives him more options because this is the area where the offense really gets in motion.

The next zone is the drag zone, which is located in-between the drop and rack zones, from the foul line down to the low blocks on both sides of the key. If the racker is stopped here, he will look to the perimeter for someone open for a 3-pointer, whether it is the three-man or the five-man.

PENETRATION

Much of how the offense moves depends on where the penetration comes from. Two types of penetration are the lane penetration and middle penetration. Both start with the basic half-court positioning of the dribble-drive offense: the one-man and five-man split right and left, respectively, at the top of the 3-point line, the two- and three-man on the perimeter in the right and left corners, respectively, and the four-man on the post opposite the one-man.

With lane penetration, the one-man will drive down the court on the opposite side of the post-man with all intentions of getting to the rack. If he can't beat his man and get the layup there a numerous options. If the four-man's defender comes to defend on the penetration, the one-man can dump the ball off or give a lob pass to the four-man.

Once the one-man passes the drop zone, the offense begins to move. The four-man looks for a pass from the one-man or cleans up any missed shots. Another option for the one-man is to pass to the two-man for a 3-pointer if his defender comes in to help on the penetration. Both the three- and five-man drag to find open windows for passes from the one-man.

The five-man drags over to where the one-man began and the three-man drags up along the 3-point line to where five-man first was. This allows the one-man to find either an open three-man or to pivot and pass the ball back to the five-man, and then move under a screen set by the four-man and shift over to where the three-man originally was positioned. This sets the offense back up as it started and allows the five-man to now repeat the process.

The other type of penetration is the middle penetration. Here, the one-man penetrates down the middle of the key, toward the four-man. Once the four-man realizes the one-man is penetrating up the middle he relocates to the opposite block looking for the lob pass or to clean up.

Now the offense moves in a mirror image to lane penetration. The three-man stays put, looking for a skip pass for an open three (just as the two-man does in lane penetration). The two-man drags up (just as the three-man does on lane penetration) and the five-man drags behind the one-man looking to back up him up if he gets caught too deep.

As the guard drives his first look is always to go to the hoop and then to the four-man. If neither of those options are available he then looks for two other options, the drag five or drag three. The drag five is when he hits the five-man as he drags behind and is open for a 3-pointer. The five-man will always be open because defenses are taught to collapse on the guard as he penetrates. The drag three is when the one-man hits the three-man for an open 3-pointer on a skip pass if the three-man's defender comes in on the penetration.

The final type of penetration is baseline. Here, the two-man brings the ball up the court and penetrates along the baseline. Once the four-man sees this he must do what is called a "T Cut", moving up toward the foul line and then back to the rim looking for a lob pass back from the two-man. The one-man drags behind the two-man looking for a pass if the play needs to be reset. The five-man drags up looking for an open window and the three-man stays put in the corner looking for a skip pass along the baseline.

All three types of penetration are based on getting to the hoop and creating gaps and spacing, for better penetration and to open up skip passes for open threes.

STOP, DROP AND PASS

If getting to the hoop is not possible, the next best option is to stop in the drop zone. When the one-man does this it gives him two options.

The first is the drop zone backdoor. Here the one-man picks up his dribble in the drop zone and the two-man must recognize this. As soon as he does this, the two-man calls for the ball as he cuts backdoor. The four-man must also realize that the dribble has been picked up, and consequently cut toward the foul line to open up the middle, creating space for the backdoor pass.

Once the two-man receives the ball, the four-man cuts back to the hoop looking for a lob pass and the three-man stays put in his corner looking for a pass for an open three. The five-man rotates over to try and find an open window.

The second option is for the drop zone no backdoor. Here it starts similar to the drop zone backdoor, but when the backdoor is not available, the two-man continues running baseline towards the three-man's corner. The one-man now hits the four-man who was cutting toward the foul line and does a give-and-go. If that is not available, the four-man has a quick out to someone on the perimeter.

KICK IT

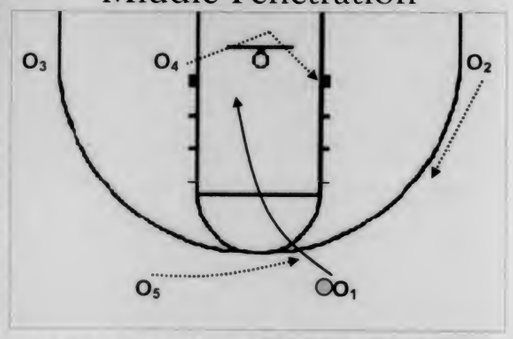
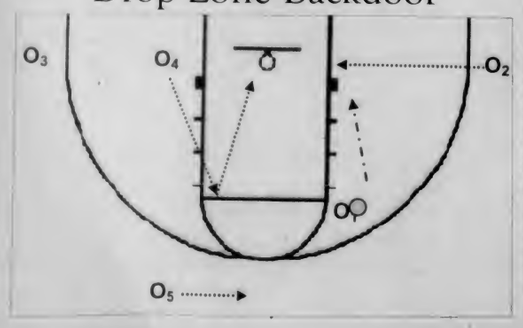
Once the defense starts looking for the backdoor plays, the offense adjusts and starts to run kick-ups or kick-backs.



A kick-up is when the defense is overplaying the back door. Instead of running backdoor once the one-man stops in the drop zone, the two-man runs up and receives a pass from the one-man. At this point the two-man is thinking going to the basket and runs a middle penetration. The one-man relocates to the two-man's corner and then the offense runs middle penetration.



When the defense jams the one-man or forces him toward the middle, the offense runs a kick-back. Here the one-man dribbles to the left and the five-man comes in behind to receive a pass. Now the five-man heads to the hoop, running a regular lane penetration, with the one-man rotating over looking for a pass if the five-man goes past the drop zone but cannot reach the rack.

Walberg has worked and tweaked with the offense for years now and has been able to see what works and what doesn't with it. Now with Kellogg trying to implement the offense at UMass, Walberg will be able to help speed up the learning process with his years of experience with it.

Costs hinder most qualified

Amid sliding market many postpone school

By Ricky Flynn
Collegian Staff

With the economy on a downward slide, many of the best and brightest college-eligible students in the country have decided to forgo attending universities for various reasons, such as financial inability, declining financial aid availability and the emergence of online courses.

In a recent study composed by the Institute for Higher Education Policy and the Education Resources Institute, about 1,800 high school graduates who don't attend college were asked various questions as to the factors that lead them to forgo a college education.

Of the 1,800 students surveyed who don't attend college, 1,000 didn't even enroll in college. Of the population who didn't enroll in college, 48 percent was made up of various minority groups such as African American, American Indian, Hispanic and Asian, many from low income families. Only 32 percent of those surveyed who don't attend college chose to visit a college during high school and only 10 percent took the SAT test.

According to the IHEP, an individual who is "college qualified" is one who has earned at least a 2.5 high school grade-point average, taken a "college-preparatory curriculum" such as Advanced Placement (AP) courses, and taken some advanced level of mathematics. However, many of the polled students were well above the minimum standards considered to qualify for college. Half of the students had a GPA of 3.0 or above and about 60 percent had participated in a pre-calculus, calculus or trigonometry class.

President and CEO of the private loan guarantor TERI Willis J. Hulings, III stated the data for the survey was pulled before the "credit crunch" and anticipates greater difficulty for those who view loans as a barrier to college education.

"In this case, if you look at low-income families in particular, I believe you may have some who have experienced a relative who had difficulty with a credit card or had a card repossessed," said Hulings. "Some folks may be culturally averse to debt. They may not believe in using debt for anything and working on a kind-of cash."

Michelle Cooper, President of IHEP, believes that financial issues are what deter most applicable students from attending college.

"All individuals should be given the opportunity to reach their full educational potential. We should have high expectations of all our students, no matter where they came from. We can't afford to lose millions of students in the pipeline just because they are financially needy. As a society, we assume people who don't have money have less potential. We don't believe that at IHEP," stated Cooper.

Some schools are taking steps to make going to college more affordable for students. Georgia's Hope Scholarship Program guarantees a student full tuition to a state college for a specific number of credit hours if they graduate with a 3.0 GPA or higher. Indiana's Twenty-first Century Scholars Program pays four years of tuition at a public state institution for low-income students who maintain a cumulative GPA of at least 2.0.

Along with financial inability, another reason students are not going to college is the increasing popularity and availability of online education.

In a survey conducted in the fall of 2007, the amount of students enrolled in at least one online course rose 12.9 percent from 3.43 million in 2006 to 3.94 million students in 2007.

"Clearly there will be a limit on the growth of online enrollments. However, the current data shows that this limit has not yet been reached, as double-digit growth rates continue for yet another year," stated the report conducted by the Sloan Consortium.

See ENROLLMENT on page B3

Students wait in line to pick up their excess checks at the Bursar's Office in Whitmore. Money is especially hard to come by in this economy, a situation that has many of the most qualified students staying home.

A day to remember

Individuals across the country held rallies and services remembering transgendered victims of violence.

Transgendered, allies host annual holiday

By Matt Robare
Collegian Staff

Around 40 people gathered in Amherst's Unitarian Universalist meetinghouse Thursday for Transgender Day of Remembrance, an annual holiday dedicated to remembering those who have died in the past year because of their gender identity or expression.

The service began with all the participants fighting red candles in white wax paper cups and marching from the meetinghouse to Main Street and back in freezing temperatures, distributing flyers to explain the day's significance along the way.

Every year, those who gather for the holiday do the short march in an attempt to raise the transgendered community's visibility in Amherst. This year the streets were mostly empty, though many heads were raised from inside restaurants.

Once the candles were extinguished and everyone had settled back into their seats, University of Massachusetts Amherst Stonewall Center Director Brett-Genny Janiczek Beemyn introduced two speakers, Jennifer Levi and Yohah Ralph, who are both leaders in Amherst's transgender community.

Levi spoke movingly of her friend Penny, who passed away some years ago, saying that Penny "lived her life with authenticity, and in doing so challenged others to live their lives with authenticity."

Levi then told the story of a bill introduced last year to Massachusetts Legislature that would have outlawed most discrimination based on gender identity. Several transgendered individuals testified to the judicial committee about the need for such a bill, but ultimately it died in the committee. Levi said that behind closed doors, legislators were uncomfortable discussing transgender issues.

Later at the gathering, while the floor was open to all, attendee Alvin Burgher asked rhetorically, "I don't get how someone can say they're uncomfortable dealing with this issue … they're more comfortable with people dying?"

Board to pick nursing dean

By Gary Tarantino
Collegian Staff

Two candidates for the position of dean of the School of Nursing are scheduled to visit the University of Massachusetts campus this month. They will be involved in open meetings with UMass faculty, staff and students.

One of the finalists is Gail McCain, professor and senior associate dean of the Ph.D. program at the University of Miami School of Nursing and Health Studies. The second finalist is Carole Kenner, professor and dean of the University of Oklahoma Health Sciences Center's College of Nursing.

Each candidate will be involved in one open meeting with UMass faculty and staff and one with UMass students as part of the selection process for the position.

McCain met with faculty and staff this past Monday, Nov. 17 from 3-to-4 p.m. in Skinner Hall. Her student meeting took place from 4-to-5 p.m., also in Skinner Hall.

Kenner will meet with faculty and staff today from 2:15-to-3:15 p.m. in room 803 of the Campus Center. She will meet with students immediately after from 3:15-to-4:15 p.m., in the same room.

Those who attend the meetings will be given the opportunity to submit comments and assessments of the candidate on evaluation forms. All comments will be kept strictly confidential. The evaluation forms will be submitted to the search committee, which is chaired by Steve Goodwin, dean of the College of Natural Resources and the Environment.

The form requires each evaluator to describe the candidate's strengths and weaknesses, any additional comments they feel the search committee should take into consideration and then an overall rating of the candidate. The evaluators must sign their evaluation forms in order for them to be accepted, but signatures will be detached from the forms prior to review by the search committee.

All forms must be sent to the Nursing Dean Search Committee, Office of the Provost, room 362 of the Whitmore Administration Building. Forms must be handed in no later than Friday, Dec. 5, 2008. Faculty and staff have been asked to encourage students of the University to attend the open meetings of both candidates.

W.O.C. host workout

On Tuesday, Nov. 18 the Women of Color Leadership hosted a Zumba workout for students at the University of Massachusetts Amherst on the 19th floor dance studio in the John Adams tower. The workshop was lead by DW Walker, a personal trainer who is certified in AAFA, EFTI, CPR/AED, and Zumba Fitness.

Along with the students from UMass, Walker's grandmother, Lilian Coleman, was in attendance. She helped to keep the energy up by encouraging others and even joining during some of her favorite songs and routines.

According to the Zumba Fitness Web site, this form of exercise was "created in the mid-90's by Columbian native Alberto 'Beto' Perez, a celebrity fitness trainer and choreographer for International pop superstars." He was inspired by the traditional cumbia, salsa, samba and merengue music he grew up with but paired his favorite rhythms with many of the international dance steps his clients loved. Zumba Fitness is Spanish slang for "to move fast and have fun."

Walker however added her own personal flair in addition to the Latin rhythms by mixing in hits like the "Cupid Shuffle", Beyonce's "Single Ladies" and "Just Fine" by Mary J. Blige.

Sherelle Fiddiman, a junior at the University of Massachusetts, said, "it was like going to a club and hanging out with friends. I was burning calories, and I had so much fun I didn't even realize it."

The goal that wasn't

In UMass' Saturday 1-0 loss in the first round of the NCAA tournament, the Minutemen narrowly missed a goal early in the second overtime. The referees ruled that the ball, pictured, did not cross the line before the ball was kicked away by Harvard's Robert Millock. Check page B10 for full coverage of the game.

Body identified as a NWU student

By Amanda Lubyanko
Daily Northwestern (Northwestern U.)

A body found in Lake Michigan Sunday morning has been identified as that of Communication freshman Trevor Boehm, officials said.

The Cook County Medical Examiner's office notified Northwestern early Monday evening, Al Cubbage, vice president for university relations, released a statement shortly afterward.

"Our hearts go out to Trevor's family and our thoughts are with them at this time," said University President Henry Bienen in the statement. "The death of one of our students affects the entire Northwestern community. We join the Boehm family in mourning the loss of Trevor."

The body was discovered about seven miles south of NU near Montrose Harbor in the 4500 block of Chicago's North Simonds Drive, police said.

Boehm was reported missing Nov. 9 by his parents, who were visiting for Family Weekend. While investigating the disappearance, University Police discovered Boehm had not used his WildCARD or Marlock key since Nov. 5.

Four days later, police found his jacket, WildCARD, keys and cell phone among the rocks on the Lakefill. The United States Coast Guard conducted an aerial and underwater search of the lake over the next several days.

The body was recovered Sunday morning when Chicago police responded to a call reporting a body in the water.

After graduating from high school in Colorado Springs, Colo., Boehm began his career at NU in Fall Quarter 2007, living on the fifth floor of Willard Residential College, 1865 Sherman Ave., and majoring in theater. According to Cubbage and the Office of the Registrar, he completed his first term last year before leaving NU sometime during Winter Quarter.

College news hit hard

By Melissa Loewinger
The Daily Princetonian (Princeton U.)

Students at UC Berkeley hope nothing too important happens on Tuesdays. In light of the economic downturn, The Daily Californian has nixed its Wednesday print edition for the time being.

"It was an emergency measure so we have enough money to function throughout the year," Daily Californian editor-in-chief and president Bryan Thomas said. "We got hit hard this year. We had to take some drastic measures."

Newspapers throughout the country are seeing declines in their print advertising revenue by an average of 16 percent in the second quarter of this year, according to the Newspaper Association of America. College newspapers are not immune from the industry-wide phenomenon.

The Columbia Spectator has seen a decline in advertising revenue of roughly 10 percent so far this year, advertising manager Dan Smullyan said.

Daily Pennsylvanian business manager Alexander Rakvin noted that the biggest decline in revenue has come this semester, "with the bottom dropping out of the economy."

As the economy hurts companies that target college students as consumers, national advertisers looking to cut costs have started withholding their business, said Stacia Campbell, general manager of Students Publishing Co., which oversees The Daily Northwestern.

Financial, consulting and other firms that traditionally recruit on college campuses have dried up as a source of revenue as they cut or even eliminate recruiting. Consequently, advertising revenue for college papers continues to decline.

"Last year, a large portion of our ads came from recruiting firms," Daily Princetonian business manager Yao Wang '09 said. "We're not getting as much from the big banks and consulting companies. We're hit very hard by that."

Companies commit to hosting an information session for interested students roughly a year in advance but make advertising decisions only a few months prior to the session, Wang explained. As a result, even firms that do come to college campuses don't necessarily buy advertisements in the campus newspaper.

Stanford Daily business manager and chief operating officer In Ho Lee said she has seen a similar trend. "There's a huge gap between last fall and this fall. Last fall we had all these recruiters for advertising."

The Daily Tar Heel, the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill's newspaper, has the potential to be more directly impacted by the economic downturn, as UNC is a public university. In North Carolina, the governor has asked all state universities to cut their budgets by 5 percent.

"Our chancellor is saying every department can decide how they're going to [cut back]," general manager Kevin Schwartz said, noting that some departments have decided to reduce advertising.

"We will get hit in the spring a little by departmental budget cuts," he noted.

Even in face of state budget cuts, The Daily Tar Heel is looking at its most prosperous year yet, Schwartz said, explaining that political campaigns spent a great deal of money on media in North Carolina leading up to this month's election. In addition, the state has a few schools with the potential to win the NCAA men's national basketball championship.

"We have a unique position here to do better than some of our buddies," Schwartz said.

Similarly, the Yale Daily News has not been forced to make significant cuts in its production.

"We're lucky in the sense that we still command a strong market in that we are the only means to speak to the Yale community on a daily basis," editor-in-chief Thomas Kaplan said.

The downturn will not affect the paper's content, Kaplan added.

"We're investing as much in our news gathering as we always have," he said. "It hasn't hit us [in a manner that] would constrict our journalism in any way."

Other papers are not as fortunate. The Daily Northwestern, for example, has begun publishing "smaller papers with fewer pages because we don't have advertising revenue to support our editorial news hole," Campbell explained. The term "news hole" refers to the physical space in the paper available for content.

Even papers that are not cutting production are re-evaluating their costs.

The Indiana Daily Student has revised its travel budget and is looking at its pay structure, advertising director Amy Swain said. "We're looking at ways to economize in every area," she explained.

Westmont College empty after evacuation

By Tarcy Tran

Westmont College is now as silent as summer, that is, without its students. The hundreds of students that were once walking up and down hills, standing in line in the Dining Commons and running in and out of dorm rooms have disappeared and been scattered across the map around Santa Barbara, back to their hometowns and even to other parts of the country.

A total of 15 people were tightly packed in the home of campus pastor Ben Patterson and his wife Loretta Nov. 13. Third-year Ruben Cortez had arrived with a group of friends at the Patterson's home in Carpinteria around 1 a.m.

"I think a lot of people are just anxious now, anxious to get back and find out what happened," said Cortez, who drove back to his home in Santa Maria at noon on Nov. 14.

News began to develop about additional fires in Southern California, such as the one in the Anaheim-Yorba Linda-Corona region. Third-year Ben Johnson arrived home in Yorba Linda Nov. 14 around midnight, but he said that the Freeway Complex Fire in that region is not an immediate threat to his home.

"I mostly underestimated how big of an impact this was going to have," said Johnson, who is waiting to get back to campus to pick things up from his room. Johnson currently has with him his computer, phone, wallet and a couple of important documents.

For second-year Laura Bischoff, home was just a plane ride away. Bischoff had a ticket for a flight at 4:00 p.m. Nov. 14 to Colorado. However, her identification was left behind in her room in Van Kampen when she evacuated the campus Nov. 13 around midnight. Bischoff was eventually able to use a copy of her birth certificate that her mother e-mailed and her student identification to board her flight with her computer, scarf, wallet and philosophy book in her backpack.

Despite the geographical distance, Bischoff reports no detachment from the news at Westmont.

"People like my roommate and friends have been calling me most every day," she said, "and we've been looking up information on the web. I'm just kind of reading the news and looking at pictures each day."

The events of Nov. 13 have sent a couple of others on a tour of California. In the past four days, third-year Phylicia Clifton has gone from the campus shelter in the gym, to Reality Church in Carpinteria, to a retreat in Big Bear and back to Santa Barbara to a home in the hills of Montecito.

Clifton and several other students had boarded a bus that Reality had sent to campus to bring students to the church on the night of Nov. 13. Once at the church, students changed out of their old shirts that smelled of smoke and into new t-shirts the church had waiting for them. They were also given Red Cross kits with basic essentials.

"I don't think I had ever been so happy to get a toothbrush in my entire life," said Clifton.

Clifton had been one of a handful of Westmont students who had left the church on Nov. 14 to join the Reality college camp that was scheduled for that weekend up at Big Bear in the San Bernardino Mountains.

"One thing I don't think I've ever realized until camp that weekend was how many songs and scriptures talk about fire," said Clifton, who mentioned the silence and hesitation she and other students felt when lyrics related to fire came about in songs during worship. "It was almost refreshing to see it not as a tool of the enemy, but just as a manifestation of God's power."

The college camp group returned to Reality on Sunday at 3:00 p.m., when upon their arrival, assistant director of the Office of Life Planning Celia Howen read off names of those who had no place to stay after camp ended. Clifton heard her name, along with that of fourth-year Ethan Warner, third-year Hannah Perry and second year Stephanie Wee. Howen then took the four to the Montecito home of Westmont trustee Phyllis Marble in Montecito.

Marble and her husband took the four out to buy clothes and basic items. According to Clifton, when the cashiers at Macy's found out they were from Westmont, they proceeded to process as many discounts as the register machine allowed.

Though the campus evacuation system distributed students across every area, students like Clifton found that things seemed to fall into place along the way. Clifton described the ride up to college camp.

"There was a group of five of us, and we kind of knew each other. We ended up driving to the camp together and ended up really getting to know each other. I've just been really blessed to be in fellowship with them," Clifton added. "It was incredible how everybody was pulling together."

U. Iowa miffed by handling of assault

By Amanda McClure
The Daily Iowan (U. Iowa)

University of Iowa faculty members were dismayed and frustrated with the university's handling of an investigation into a reported sexual assault, says a report recently released by the state Board of Regents.

The report contained 124 pages of handwritten notes by the Stolar Partnership that show UI officials and faculty members condemning the UI's procedures in the mishandling of the reported sexual assault in Hillcrest in October 2007.

The St. Louis law firm was hired for $248,000 to conduct an investigation into how the UI handled the incident.

Karla Miller of the Rape Victim Advocacy Program said, "The athletics department has competing priorities and the university tended to 'circle the wagons,'" according to notes by attorney Doreen Dodson.

Regent Robert Downer said he isn't suprised by the reported confusion.

"I'm not shocked there are faculty members who were confused about the policies," he said. "I think we all were. To me, the frustration in the notes don't seem to present anything out of the ordinary."

Downer said the released notes were consistent with conversations he had with Stolar lawyers during the investigation.

Dodson, Peter Gopelrud, and Charla Scott are the attorneys who conducted the interviews with Marcella David, Jennifer Modestou, Tiffini Stephenson Earl - all of the UI Office of Equal Opportunity and Diversity. Monique DiCarlo, director of the Women's Resource an Action Center, Kirk Ferentz, the Iowa football coach, and Fred Mims, an associate athletics director, were also interviewed.

"I think it reiterates that [the UI] was open and didn't make an attempt to cover up the case to the board during the investigation," UI spokesman Steve Parrott said. "We recognize that we can do better, and we're working to do better."

He pointed to recent sexual-harassment policy changes on campus - which, he said, should create a more comprehensive investigation procedure and a more-defined path for victims and their families should another incident occur.

The university is also revamping its sexual-assault policies, which will be presented to the regents at their December meeting.

Interview notes by Stolar lead investigator James Bryant haven't been released yet. These notes include interviews with former UI administrators Marc Mills and Phillip Jones, Athletics Director Gary Barta, and UI President Sally Mason.

Mason fired Mills and Jones after the Stolar report named the two officials for many of the discrepancies throughout the case.

On Nov. 7, Jones filed a wrongful-termination claim against the UI, including $2.25 million in compensation, but he declined to comment on the specifics of the case.

Amherst retains transgendered

After Jennifer Levy finished, Yohah Ralph spoke about the hatred experienced by transgender people. She said that hatred is not inborn, it is learned from society and therefore it can be unlearned. But, she added, there is a steep learning curve and it take tremendous courage to educate; Ralph urged the people at the meeting to "be a friend to those we want to change" and said that "love is transgressively transformative."

At the end of her talk, she encouraged all the attendees to introduce themselves to strangers there and say, "I'm here for you."

Jariczek Beemyn spoke again at the close of the meeting, describing how Transgender Day of Remembrance should be known as "Poor Transsexual Women of Color Remembrance Day" because the great majority of transgendered individuals who have been murdered have fallen into that category.

Twenty-eight transgendered people were murdered in the last year, the most since record-keeping started. Eight of them were forced to engage in sex work. Ten people have been arrested in connection with their murders, two of which were brought to trial. Of those two, one received a light sentence and the other was exonerated.

When the crimes were reported in the media, male names and male pronouns were used. Victims were described as sex perverts who were responsible for their own deaths.

Those murdered women were remembered when the meeting house was darkened and 28 people carrying flashlights read out the name and any available information of individual victims. The majority of their bios ended with "No arrests have been made." As each bio was read a light was turned off until the whole room was dark and there was a moment of silence.

At the end of her speech, Jennifer Levy quoted labor organizer Mother Jones with words that rang true for everyone present: "Pray for the dead and fight like hell for the living."

Two sit in protest of violence against transgendered individuals as part of a national day of remembrance aimed at stopping the hate crimes while preserving the identity of victims.

An uncertain economy has forced many students to stay home this semester where they take online courses or stop academics entirely.

Recession hits enrollment

an organization that conducts an annual survey to track online learning trends.

The study "Staying the Course: Online Education in the United States, 2008," conducted by the College Board and Babson College had over 2,500 responses, a response rate of 57.4 percent.

"I'm continually surprised that the growth doesn't seem to slow down or stop," said the report's co-author and co-director Jeff Seaman.

According to Seaman, most academic leaders believe the relationship between higher enrollments and economic troubles is carrying over into online education.

The study found that of the universities polled, 70 percent of two-year colleges felt online education is "critical," whereas only 35.4 percent of four-year colleges felt online education is "critical." Since the fall of 2002, the percentage of higher education institutions that agreed online education is "critical" steadily decreased between 2002 and 2005, after which leveled off.

With online education growing in popularity, the creation of competition is inevitable. The rise in competition has allowed students to sign up for online classes not only at their own institutions, but at schools around the world.

According to the report, "As discussed elsewhere, this competition may be leading schools to increase their geographic reach and to concentrate on non-degree, non-traditional students."

Guzzlin' gas at $1.99

Nick O'Malley

So, when's the revolution?

What you don't remember? It was only a few months ago.

Back when they were lingering at about $4, everyone was up in arms about the outrageous gas prices we were facing. And now, with prices going down, all of a sudden the coup d'etat over the gas giants seems to have vanished.

The Facebook groups to boycott pumping gas on a certain day or to put more effort into alternatives fuels haven't popped out since summertime – how strange.

Could it be that, now that gas is affordable, going to the pump isn't the travesty is used to be?

Let's face it: it's much easier to be up in arms about the oil industry making record profits when we're paying $4 a gallon. Exxon Mobil's $40.6 billion earnings of earlier this year haven't been mentioned for a while. But since we're not paying what we used to, those profits don't seem too bad.

According to American Automobile Association, the national gas price average has dropped to $2.02 per gallon. The average has dropped below the $2 mark in 27 states and in Missouri, the prices are set at $1.73 per gallon. Suddenly, a gallon of gas has dropped to near the price of a half-gallon of milk.

In July, when prices soared to $4.11 per gallon, it seemed that everyone was prepared to do away with automobile forever and change their driving habits. The Internet was littered with specific days that people were selling out of their way to not pump gas and it seemed that everyone was looking into any alternative fuel that could come up with.

But now with the return of lower gas prices, we've returned to the gas-guzzling mentality that we once had. If America was really interested in ending its dependency on foreign oil, then why are there constant commercials for trucks and SUVs that go over mountains and pull freighter ships down highways? Because everyone obviously needs a car that gets 3.6 miles per gallon but can drive through a brick wall.

Perhaps it's part of American culture that we require monstrous cars that barely fit into parking spaces to work – the concept of the muscle car comes to mind.

Everyone obviously needs a car that gets 3.6 miles per gallon but can drive through a brick wall.

Not that Japanese and other foreign car industries haven't been pushing out hybrids and better fuel efficiency, American automakers don't seem very interested in entering into that market.

Instead, the industry executives have taken their private jets to Washington in order to get a nice piece of the bailout pie. Though this would help millions of Americans keep their jobs and prevent the economy from taking another shot in the nuts, it's inevitable, with the current mentality that's present in America, that long-term progress will be made.

It's something bigger than the economy at work here. It's a lack of adaptability and adjustments made in Detroit that has led to this problem.

Some people haven't noticed, but fuel efficiency's a pretty cool thing. Going longer between stops at the gas station helps out when a lot of people in this country are having problems making due financially. Also, I think if you're car looks sort of goofy?

It's short-sighted, though. When gas was reaching ridiculous prices at the pump, people seemed ready to disassociate of the prior tendencies of the American car industry. The Prii and Versae of the world were finally getting some legitimate recognition over F-350s and Hummers. Rumsfeld?

But now, it looks as though it's time to head back to the Ford Explorer and stop carpooling, taking the bus or – dare I say it – walk places.

So, was all of that banter about changing the oil industry's grip on American culture legitimate or just complaints over the high gas prices?

Regardless of the motives, the resistance to gas dependency is a good thing for this country. The more effort that people put into alternative fuels and conservation of the ones that we have, the better.

Whether or not you believe in global warming, reading El niño or the flying spaghetti monster, emissions from fossil fuels are not good for the environment. The world isn't necessarily heading toward a Mad Max-ian sadhur or whatever that was in The Day After Tomorrow, but it's not good.

Going beyond the financial, environmental, moral, international issues involved with the usage of fossil fuels for contemporary transportation is the fact that the basis of oil's image being dictated almost solely on the prices at the pump.

High prices? We're all looking at solar power. Low Prices? I'm buying a hummer, dude.

America's addiction to oil needs to be quelled. But nobody's going to care until prices go up again.

At Thanksgiving, counting our blessings

Paul Payer

It's that time of year again.

Professors attempt to cram in one more paper or exam before the Thanksgiving break and students begin to long for the end of a seemingly endless semester.

The entire campus begins to realize the prospect of trading a diet of pita pit and Easy Mac for the far more enjoyable combination of home-made stuffing and fresh turkey.

Yes, the celebration of Thanksgiving is only days away, and we cannot wait to ditch nights in the library with our books and laptops for a long weekend of rest and relaxation in the comfort of our homes.

But with this serenity we must once again confront the clichés of thanksgivings past.

What are we thankful for this year?

With an economy in a full-blown recession and our country lacking authority and respect abroad, the pundits and newsroom anchors across this country would have us believe there is not very much to be grateful for this November.

Agreement with this cynical view of the world would be a terrible mistake. In fact, if we honestly look at our own lives, one would likely find plenty to be thankful about.

We live in arguably the most powerful and democratic nation in the world. As Americans we respect and are ensured the liberties of freedom and equality. As a nation we continue to demonstrate an agenda of progress and social change. And despite the influx of pessimism and gloom in regards to the future of the American economy and society, we as Americans enjoy a quality of life far superior to the vast majority of the world.

This economic crisis has taken much from people around the country, but it has granted one valuable tool, perspective.

Although cable news stations continue to report every development of the collapse of Wall Street and national economy, the American way of life will most likely persevere. Sure, sales figures will likely indicate a cutback in extravagant spending this Friday, but as in years past, families across America will still sit down in their dining rooms with festive moods for a lavish feast of turkey and mashed potatoes on Thanksgiving Day.

I do not intend to downplay the economic crisis our country faces. In fact, it is a serious matter which commands the highest level of attention and concern amongst the population and by our leaders in Washington. But to hang our heads and admit despair and defeat would only serve to cement our current economic situation and refuse the rebound and positive economic future which surely awaits.

Recent polling data indicates that the majority of Americans firmly believe that their individual and national economic situation will improve during the next five years and that they are far better off than generations before them.

As Americans, we are naturally optimistic and trusting that we will recover from times of trouble and continue to progress as a nation. There is a belief in this country that hard work and a sense of purpose can deliver us from any challenge.

It is this philosophy of unrelenting determination which we should all give thanks for. It is the philosophy which led this country through world wars and civil rights movements. It is the philosophy which this country stands upon.

As in years past, we should take the opportunity this holiday and step back to think about what we are truly thankful for. Yes economics are important, but to let our stock portfolios and bank accounts overshadow the importance of family and traditions would be not only a disservice to a holiday, but to ourselves.

There is plenty to be thankful for this Thanksgiving, perhaps even more than in recent years past. This economic crisis has taken much from people around the country, but it has granted one valuable tool in the form of perspective.

The opportunity to realize what really matters in our lives is priceless. The principles of materialism and greed have consumed our culture in recent decades, and it has become evident in the corporate culture which has accelerated the crash of financial markets in recent months.

Thanksgiving should be a time to recognize the truly important aspects of our lives. Perhaps the collapse of financial markets and the ensuing rampant spread of economic concerns actually serve to present the perfect opportunity to accomplish this goal. By demonstrating the fragility and volatility of money we may realize the strength and stability of family, friends and the simpler things in life.

'Love,' protest and Proposition 8

Ben Moriarty

Apparently gays are real procrastinators. It was only when Proposition 8 passed ealling for the ban of gay marriage that they started doing things like protesting and organizing. And now they won't stop.

They've even organized a day where they're all going to skip work and instead, volunteer places to show those religious folk how much they need them.

As if the religious ever needed someone to help them dress or decorate their house.

According to the Facebook group that is circulating knowledge of this day, it spawned from the likes of "Day without a Mexican" and "Day to Not Buy gas." This gay day has some big shoes to fill. Hopefully it does as well as 'every day.'

The Web site www.daywithoutagay.org, the only place I went to for information, says they are "fighting h8 with love," and that without all the gays and their friends going out and shopping and stuff, the day "will be without love." Also, another point of the day is to "donate love." They apparently really love the word love.

By checking out the Web site, you'll notice they advertise ways to help if you're in a state where you can get fired for being gay, like joining Facebook groups and contacting groups that already know about the day. It confused me that a lot of the places listed to volunteer are groups that have to do with gays, but it made me happy knowing that there are many horses in Florida who will be groomed that day.

Is this what has come of rights movements?

Just as with the rainbow and the words 'gay' and 'lesbian', the gays are now trying to hijack the concept of 'love.' Watch out straight people and residents of Lesbos, I hear they're going for the word 'sex' next.

The whole movement is riddled with personal motives hidden under the zeal of 'love,' and pretends that mentioning you're full of love means you've proved a point. But it doesn't really show anything except the given fact that some guy loves some other guy. And protesting outside Mormon Churches because they donated money to pass Proposition 8 doesn't show anything except you don't understand their side and think they're hateful.

Trying to commandeer the idea of love and claiming to be the spokesgroup for it isn't going to do anything.

The worst part is that when it comes down to it, the Mormons and others supporting with Proposition 8 are the ones who are really acting out of love, to the point where they know they will be called bigots and hateful nuts by following their consciences to do what they believe is best. Disagree with their ideas or not, it's undeniable that what they are doing is truly done out of love for others. The other side claims they'll "stop hit with love," so I guess we will have to wait until Dec. 10 to see how true their love is.

Of course, this whole idea cuts up in shreds as no one on the gay front will acknowledge that most of the other side is genuine in its intentions, and these intentions are the opposite of hate. If they really hated gays, they wouldn't be trying to remove them from what they consider to be a sinful lifestyle with an unfortunate end.

Yeah, cry about not prescribing to their beliefs all you want, but that doesn't change the fact that what they are doing is out of concerned love.

Trying to commandeer the idea of love and claiming to be the spokesgroup for it isn't worth anything when the other group is acting under the same position.

The gay front needs to go back to the beginning. They need to give up their self-righteous proclamations of being those who really love, and take up something that will either make them understand the other position, or as they say, show how much we need them.

If the former hasn't happened yet, it obviously won't, and this is why there is the Day Without a Gay day. But is one day really going to accomplish anything? No.

An economic boycott for one day won't do anything. So, especially in this time of economic distress, I can say the only effective way will be a Year Without Gays. I just don't know if people really care that much about it.

And in this country, it could backfire on them.

Faith in politics: America in the world

Eric Magazu

"For I have loved him, because he commands his children and his household after him that they keep the way of the Lord, doing charity and justice, in order that the Lord might then bring upon Abraham that which He had spoken of him." (Genesis 18:19)

The Hebrew underlying the translation of the word "loved" in the above passage is 'yedativ,' which implies an intimate knowledge. God has an intimate relationship with the patriarch Abraham because Abraham is faithful, and follows God's instructions. These laws are summarized by 'tzedaka' and 'mishpat,' which can be somewhat imprecisely translated as charity and justice.

Charity and justice are important because the many attributes that man's limited capacity can associate with God can be summarized by these two descriptors. Perhaps the only way to unite these properties yet further into a single one would be through the attribute of faithfulness. It would be an understatement to assert that God's faithfulness to undeserving men is great.

God's ordinances apply equally to all men and all nations. His statutes are the standard by which all of us are judged. They apply to strong and weak alike, rich and poor alike. There are no class distinctions before God, and no man can expect to be exempt from any of these laws by any excuse. The weak and the poor are obligated to give generously to others, while the strong and the rich are commanded to act with humility and grace. It is by every word of God that the universe is sustained.

It is when men and nations attain wealth and power that they must be most careful to not forget these ordinances. Earthly power is granted only by the hand of God, and its exercise will be judged most strictly. Men and nations who possess power act as the representatives of God, even when they appear to be undeserving. If the powerful act in favor of their own hearts, they bring discord and despair into the world, but if they act in way of the Lord, they sanctify the name of God. By the latter path, they bring hope to the destitute and proclaim peace among men.

America in our day has been granted a great deal of secular power among the nations of the world. Citizens of other nations often yearn to be able to vote in our elections, because the decisions and actions of our leaders have such a profound effect in their own countries. Has America been acting rightly with this power, in such a way that brings glory to God and goodwill among men?

Has America been acting rightly with this power, in such a way that brings glory to God and goodwill among men?

To figure out the answer to this question, it is important to bring in the second attribute of God discussed earlier, namely the attribute of charity. Charity, or mercy, is what tempers God's strict justice. The order of the universe would quickly crumble without charity. God's laws provide structure for the universe, but our transgressions bring discord. It is through mercy that the broken bonds of affection are knit together, both between God and man and between a man and his fellow. It is assuredly true that one day the world will be redeemed through charity.

As for the role of the powerful in tempering justice with mercy, Shakespeare's character Portia provides an eloquent exposition on charity, "'Tis mightiest in the mightiest; it becomes the throned monarch better than his crown. His sceptre shows the force of temporal power, the attribute to awe and majesty, wherein doth sit the dread and fear of kings, but mercy is above this sceptred sway, it is enthroned in the hearts of kings, it is an attribute to God himself, and earthly power doth then show likest God's when mercy seasons justice."

If God shows nothing but charity and faithfulness even toward the most undeserving of His creatures, how much more so should America show charity towards the nations of the world? America's foreign policy ought to be guided by compassion, because it is through compassion by which we will win the hearts of men. By supporting aggressive wars in the Middle East for an unjust cause, the arguments for which are dubious even under the claim that they are acting for the America's national defense, we only bring discord in the world.

Knowing how the hearts of men work, can we be sure that other nations will respond in kind toward us? History and reality show that most men do not seek the way of God. There may be many that will take advantage of such a show of graciousness, which they will perceive as weakness, but, if we maintain our trust in God, we need not fear any man. It is true that most people are defiant even the face of God's mercy, but we need to reassure ourselves that God is able to express mercy even while He maintains complete control over all of the affairs of men.

If we maintain our present course, we will continue to run blindly toward the easy path that leads to destruction. The path that leads to the promise, the road to redemption, is in keeping to the way of the Lord, doing charity and justice.

Comedy strikes again

Poundstone gives insight to motherhood, psychology

BY ANGELA STABLOWSKI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

NORTHAMPTON — Paula Poundstone has found the secret to making people laugh at their own flaws, a talent she has perfected through several decades worth of jokes at her own expense.

With her omnipresent sarcasm and a spark of universal understanding in her eyes, Poundstone could make a leopard laugh at its own spots.

Performing two sold out shows in one night at Iron Horse Music Hall Friday night, it is clear that Poundstone has truly found success in the comedy business.

Neither frigid weather nor late hours could stop her dedicated fans from coming out to support her. A line of shivering Poundstone enthusiasts stretched far beyond the doors of the venue for the second show.

The comedienne swaggered to the stage in a long-coated, pinstripe suit and dress shirt, typical of her performance attire.

Upon calming the crowd's enthusiastic reception, Poundstone greeted her following by declaring them her most devoted of fans.

"At the early show they were nice, but you know, they go to a 7 o'clock show and some of them were dozing off. It wasn't a mature crowd, like this guy," she said.

One unfortunate soul who chose to sit in the front row became the first topic of the evening.

Upon discovering that the gentleman in the front row was a self-proclaimed "inventor," Poundstone amused herself and the audience with an interrogative blind of comedy and a harsh dose of reality, made comical by virtue of its truthfulness.

"You're an inventor? Really? And your mother is ... necessity?"

From that moment on, her routine consisted of conversational audience interactions that transcended the performer-audience barrier.

Most intriguing about Poundstone's humor was the way in which she played off of the crowd, creating a completely improvised moment of genuine wit.

Upon discovering that several audience members worked in the psychology profession, she immediately began to treat the evening as a therapy session. The routine was based off of her prior experiences with psychological therapy.

One individual, who happened to work with horses as a means of therapy, found herself under the gun as Poundstone bombarded her with sharp-tongued quips that hinted at the absurdity of such a profession.

From then on, anyone who gave her a dissatisfactory response was met with the suggestion to "spend some time at the stables."

Poundstone did not limit herself to cheap laughs at the expense of others, however. She gracefully took on her experience with the aging process, parenthood and her computer illiteracy throughout the span of the evening.

Wrapping up the evening, Poundstone opted to promote her book, a deceivingly selfless endeavor. Proceeds for her novel, the product of nine years of handwritten pages and wandering thoughts, go to the "Friends of the Library," an organization for which Poundstone is spokeswoman.

Completing the novel was no easy task for Poundstone. Coping with the effects of Obsessive Compulsive Disorder, she felt strongly about handwriting each page without a single cross out or mistake.

Despite the stigma generally attached to the condition, the exposure of such intimate life details did not appear to bother her in the least. Rather, the process of revealing something so personal to a crowd of strangers became the ultimate form of acceptance for the comedy queen.

Poundstone chose some rather controversial subjects for her set, including the open wound that is Proposition 8 and her own daughter's struggle with cerebral palsy, both of which she attempted to handle with great care.

While some of her commentary on the matters at hand verged on inappropriate, the spirit of the evening allowed the audience to take it all in stride.

In general, Poundstone encourages her fans to take a step back from the seriousness that governs everyday life, if only for a moment, to allow for some laughter.

No one knows as well as Poundstone that life is too short to worry about how one is perceived by the rest of society. As a parting thought, Poundstone chose to comment further on the necessity to stop taking life so seriously.

"I'm trying to think of what I can leave you with that will be kind of meaningful and deep. I did die once. My heart stopped for a minute, and I've got to tell you this about death. There is no bright light and there is nobody waving you anywhere. Unless of course there is a 1-minute waiting period I was not aware of."

As Poundstone implied, all that matters at the end of the day is being able to laugh at the things we cannot change. Her show had all the charm of standup with a built-in moral.

Colbert 'jingles bells' in holiday special

BY MORGAN MEAGHER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Stephen Colbert already has a television show, a best-selling book and an ice-cream flavor, and, as of last night, he added a musical Christmas special to the list.

"A Colbert Christmas – The Greatest Gift of All!" aired Sunday at 10 p.m. on Comedy Central, the network that is also home to Colbert's program, "The Colbert Report."

For "The Greatest Gift of All!" the faux-conservative pundit puts aside his political agenda for the most part, in order to focus on the magic of Christmas. Colbert is trapped in a log cabin, unable to get back to his studio to film his Christmas spectacular with Elvis Costello, and a number of people stop by to help console Stephen and sing original holiday tunes to celebrate the season. The original songs were written by David Javerbaum, an executive producer of "The Daily Show with Jon Stewart" and Adam Schlesinger of Fountains of Wayne.

The special appears to be ultra low-budget, with some cheesy special effects and cheap-looking sets, but that simply adds to the retro charm. At several points, Colbert even mocks the cheapness of it.

Furthermore, it lacks a deep plot. Guests pop in and out completely at random, despite the fact that Colbert claims to be trapped in his cabin.

Guests include Colbert's colleague Jon Stewart, who tries to tempt Colbert with a song about Hanukkah. Toby Keith performs a half-funny, half-disturbing song about taking back Christmas from Godless liberals and heathens and John Legend gives a great performance as a forest ranger with an unusual obsession. Former "Colbert Report" musical guest Fiest plays an angel, and Willie Nelson and Elvis Costello also make appearances.

The special is driven by Colbert's on-screen persona and the humor in the songs.

Green's new book teaches lessons about finding self

BY HANNAH NELSON
COLLEGIAN STAFF

"Paper Towns" is the third novel written by author John Green, following 2005's "Looking for Alaska" and 2006's "An Abundance of Katherines," and debuted fifth as a New York Times bestseller last month after its first week of sales.

Much of the book's success is thanks to many of Green's adoring fans through the YouTube channel run by him and his brother Hank. Movie rights for "Paper Towns" have already gone to the creators of "Juno," leaving Green's fans ready and waiting with fingers crossed for a new cult classic. That being said, "Paper Towns" has a lot to prove to the expectant reader.

The novel opens with the nine-year-old versions of Quentin "Q" Jacobsen and Margo Roth Spiegelman finding the body of a suicide victim in their local park, a defining moment that will ultimately provide insight into the different ways people handle death and how it can affect a young person later in life.

Skipping ahead, the reader is introduced to the high-school-senior versions of Q and Margo, who fall into somewhat stereotypical roles of popular girl next door and slightly geeky guy next door.

It becomes obvious as the novel progresses that this was a deliberate technique of Green's in order to create build up for Margo's later disappearance, which sends Q on a journey of self-discovery as he attempts to find Margo, both literally and metaphorically. The mysterious Margo goes from girl-next-door to a runaway, and Q makes it his personal mission in life to find her, suddenly replacing his impending graduation as the most exciting thing in his relatively dull existence.

Margo can at first easily come across as the lost twin of lost-girl-needs-saving Alaska, from Green's first novel. Likewise, Q initially reads as a boy with a need-to-save complex opposite the female lead who is no free spirited to want any saving.

The clichés sneak in, as do Alaska character types and at times it reads a bit like an alternative ending to the previous novel. It often seems as though "Paper Towns" would have been more aptly named "Finding Margo Roth Spiegelman."

But where Alaska's characters failed to evolve, those of "Paper Towns" succeed. The secret life of Margo is slowly revealed, that of a girl who is actually an old soul hippie who enjoys reading Walt Whitman and listening to Woody Guthrie while holding transcendentalist philosophies and is a far cry from the popular shallow girl that everyone sees her as. Though the archetype teen characters are present in the beginning, Green evolves them from flat to fully formed by the end of the novel.

"Paper Towns" is riddled with inside jokes for Green's loyal fans, dubbed the "Nerdfighters," and is paired with much needed sexual humor to offset the heavier themes, which explains book's ban from the Wal-Mart shelves. Though it can seem like overkill early on, it's easy to see why all the humor is present as the book progresses.

In a matter of sentences, the direction of the novel is suddenly transformed from revenge of the geeks to self discovery via Whitman's "Leaves of Grass."

The plot becomes a search not only for Margo, but also for teens to be understood through in turn learning to understand. This unexpected turn from light teen read to a darker weight

Stephen Colbert's "The Greatest Gift Of All" combines his comedic antics and musical theatrics, and stars many special guests. The show aired last night on Comedy Central at 10 p.m.

Television personality expands genre to include holiday season musical special

Colbert also makes use of some of the quirks that fans know from his show, such as his fear of bears, and of course his outlandishly pompous, over-the-top demeanor. His ridiculous enthusiasm pervades "The Greatest Gift of All!" and is even evident in the exclamation point at the end of the title.

He prances around the set in a bright red cardigan, singing and dancing and fretting about Christmas and the rehearsals he is missing back in the city.

The question must be asked, where does "The Greatest Gift of All!" rank in the Stephen Colbert pantheon? In fact, it is not quite as funny as "The Colbert Report" or "I Am America and So Can You!" and is certainly less delicious than "Stephen Colbert's Americone Dream," the delightful Ben and Jerry's ice cream.

It may not be strong enough to appeal to people who are not enamored of Colbert, however, for those who are familiar with and appreciate the star's obnoxiousness, the Christmas Special proves enjoyable.

Comedy Central is releasing the DVD of the special on Tuesday, Nov. 25, a mere two days after its original airing. A digital album of the songs will also be put up on iTunes that day.

Although some may find it odd to air and sell a Christmas special before Thanksgiving, the haste is redeemed by the fact that some proceeds from the sales will benefit the Feeding America Charity, which is committed to assisting the hungry and impoverished in America.

New characters bring unexpected ending

surpasses Alaska's heft with a different depth in connection with the reader.

All of the characters see themselves in Margo, or the part of themselves that they would like to see, or want her to be. They don't see Margo, but instead a girl made up of perceptions. Q finds himself questioning whether or not people are only representations of what others think about them, and learns on his search for Margo to look past images to see a real person.

While trying to find Margo, Q finds himself.

Green manages to evolve his teen characters to an adult aptitude through their final choices in the novel, which seem to come out of nowhere in comparison to the previous crazy road trip exploits of the characters. Green plays with people and perception, humor and truth in a matter of pages without seeming out of place.

"Paper Towns" leaves readers begging for a sequel to the never-saw-it-coming end.

'Twilight' author's dreams of vampires lead to popularity

By Rick Bentley
McClatchy Newspapers

BEVERLY HILLS, Calif. — Stephenie Meyer did what many professed to be impossible. She convinced millions of teens and tweens to read something other than a text message or a computer screen. She got them to read her book called "Twilight," which is a novel about star-crossed lovers where one of the high school juniors happens to be a vampire.

Meyer's readers devoured her three other books in the series: "New Moon," "Eclipse," "Breaking Dawn."

Why have her books captured the attention of teen and tweens?

"My books must be accessible somehow. I know I get a lot of new readers, who don't read for pleasure, who read them. And that is cool," Meyer says during an interview less than two weeks before the film version of "Twilight" hit theaters on Nov. 21.

"I always loved to read. So it is kind of a cool thing to be able to open that door."

So far, "Twilight" has sold more than 17 million copies in 37 countries. Half of that total has been in the United States.

Those kinds of numbers makes it no surprise Hollywood leaped at the chance to bring "Twilight" to the big screen. And promotion for the movie is what has brought Meyer from her home in Phoenix to Southern California. Advance ticket sales for the movie are high, according to online movie ticket site Fandango.

Meyer is snuggled into a chair near the window of a small room at the Beverly Wilshire Hotel. Between the dark sweater pulled around her shoulders and the bright green strand of oversize beads around her neck, the 34-year-old is fashionably dressed. But not in the sense of the chic shops on Rodeo Drive that can be seen just over her right shoulder.

She has a welcoming smile and a down-to-earth attitude.

Except for a few school papers, Meyer had never written anything before stealing a few hours at night to write "Twilight." Even her attempts to tell original stories to her three sons were greeted with little enthusiasm.

"My middle son likes when I make up stories with him as the main character. But the other two boys don't like that. They prefer I just read to them," Meyer says. "I had stories in my head all the time. My whole life I was telling stories. But there was such a difference between what was for me and what anyone else in the world would want to see. That's why I did not write them down for other people."

The idea for "Twilight" came to her in a dream. Meyer woke up and jotted down the details of a scene in a meadow with the book's central characters. But she didn't intend to share the story. It was just for herself. Meyer is convinced if she had suspected during the writing process someone else would read her story, she never would have finished it.

Once she started writing, she could not stop. Meyer had to see where the characters would go.

"I discovered what a rush it was to create something in writing. That wasn't something I expected. And then I was addicted," Meyer says.

She knows the exact day she became a writing junkie. She had the vampire dream on June 2, 2003. Meyer is not certain what sparked her to dream about vampires for the first time in her life.

"I started another diet that day. So I must have eaten really well the night before," Meyer offers as the possible spark for the book series.

The spark started a firestorm. A month after deciding she would share the story with others, Meyer had secured an agent. A month after that, she had a book deal. From dream to bookstores took six months. The author almost apologetically admits this kind of quick reaction in the book publishing world is as rare as a vampire at a tanning salon.

She has been writing ever since. She's a graduate of Brigham Young University with a bachelor's degree in English and points to a hodgepodge of writers who influenced her from William Shakespeare to "Hitchhiker's Guide to the Galaxy" author Douglas Adams. She says the common thread of her literary influences is how they were able to create memorable characters.

And while her books have been praised for how well Meyer writes dialogue, she has created memorable characters through a redefining of the vampire mythology. Her vampires are a blood-drinking sect who have no fangs and cannot turn into bats. They can even walk around on a cloudy day.

Vampires were the perfect fit for her tale of romance. She points out that most scary creatures aren't that easy on the eyes. In most cases, vampires have been portrayed as rather good looking.

"I don't think vampires started out that way. I think over the years we have softened them up because there were things about them we like. So we give them a good side," Meyer says.

Her take on vampires resonated with fans. They sent "Twilight" to the New York Times best-seller list. It was in that moment, Meyer knew she had created something that was as immortal as her vampires. She would forever be known as a New York Times best-selling author.

Stephanie Meyer is the author of the famed series "Twilight," which held its movie premeire this weekend.

Hollywood executives come calling with such literary success. She quickly signed a movie deal with MTV Film to turn "Twilight" into a film. That deal did not go so well. She says the story would have changed and would have no resemblance to her writing.

"The fact they could do something that had nothing to do with the story was shocking to me," Meyer says. The option or time specified to make the film ran out so the deal ended.

She became more wary and protective of her stories. So when upstart film company Summit Entertainment called and asked to take a crack at the project, Meyer gave them a written list of what she expected: no fangs, no one could die who had not died in the books, no coffins, and some other items.

Except for having to condense a few scenes and scatter some of the action, confined to the last quarter of the book, early into the movie, the film adaptation by screenwriter Melissa Rosenberg stays very close to the original book.

Meyer did take exception to one well-known line of dialogue being changed. In the book, where vampire Edward finally admits he has fallen for Bella he tells her "The lion has fallen in love with the lamb." Rosenberg rewrote the line.

"I know it sounds cheesy. But I told them that line is actually tattooed on people's bodies. If you take that line and change it, that is a potential backlash situation," Meyer says.

The original line is in the film. Such loyalty to the source material should please the legions of fans - the majority being female - who have blogged, text messaged and e-mailed their deep feelings about every aspect of the book and the film.

Fan reaction to her fourth book was so negative, Meyer delayed plans to do "Midnight Sun," a male-perspective version of "Twilight." She will get back to that book. It won't happen until some of the online furor subsides.

"The fan expectations add a little pressure. When I am writing I tune that out. But when I am editing, I get online and see one blog that says 'if A and B don't happen, I will burn this book' and then another says 'if A and B do happen this will be the worst book ever.' So you know going in there is no way to please everybody," Meyer says. "I can't even please half the people because everybody has wants that are so different.

"They have written this story in their heads to a way they are happy with."

All of the Hollywood hype and Internet chatter aside, life has changed little for Meyer. She still considers herself a mom first and foremost. Now that her sons are old enough to be in school, she has tried to write during the day. But Meyer still finds late night a better time to work.

Once she has completed all of her promotional duties for the film, Meyer knows exactly what she wants to do.

"I really, more than anything else, want to go home and lock myself in a room and write for a couple of months. That's because I feel like I have been removed from that for too long," Meyer says. "It has been a really busy year and I have not had that unbroken time to just concentrate. There is always something else that has to be done.

"And I really just want to write again."

said. "So, do I know if it was over the line or if it wasn't, I have no idea.

"But it was an awfully close play, it would have been a tough way to go out if it had happened."

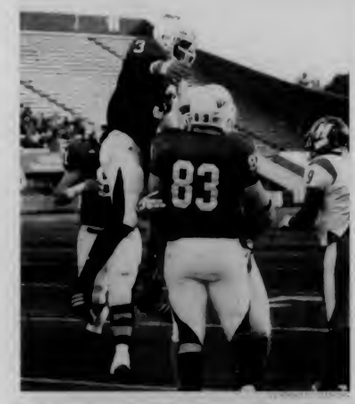
The game began with both teams struggling to control the ball because of the frozen field, with the game played with wind chills in the teens.

"I think the field conditions were obviously the same for both teams. It makes it a little bit more difficult, it's hard to stand up and I think both teams suffered because of it," Koch said.

The ball took odd bounces and players were sliding around the field, but as they adapted to the conditions, the Minutemen (10-6-3) moved the ball well and dominated play for much of the game, but they couldn't get a goal.

"It was an exciting game. There wasn't much in it either way, it was going to be something dramatic to win it, fortunately for us it was on our side," Clark said.

Simmons made three saves to Harms's one. Both teams struggled to get by their opponent's defenders throughout the game.



Stuart Thomson anchored UMass' back line hardly allowing any Crimson player to cross his path. Thomson, senior Chris Brown, Henshaw and junior Dan Lepone supported Simmons throughout the match.

"My hats off to Harvard, they got the goal," Koch said. "Obviously goals win games and they are moving on and we're not. I'm disappointed obviously, but I'm very proud of this team and what they've done coming back from a real tough start being 2-6-2 and getting to the Atlantic 10 tournament, getting an at-large bid, a lot of credit goes to the seniors and their leadership."

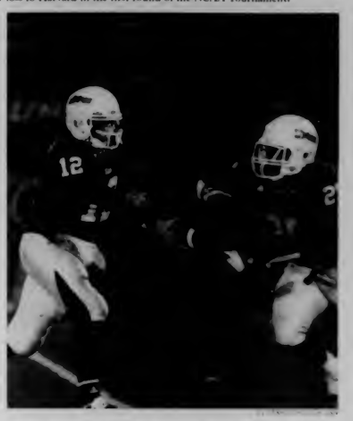
gaining more yards. Nelson had a 64-yard burst in the fourth quarter to set up UMass for a final score.

The defense stepped up for the Minutemen in key situations despite allowing 355 yards. UMass forced four turnovers on the day, causing two fumbles and intercepting two Steve Probst passes. Jeromy Miles, who all season has been one of UMass' strongest defensive players, forced a fumble on Hofstra running back Everette Benjamin at the 1-yard line late in the fourth quarter.

The ball bounced out of the end zone, last touched by Miles for a UMass touchback. The turnover sealed the game for the Minutemen.

After a few running plays by Nelson and Chris Zardas (five rushes, 45 yards), Coen took a moment before the last snap to reflect on this season and his career as a Minuteman.



"It was nice to just be able to take it in under the lights," Coen said. "I think it was a nice moment for me.

"I'm not good at science, math or any of that stuff ... I just wanted to share my passion for the game with some of the guys and I don't share that with a lot of people."

Oklahoma quarterback Sam Bradford threw four touchdown passes in a 65-21 thrashing of No. 12 Texas Saturday.

Bradford relishes victory

By Blair Kerkhoff
McClatchy Newspapers

NORMAN, Okla. — Eighteen seconds remained in the first half. Oklahoma just scored its sixth touchdown, and the stadium guy who chooses between-kickoff tunes spun House of Pain's "Jump Around."

From the opening lines, an entirely appropriate message was being delivered to second-ranked Texas Tech.

Pack it up. Pack it in.

It looked like a "Dancing with the Stars" audition for players, coaches and the 85,600 not wearing black.

"That's the most fun I ever had playing a football game," Oklahoma quarterback Sam Bradford said.

The party was on. The fifth-ranked Sooners were well on their way to altering college football's course with a 65-21 shellacking of Texas Tech. They sucked away the drama early and turned what figured to be a classic battle among top-five foes into carnage.

Nothing to see here, folks, just move along.

The outcome creates a three-way tie atop the Big 12 South standings with Texas joining the fray, but some clarity also may have presented itself.

Oklahoma was that good.

The Sooners treated Tech no differently than any of the opponents they've pummeled over the season's past month.

Actually, Oklahoma was harsher on Tech than it had been on Kansas, Kansas State, Nebraska and Texas A&M, the recent group of victims that couldn't slow the Sooners.

In those games, the opponents scored at least 14 first-half points.

Tech, which entered the game ranked first nationally in passing yards and third in scoring, mustered one first-half touchdown.

Bradford may have taken the Heisman favorite's role from Tech's Graham Harrell just on his first-half performance. Nine for 12, 176 yards and two touchdowns. He led an exquisitely balanced attack that produced 402 first-half yards.

"The guy's incredible, just out of this world," Sooners coach Bob Stoops said.

Running back DeMarco Murray pounded his way to 110 yards. Tight end Jermaine Gresham caught five balls for 95 yards. Remember, this was all before halftime.

Blame Tech coach Mike Leach for some of the avalanche. He passed up a reasonable-distance field goal attempt down 14-0, turning it over on downs from the 15.

That decision wasn't as bad as his fourth-and-4 gamble from the Sooners' 45 early in the second quarter. Another incompletion, and Oklahoma's hot offense quickly cashed in.

Oklahoma didn't let up in the second half. Ahead 58-14 late in the third quarter, Bradford launched a bomb to Manuel Johnson, who snared it one-handed and completed a 66-yard score.

Throughout the night, the Sooners' defense dominated, and this might have been the evening's most pleasing development for Stoops.

The Oklahoma defenses of old showed up Saturday. It constantly harassed Harrell, bottled up Michael Crabtree and held Tech to 45 rushing yards.

"We didn't do anything fancy," Stoops said. "Fundamentals, just normal stuff."

Oklahoma controlled both lines. Bradford had plenty of time to make things happen and Chris Brown joined Murray as a 100-yard rusher, romping through gaping holes.

"The line was really special," Stoops said. "To protect like they did, to run like we did..."

What to make of Texas Tech? At 10-0, the Red Raiders matched their best start in school history and their No. 2 ranking was uncharted territory. They'd gotten there on Harrell's strong and accurate arm, the next-level receiving skills of Crabtree and an improved running game and defense that separated this from past Leach editions.

Oklahoma took all of that away and ran its record to 60-2 in home games under Stoops, and the scoreboard light show many expected never materialized.

"We've played these guys a lot, and not a lot have been shootouts," Stoops said. "I want to say this in a humble way, but we expected to play well and for it not to be a shootout."

The Sooners' task isn't complete. They'll play a ranked team on the road for the first time this season when they meet rival Oklahoma State. Win that one and Oklahoma will finish no worse than in a first-place tie for the division lead and could be in the Big 12 title game for a third straight season.

UMass falls to Maine on road

27 turnovers cost UM chance vs. Black Bears

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team learned the importance of finishing a game strong.

The Minutewomen (2-2) started off well against Maine (1-2), going on an 8-0 run started by a 3-pointer from sophomore guard Cerie Mosgrove on an assist from Diatiema Hill. Yet UMass started to lose focus on steady game-play and began to rush shots. The Minutewomen turned the ball over 13 times in the first half and 27 times overall.

Mosgrove had a game-high 19 points and two assists. She went 6-for-13 from 3-point range, the second time this year that she's scored five or more threes, the first coming against Bishop's University in an exhibition which doesn't count toward her stats this season.

Despite Black Bears' starting junior guard Kristen Baker – Baker also had a Black Bear team-high 16 points – having eight turnovers, the Minutewomen starting-five totaled 20 turnovers, as opposed to the 12 from Maine's starters.

UMass began to pull away late in the first half, with a 21-9 lead with just over 6 minutes remaining in the period. However, the Black Bears went on a 15-7 run in the remainder of the half to cut the Minutewomen's lead to four.

Maine needed nearly 10 minutes in the second half to chip away at UMass' fluctuating lead, but with a Samantha Baranowski lay-up on a fast break, the Minutewomen wouldn't have the lead for the rest of the game.

Besides turnovers by the Minutewomen, the Black Bear bench made the difference in the game, scoring 32 points – 22 in the second half. The UMass bench couldn't answer this challenge, going scoreless in the second half – totaling six points in the game.

One of the only bright spots for the Minutewomen was that Maine consistently turned the ball over. UMass had 15 steals to the Black Bears' seven. Both Hill and senior guard Stefanie Gerardot had a team-high three steals during the game.

Senior forward Stefanie Gerardot and the Minutewomen fell to the Black Bears, 54–45, Sunday afternoon in Augusta, Maine, committing 27 turnovers in their second loss of the season. Gerardot couldn't find her range shooting the basketball, missing on all eight of her 3-point attempts.

Used as a stopper on defense, Hill actively crowded the defensive glass, gaining eight rebounds.

While Gerardot is a scoring option that UMass coach Marnie Dacko likes to turn to, Maine held Gerardot to just seven points on three of fourteen field goals. She got to the foul line once, but only converted one of two shots. As a team the Minutewomen converted four of nine free-throws.

|---|---|
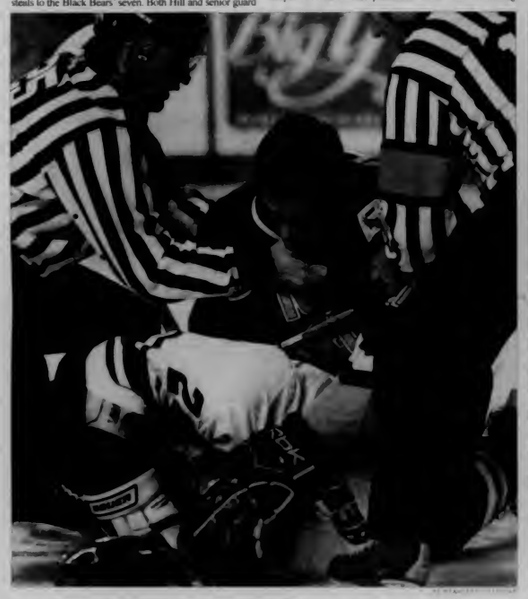
| UMass | 45 |

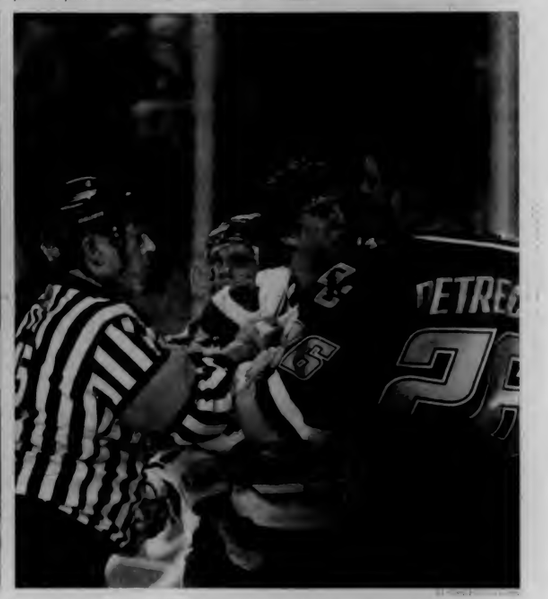
Maine, however, had more success from the charity stripe. The Black Bears pressured UMass into committing 21 personal fouls, resulting in Maine going 17-23 from the foul line – 16 of those points coming in the second half alone.

Maine focused on scoring in the paint in the second half, which led to many opportunities at the foul line. Sophomore center Teya Wright committed four fouls in the second half alone, prompting Dacko to give more time to sophomore forwards Stephanie Lawrence and Valerie Avebe.

Wright finished the game as the only other Minutewoman to score an double figures. She totaled 10 points and pulled in nine rebounds. Neither Avebe nor Lawrence scored during the game.



The absence of Wright allowed Maine to dominate rebounding. The Black Bears recorded 33 defensive rebounds, but neither team converted defensive boards into fast-break opportunities very often.



Avebe committed five fouls by game's end, to go along with four rebounds and a steal.

The most points contributed by any UMass bench player was two.

After the game, Dacko refused to comment. No other players or coaches could be reached for comment.

Senior Alex Berry and Boston College's Nick Petrecki fought after Petrecki was called for cross-checking Berry 7 minutes, 11 seconds into the second period Saturday at the Mullins Center.

UMass' Alex Berry received 14 penalty minutes and BC's Nick Petrecki had 16 minutes for three roles in the second period Friday in UMass' 4–3 win over No. 4 Boston College Saturday.

Line changes lead to offense

Shutout streak ends Saturday in victory

By Ryan Fleming
Collegian Staff

Coaches make adjustments all the time. Some are during a game and others are before a game. Some changes are proven to be unsuccessful while others make the coach look like he's fit for the job.

The alteration Massachusetts hockey coach Don Cahoon made changed the face of the Minutemen – at least for the time being.

After being shutout in two straight games, the first against UMass Lowell and the second last Friday at No. 4 Boston College (7-4-1, 5-3-1 Hockey East), Cahoon decided to jumble the lines around, separating his previously explosive first line of Alex Berry, Cory Quirk and James Marcou. It worked in UMass' favor defeating the Eagles, 4-3, in overtime.

Not only did Cahoon just switch up the first line, he removed them all from UMass' top line entirely.

Cahoon pulled Berry and Marcou down to the second line and replaced Quirk with the game's eventual hero, freshman Casey Wellman; Wellman scored the game-winning goal with 49 seconds remaining in overtime.

"We've gone a couple games without scoring any goals," Cahoon said. "I thought maybe it would be a good break from them."

Chase Langeraap was replaced by freshman T.J. Syner. Syner provided the Minutemen (6-4-1, 4-3-1 Hockey East) with speed into the offensive zone, doing his own part to create offensive chances.

"Langeraap is coming off surgery, I'm not giving him a lot of games consecutively," Cahoon said. "Syner's speed I obviously wanted in the lineup and you can probably see why during the game – he gets around the rink pretty well."

Marcou put the Minutemen on the board early shooting home a rebound that Boston College goaltender John Muse coughed up.

"Marcou got us started with a couple of plays ... and I think everybody relaxed a little bit and just started to play," Cahoon said.

Not only did the Minutemen score four goals they also created many more chances than they have in their last two games. UMass had 41 shots on net, attempting a total of 69.

Cahoon preached how his whole practice revolves within a system so all of his players have the ability to play on any line and on any position.

The Minutemen looked like a whole different team Saturday night compared to Friday and Nov 15 against UML. UMass moved the puck easier, making crisper, tape-to-tape passes.

They exited their defensive zone with speed and efficiency, not spending extra time in their own end or giving Boston College an opportunity to force a turnover.

UMass' improved play might be used as a reflection point later in the year.

"This game might be a game that we might look to to say, 'OK hopefully we can get some play off it,'" Cahoon said.

Despite the power play being unsuccessful for their last 19 opportunities, the two units show promise. Martin Nolet scored a goal that was surely caused by the play of the power-play unit, netted only two seconds after BC's Tim Filangieri stepped out of the box.

Wellman, who had one goal and two assists on the night, which included the game-winning goal in overtime, proved to be a pivotal part for UMass' offense. It was Wellman's hard work that earned the Minutemen the win, firing home a rebound to the delight of his teammates and the 8,389 in attendance.

The Minutemen have many things going for them, their newfound scoring touch, their strong penalty kill and two dependable net minders in Paul Dainton and Dan Meyers. As this season has shown, though, no one really knows how long any of it will last.

Dainton strong against Eagles

team were called for 10-minute misconducts – including UMass' Justin Braun, Martin Nolet, Casey Wellman and Berry. UMass earned a power play after the scrum due to Petrecki's cross-check.

"That's hockey, that's college hockey," Berry said. "You can't fight, but it's just us coming together as a team, sticking up for one another. BC was pushing hard right there and we pushed back. I think once we got everything settled out in the third we were able to come together, just a team effort digging down deep to get two points tonight at home in front of 8,300."

With just over 2 minutes remaining in the second period, BC's Benn Ferriero scored the tying goal. Both teams took the ice for the third period tied, 3-3, to play a scoreless 20 minutes. UMass outshot BC 13-12 and pushed offensively for the majority of the period creating many scoring opportunities, but couldn't beat Muse.

Dainton faced 42 shots from BC, including nine while the Eagles were on the man advantage. His successful play ultimately kept the Minutemen in the game.

"I thought Dainton was sharp, thought he was aggressive," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "He was square to the puck all night; it looked like he had a real good glove all night. He gave us that type of goaltending that you need to win a game like this."

On Friday, the Minutemen weren't as successful. UMass started out the game playing hard, making hard crisp passing, forechecking deep and moving the puck around successfully in the offensive zone. But, in the end Boston College took advantage of its power-play opportunities. On eight chances the Eagles took 20 shots and scored two goals – one in the second and another in the third period.

Game notes

A record-setting 8,389 fans attended the Mullins Center in UMass' win Saturday. Wellman's goal was his first game-winning goal of his career, his second of the season. ... In the second period alone the penalty minutes totaled 106. UMass had 58 minutes in the game compared to BC's 54. Saturday ... In the 112 penalty minutes in Saturday's game there were only eight power-play opportunities – three for UMass. ... Wellman and Marcou led the team in points (three) Saturday. ... Marcou had two goals and an assist. Wellman scored one goal and had two assists.

Minutemen lose in first round of NCAA tournament

BY MELISSA TURTINEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A cross ended the Massachusetts men's soccer team's 2008 season.

In the 103rd minute of the first round of the NCAA tournament, Harvard's Andre Akpan scored the lone goal of the game in the second overtime to beat UMass 1-0 in dramatic fashion.

|---|---|
| UMass | 0 |

UMass was attacking, but turned over the ball near midfield and the Crimson started counter-attacking. Akpan went 1-on-1 against freshman Andrew Henshaw, then made a move and shot the ball past senior goalkeeper Zack Simmons.

"I went to go in the box and tried to get a cross in, but with the wind today just took it into the far post," Akpan said, describing the goal.

"He made a move and had a tiny, tiny bit of daylight and he snuck it between our defender, me and the far post. It was a good shot," Simmons said.

UMass had its fair share of chances, though, outshooting Harvard 16-12 and holding the advantage in corner kicks, 8-3.

"We had four outstanding chances and when you don't put those away, then you are in here, in the [press tent] first," UMass coach Sam Koch said.

Freshman Chris Roswess and junior Mark DeSantis had numerous chances throughout the game, but just couldn't get by Harvard goalkeeper Austin Harms or defender Robert Millock.

In the second overtime, Roswess was in front of the goal and picked up a loose ball and took a shot through the scrum in front. DeSantis and Stuart Amick were right there to tap in the ball. It looked like they had the game-winning goal, but Millock cleared the ball off of the goal line.

"It was awfully close. We watched their game against [Boston University] and they won in the second overtime 10 seconds into the game and it was almost a spitting image of the same play," Harvard coach Jamie Clark said.

See SOCCER on page B7

Mark DeSantis had numerous opportunities in Saturday's 1-0 loss to Harvard, but couldn't put one past Crimson goalkeeper Austin Harms. The Minutemen almost had a goal in double overtime but couldn't capitalize, while Harvard did minutes later.

Simmons leaves legacy at UM

BY SCOTT FELDMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It happened in an instant. One second the ball was being dribbled down the pitch, the next it was sitting there in the corner of the net.

Just like that, the career of the best goalkeeper in Massachusetts men's soccer history ended.

Goalkeeper Zack Simmons holds nearly every important record in school history, including career saves (386), career shutouts (30), career wins (42) and wins in a single season (17) to name a few. During his time at UMass he has been named UMBRO National Player of the Year, Soccer News Net National Player of the Year, an Academic all-American and earned over a dozen other awards.

However, in the second overtime in the first round of the NCAA tournament against Harvard, after over 100 minutes of scoreless soccer, Crimson forward Andre Akpan slipped the ball past Simmons into the net to give Harvard (12-5-0) a 1-0 victory over the Minutemen (10-6-3).

"[Akpan] dribbled it wide, he made a move, he had a tiny bit of daylight and snuck it between our defender and me and into the far post," Simmons said. "It happens, it was a good shot."

It happened so fast, that Simmons didn't know how to react at first.

"It was a shock. I thought 'did it go in?' What exactly does that mean?" it didn't quite register that the game was over," Simmons said. "It was just a weird feeling. I didn't know how to react and obviously it was just sad at the same time."

The job of a goalkeeper can be cruel and unforgiving. For over 100 minutes, Simmons and the defense prevented Harvard from getting anything going. During that time, Simmons snagged several crosses out of the air, benefitted from his defenders being correctly positioned during corner kicks and free kicks, made three saves and fielded countless other kicks.

However, as soon as the ball touched the net, everything Simmons had done well for the previous 102 minutes suddenly seemed unimportant. The Minutemen's season, and the college careers of five departing seniors — Simmons, Tony Bassett, Mike Desantis, Prince Ofosu and Chris Brown — were over.

It was a hard way to lose, but UMass coach Sam Koch recognized the job Simmons, and all of his other seniors did throughout their career, noting that because of their efforts, UMass is becoming a top program.

"I'm proud of our team for fighting back through the season to get to this point," said Koch. "I feel for our seniors to have this be their last game. They have done a tremendous job in getting our program to this point."

Simmons in particular earns a lot of credit for guiding UMass to back-to-back NCAA tournament appearances — not that he is willing to take much credit.

Simmons never imagined that he would even play on a Division I team, let alone become the starting goalkeeper for a College Cup team. Coming into UMass as a freshman, he played for the club team at UMass, and didn't consider trying out for the Minutemen until a friend suggested he do so.

"It was a cold, snowy kind of try-outs that I went to and I just tried to work as hard as possible. One of the coaches was nice enough to give me an opportunity and I just tried to take advantage of it," Simmons said.

Simmons earned a chance as a walk-on and has gotten better ever since. His best year came in 2007 when Simmons helped lead the Minutemen to their deepest postseason run in program history, going 17-8-1 as they made the College Cup.

After that year he wasn't sure he would return for a redshirt year. He did, and this season wasn't nearly as smooth for the Minutemen, who started off with a 2-6-2 record. Simmons began to wonder if he made the right choice. But as the Minutemen fought back to earn an NCAA tournament berth, Simmons remembered why he decided to come back.

"Halfway through the season I was kind of wondering was this the right decision," Simmons said. "But now I have no doubt in my mind that this was the right decision both from a personal standpoint and from a soccer standpoint."

Running back Tony Nelson rushed for a career-high 204 yards and two touchdowns in Saturday's 28-14 season-finale victory over Hofstra on Senior Day. Nelson finished with 1,325 yards this season.

UMass ends with win

Coen throws for two scores in final game of record career

BY RYAN FLEMING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Statistically eliminated from the playoffs and out of time but full on pride, the Massachusetts football team ended its tough season on a high note early Saturday evening when it downed the Hofstra Pride, 28-14.

Nothing this season came easily for the Minutemen (7-5, 4-4 Colonial Athletic Association), suffering numerous key injuries and losing games that were once within their reach.

But the season finally provided some relief for UMass head coach Don Brown and the seniors that know beating the Pride (4-8, 2-6 CAA) and finishing 7-5 is a whole lot better than finishing 6-6.

|---|---|
| Hofstra | 14 |

"You know, it's a great feeling to win the last game," Brown said. "A winning season and people are disappointed kind of shows how high the bar is set [at UMass]."

"I'm not going to make any excuses [for the season], I'm just glad that we were able to respond ... this will be one of my top five victories just watching these guys and how they responded from last week. It just goes to show you why I love coaching."

In senior quarterback Liam Coen's last game he played as well as he would have liked: 13-for-18 passing, 79 yards and two touchdowns.

Coen leaves the school with a great legacy and Brown knows that.

"I've said it a hundred times, I don't throw bouquets ... every yard he got here, he earned," Brown said. "All he cared about was getting the 'W.' The only thing that has been important to this young man was finding a way to win the football game."

Tony Nelson, though, carried the Minutemen on his back, literally. The junior running back gained 204 yards on 28 carries and added two touchdowns. Nelson eluded Pride defenders all game, running mostly up the middle through holes created by his offensive linemen. Even when Nelson seemed to be rounded up by defenders he then bulled his way through, his share of 3-point shots. He made 32-of-101 attempts from beyond the arc for Wake Forest, putting him eighth in Demon Deacon history for most 3-pointers during the regular season for a freshman. As a starter, Kellogg will expect a big year offensively, something he is very capable of having.

Home ice makes the difference, especially when over 8,000 people are cheering for your team.

In the Massachusetts hockey team's home-and-home series against Boston College this weekend, the home team came out victorious. On Friday the No. 16 Minutemen lost, 2-0, at Kelley Rink at Conte Forum, but 24 hours later the Minutemen defeated No. 4 Boston College, 4-3, in overtime at the Mullins Center, proving that anyone can win a Hockey East game.

"I think personally the crowd is like another player out there, they help us out so much, it's so alive in [the Mullins Center] compared to all the other arenas in Hockey East," said sophomore goaltender Paul Dainton.

After a crowd-pleasing first three periods Saturday, overtime proved to be no different. After a successful penalty kill and with 41 seconds remaining in overtime, freshman Casey Wellman was positioned to the right of the crease with a wide-open net, BC goaltender John Muse out of position and the puck just sitting there — a perfect combination for Wellman to put away the game-winning goal for the Minutemen.

"[Topher Bevis] looked at the net and saw [Alex] Berry and I going to the net, Berry got a great tip on it and it kind of snuck through just waiting there for me to put it in. It was exciting for me," Wellman said.

After not scoring a single goal against the Eagles the night before, the Minutemen altered their lines and James Marcou scored 1 minute, 18 seconds into the game with a wraparound goal — kicking off a scoring spree for both teams.

"The last two games we didn't even score a goal — home against Lowell and away against BC. That was a big thing we talked about [Saturday] morning getting more quality scoring chances and shots on net, getting traffic on occasion, I think we did that tonight and were able to come out with a win," Berry said.

Going into the second period, the Minutemen were beating the defending national champions, 3-2. The crowd enjoyed the action as BC's Nick Petrecki cross-checked Alex Berry to prompt a brawl at the 7:11 mark in the second period. Each player paired off with their opponent and four of the five men on the ice from each

In-depth look at the Minutemen

Guard play strong, frontcourt depth a major question mark

BY ADAM MILLER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It's no secret that the Massachusetts men's basketball team will rely on the dribble-drive motion-offense this season in Derek Kellogg's first year as head coach.

He made sure to make his mark for the Minutemen quickly, signing mostly big-men transfers. But UMass will have to make-do without them this season because they will redshirt due to NCAA eligibility rules.

The challenge this year will be winning games despite limited bodies in the interior.

Here is a player-by-player breakdown of the roster at each position, in order of expected playing time.

GUARDS

CHRIS LOWE

Kellogg believes that in order to run his new offense smoothly, point guard play will be the key.

After last season's success, Lowe is expected to be the leader of the Minutemen. The senior captain has high expectations after making the Atlantic 10 Preseason First Team. He averaged 11.8 points per game and 6.3 assists in 2007-08.

"The great thing about Chris Lowe is that he brings senior leadership to the team," Kellogg said. "He's going to be a very, very good player as this season goes on."

But it's not just offense that Kellogg is expecting from No. 14 — which just so happens to be Kellogg's old jersey number. Lowe is one of UMass' best defensive guards and will be asked to take on the responsibilities of putting pressure on opposing guards.

Towards the end of the season, Lowe began to show a more consistent defensive effort with at least two steals in seven of the last eight games. Kellogg would have no complaints if Lowe can do the same this year.

RICKY HARRIS

Harris, the team's No. 1 scoring option, averaged 18.2 points per game last year and is the second-highest returning scorer in the conference. Harris worked on his shooting during the offseason in an effort to make himself an even better weapon offensively.

Harris finished with a 37.4 percent success rate on 3-pointers last season which ranked seonc on the team but not enough to establish himself as one of the Top 15 outside shooters (percentage-wise) in the A-10.

With redshirt sophomore Anthony Gurley in the mix as part of a three-guard system, Harris won't have to shoulder all of the scoring load with Gary Forbes having graduated.

ANTHONY GURLEY

The Wake Forest transfer should provide a second, true scoring option for UMass while taking some of the pressure off of Harris and Lowe. Gurley played 14.5 minutes per game for the Demon Deacons in his freshman season, averaging 6.4 points per game. He was highly recruited out of high school (Boston, Mass) and will get plenty of opportunities to show why this season.

Gurley brings a season of experience playing in the Atlantic Coast Conference, which is one of the most competitive basketball conferences in the country. Kellogg will use the redshirt sophomore's experience in playing against nationally ranked teams to help bring the Minutemen to a national stage.

As a newcomer to the team, Gurley will have no problems taking

DAVID GIBBS

This freshman point guard should be one of the most athletic players for UMass this season. He is going to have to work for playing time behind Lowe, but could be solid coming off the bench.

He isn't quite as strong as he needs to be to endure the physical play of Division I, but could easily lead the Minutemen once Lowe leaves.

When Gibbs does come into the game, he is going to be a fan favorite with his jumping ability.

GARY CORREIA

Correia will start out as the back-up point guard, but the talent of Gibbs may cut into his playing time when Harris and Gurley need a breather.

Correia is a pass-first point guard, a guy who handles the ball well and makes good decision. He rarely turns the ball over.

During the 2007-08 season, Correia barely averaged over a point per game, but with more playing time, he should have more opportunities to get shots. If Kellogg decides to put Matt Glass at the forward position, that will free up even more time for Correia.

In the National Invitation Tournament wins over Syracuse and Florida, Correia hit a 3-pointer in both games to help the Minutemen advance to the next round. Kellogg hopes Correia can do more timely shooting this year as well.

MATT GLASS

The 6-foot-7 sophomore has established himself as one of best shooters on the team, but he is likely going to be asked to play in the post as UMass has a shortage of interior players.

When he does play on the perimeter, Glass has great shooting touch, but hasn't developed defensively or in his ball-handling skills. How much he plays this season will ultimately be determined by how well he adjusts to becoming a forward if he is moved there.

"Right now, we don't have a lot of experience," Kellogg said. "With Luke [Bonner] being out, it kind of puts it where we rely on too many inexperienced players and we're looking for them to make experienced plays."

DOUG WIGGINS

The former Connecticut point guard will sit out the 2008-09 season after transferring to UMass during the offseason. Next year, Wiggins will compete with Gibbs for the starting point guard spot.

"He competes at a high level and has done it at the highest level so I'm looking forward to coaching him," Kellogg said.

Behind A.J. Price, Wiggins averaged 6.7 points and 2.7 assists per game, playing in all 31 games for the Huskies last season.

FORWARDS

TONY GAFFNEY

Without Hasheem Brower or Dante Milligan in the mix for the Minutemen, this 6-foot-8 forward will have to step up this season to provide a bulk of the rebounding.

Gaffney averaged 3.2 points and 4.8 rebounds per game last year, but worked hard over the offseason to improve his rebounding. The forward has good athleticism and can play on the perimeter or inside.

Gaffney provides plenty of help on the defensive end. He finished the year with 59 blocks, which was the fourth-highest amount in the A-10 — and that came as a bench player and over an average of 20 minutes per game.

"He's been everything I've expected and then some," Kellogg said. "He's been our best defender."

As a starter, Kellogg will expect him to become even more dominant on the defensive end in order to help UMass in its transition game.

His offensive game has also grown stronger, and he is expected to score down-low now.

TRAVON WILCHER

When describing his 6-foot-7 forward, Kellogg doesn't hold back on his feelings on how prepared Wilcher is to play significant minutes.

"It's a little unfair to put him in this position so early in his career," Kellogg said.

Prior to the start of the season, Wilcher wasn't going to play much unless the Minutemen had a big lead at the end of the game. With injuries to Bonner and Matt Hill, that may no longer be the case.

Wilcher is athletic and talented on both ends of the floor, but is foul prone and raw.

MATT HILL

Although he is undersized for a big man, Hill was supposed to be a contributor off the bench to get Gaffney some rest. But with a torn Achilles tendon, Hill will need surgery and is out for the season.

He played a total of eight minutes all of last year in five games, but was supposed to see more playing time this year.

CENTERS

LUKE BONNER

The redshirt senior brings one thing that UMass lacks: size. At 7-foot-1, he is easily the tallest player on the Minutemen.

For the first time in Bonner's collegiate career, he will be looked upon to rebound, defend, and score in significant playing time. The problem is that Bonner will miss the next month with a knee injury.

This decimates UMass inside, where Kellogg was relying on him to help out Gaffney in the post and on the glass. Without the veteran leadership that comes with Bonner's size and experience, UMass will be forced to rely on its guards even more than it planned to this season.

When he returns from his injury, Bonner will also add a talented shooter, that big men have to respect. That opens the floor for the guards to drive to the hoop.

TYRELL LYNCH

When Lynch started practice for the first time with the Minutemen he expected to be learning the center position behind Bonner.

But for the first month of the season, he will now have to do plenty of learning on the job. Lynch will start at center while Bonner recovers from his injury. The center has plenty of potential, although for now potential isn't going to be good enough for Kellogg.

"He has a chance to be a very good player, but I need it to happen sooner rather than later," Kellogg said.

Lynch is a good rebounder and can score around the basket, but is still getting used to the speed of college basketball.

HASHIM BAILEY

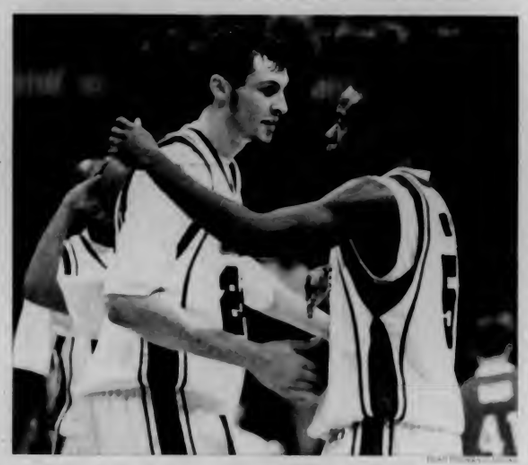
When you're playing behind an NBA draft pick, minutes come far and few between. With a three-man rotation of Joey Dorsey (now 35 draft pick by the Portland Trailblazers), Robert Dozier and Shawn Taggart, Memphis coach John Calipari had no reason to make Bailey part of his nine-man rotation.

Bailey will just have to wait one more year (while he sits out) to get that chance.

Considering that UMass doesn't have that luxury of producing NBA-caliber big men, Kellogg figured he would be useful for the Minutemen with Bonner and Gaffney leaving after this season.



The former Memphis assistant used his relationship with Bailey to recruit him to transfer to UMass. He brings great size and a strong frame that will take up plenty of space inside.

SEAN CARTER

Kellogg's third transfer (Oregon State) is a very athletic player who specializes on the defensive end. He played in 29 games, starting nine, and averaged 3.3 points and 2.8 rebounds per game.

Carter, like Bailey and Wiggins, will sit out this season.

Adam Miller can be reached at amiller@student.umass.edu

Senior captain Tony Gaffney, left, and junior guard Ricky Harris embrace in a game last season. Gaffney has been a strong presence early in the season for the Minutemen, averaging 12.7 points and 13.7 rebounds per game.

Xavier still elite team in A-10; Temple, Dayton strong again

Eli Rosenswaike

The man — or in this case, the woman — in charge of the Atlantic 10 has changed this season, not much else has.

Xavier is still the class of the conference, while teams like Temple, Saint Joseph's, Dayton, Charlotte and Massachusetts are talented enough to potentially make a run and reach the NCAA tournament.

But new A-10 Commissioner Bernadette McGlade — who spent the last 11 years in the Atlantic Coast Conference — is likely to see a virtual repeat from last season in the A-10, where the Musketeers steamroll the conference and a few other teams sneak into the NCAA.

With the season barely underway, now is a good time to dissect all the teams in the A-10 — or the Atlantic 14 as I like to call it — and see how they rank in my opinion.

1. XAVIER MUSKETEERS

Lose three stars to graduation, add a few new ones; coach Sean Miller has a nice thing going on in Cincinnati, Ohio.

Losing studs Drew Lavender, Stanley Burrell and Josh Duncan will be felt, but Miller has returning starters Derrick Brown and C.J. Anderson, as well as veterans Jason Love and B.J. Raymond. He's got a talented sophomore (Dante Jackson), a solid transfer (Jamel McLean) and a host of highly-touted freshman.

This team will be just fine, but may be hard-pressed to repeat last season's Elite 8 appearance.

2. TEMPLE OWLS

After failing to reach the NCAA tournament for seven straight seasons, Temple returned last year.

Expect them to be back again this season.

The Owls return four starters, including two of the better players in the A-10 — Dionte Christmas (the best) and Lavoy Allen. Christmas is the leading returning scorer in the conference (19.7 last year) and Allen is underrated and has improved his game already this season.

The team is experienced, talented, well-coached and ready to step up and become even better this year.

3. DAYTON FLYERS

Dayton narrowly takes the third spot in my preseason rankings. Its best player is gone (Brian Roberts), but three of their four leading scorers are back and a healthy Chris Wright is nothing other teams in the conference want to contend with.

The Flyers are constantly getting better and return three starters, their three leading rebounders, the reigning A-10 Sixth Man of the Year (Charles Little) and a scary Wright down low.

4. SAINT JOSEPH'S HAWKS

This is a team that could have been ranked higher than Dayton. And with such a great coach, Phil Martelli, I'll probably regret putting them here.

Although they lose two very good players (Pat Calthes and Rob Ferguson) from last season, they still have Ahmad Nivins (A-10 First Team Preseason Selection) and starting guards from last year Tasheed Carr and Darrin Govens.

Martelli always has a talented team that plays the game hard and fundamentally well, so this team will be dangerous.

5. MASSACHUSETTS MINUTEMEN

This will be one of the most interesting teams to watch in the conference: new coach, new offense, question marks inside, injury problems, young talent, etc.

Anything could happen with this team and I wouldn't be all that surprised. But if they want to be dangerous, the Minutemen need Tony Gaffney to continue to play this well, Chris Lowe to stop struggling, Anthony Gurley to meet expectations and one of the new kids to grow up fast.

6. CHARLOTTE 49ERS

They return four starters from last year's team that beat UMass in the A-10 tournament and reached the NIT. I'm not completely sold on this team, but I could definitely see them finish ahead of UMass.

Lamont Mack is a good shooter, but losing leading scorer Leemire Goldwire and its lack of a strong presence in the paint worries me.

7. SAINT LOUIS BILLIKENS

The Billikens only return four players overall and two starters (Kevin Lisch and Tommie Liddell), but those were their two best players. They play tough defense and Rick Majerus is still a good coach.

8. RHODE ISLAND RAMS

The Rams could be better than I rank them. Three starters return, including elite shooter Jimmy Baron and solid rebounder and defensive presence Kahlem Seawright. But there's really not much else there.

9. RICHMOND SPIDERS

This was going to be an up-and-coming team in the conference. But with junior big-man Dan Geriot lost for the season with a knee injury, Richmond is left with virtually nothing inside.

But this team has some talent (Kevin Anderson and David Gonzalvez) and will scrap and play hard to make things unpleasant for other teams.

10. GEORGE WASHINGTON COLONIALS

Led by senior forward Rob Diggs, GW returns four of their five top scorers from last year. Talented point guard Maureece Rice is gone, and that's a great thing for team chemistry because he was a major distraction and headache during his career.

11. LA SALLE EXPLORERS

The good news is they return four starters and six of their seven leading scorers from 2007-08. The bad news is their leading scorer — and most prolific 3-point shooter in A-10 history — Darnell Harris is gone. But the team has Rodney Green and Jerrell Williams as a good inside-outside combination.

12-14. DUQUESNE, FORDHAM AND ST. BONAVENTURE

That is in no particular order. I don't know how these three teams will finish, other than it being last, second-to-last and third-to-last in the conference.

Expectations uncertain for UMass

Minutemen hope to return to NCAAs with new coach

BY SCOTT FELDMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

This season the Massachusetts men's basketball team will have a brand-new coach and a brand-new offense. However, the key to a successful season will be their ability to play old-school defense.

Last year, under coach Travis Ford, UMass focused on creating an up-tempo offense with the gameplan that the Minutemen would outscore their opponents to win games. That tactic didn't take UMass to the NCAA Tournament, but rather to the NIT championship game.

This year will be different under new coach Derek Kellogg. He wants UMass to start winning games with strong defense.

"I'm hoping from watching them last year and this year that [fans] say this year [the Minutemen] are better defensively," Kellogg said. "I'm hoping they say that they know where they are on defense, they're pressuring the ball and those things."

The most talked-about addition Kellogg brought to UMass from his tenure as an assistant at Memphis is the dribble-drive motion offense.

The offense relies on the point guard breaking his defender down off the dribble then either attempting to score himself or finding the open man. However, Kellogg wants UMass to emphasize defense, which he feels is crucial to lasting success.

"It's a long-term project of building this program," Kellogg said. "We're going to build it through tough, solid defense and our dribble-drive motion offense.

"I've seen what I'm trying to do work at the highest level and we are going to build through that blueprint," he added.

The switch in philosophy is partly due to coaching style, but also because of personnel. UMass lost three seniors: Gary Forbes, Etienne Brower and Dante Milligan to graduation. Those players were first, third and fifth on the team in scoring, respectively, and Kellogg acknowledges it is going to be difficult to replace that production, not to mention their experience.

"We don't have the offensive firepower that we had last year," Kellogg said. "Three fifth-year seniors [graduated] and experience in college basketball is as important as anything. If you've got experience, sometimes you can face a team with McDonald's All-American's or better players and beat them. We are lacking experience and guys that have played a lot of minutes."

Kellogg also noted that only three players, senior point guard Chris Lowe, senior forward Tony Gaffney and junior guard Ricky Harris, played substantial minutes last year. It will be the job of those players to lift their game to the next level while mentoring the younger players.

Another reason for the emphasis on defense is the Minutemen's lack of size in the frontcourt. Three games into the season the Minutemen lost seven-footer Luke Bonner for at least a month, and 6-foot-7 forward Matt Hill for the season.

"While [Bonner] has some limitations, he is important to us because he's a senior who knows how to play, he wants to win and knows his responsibilities," Kellogg said. "He's a guy you can rely on to be in the spot he's supposed to be in when he's supposed to be there."

Gaffney, at 6-foot-9, is now the only big man left with any real playing experience. Kellogg must rely on 6-foot-9 freshman Tyrell Lynch to start and hope that he matures quickly. Behind Lynch, the only players over 6-foot-4 are freshman Travon Wilcher and sophomore Matt Glass, but neither is accustomed to playing down-low.

The lack of size will put more pressure on perimeter defenders, such as Lowe and Harris to keep the ball out of the paint, where opponents could punish UMass.

"We're just not deep enough or big enough," Kellogg said. "If teams get in the lane they are going to hurt us. We're going to get into foul trouble, we're going to give up easy shots."

On offense, the Minutemen are built to rely on the play of their starting guards Lowe, Harris and Anthony Gurley to put points on the board. However, it's Lowe who will be under the most pressure to keep the team competitive.

Lowe is the most experienced player on the team and widely recognized as being the most talented Minutemen. He was voted to the Atlantic 10 Preseason First Team after averaging 11.8 points, 5.9 assists and 3.3 rebounds per game last year. More than anyone else, his level of play will determine how good UMass will be this year.

"The reason why we were so good at Memphis in this style of offense is because our point guards really bought into the system and our style of play," Kellogg said. "I knew [Lowe's reputation] coming in and now I'm trying to get him to take his game to next level for what we are asking of him."

As the point guard, he will have to become the Minutemen's best player on defense in addition to running the new offensive system.

"We're asking a little bit more from him defensively. I want him to be a better point guard on defense than before. I want him to be a leader," Kellogg said. "[On offense] I think he's caught between when to drive to score his own basket and when to drive to serve his team. I want him to serve his team first and worry about scoring next. He's learning; it just takes time."

Something else to watch for on offense is if the new three-point line affects the Minutemen.

This year the college line was moved further back one foot – to 20-feet 9 inches. It may not seem like much, but it will be interesting to see whether their shooting percentage declines as shooters adjust to the new distance. Especially since the Minutemen attempted 25.8 threes per game last year and have 71 tries in three games this season.

DANIEL SHARKEY/COLLEGIAN

Senior Chris Lowe averaged 11.8 points and 6.3 assists per game last season as he led the Minutemen to a 25-11 overall record.

UMass' guard trio will have to be in top shape as they are likely to play heavy minutes due to injuries and shallow depth behind them. Kellogg talked about how critical conditioning will be for the Minutemen.

"You are caught between a crossroads of how much do I condition them in practice so that they still have legs for the game, and am I doing enough so that when there is 10 minutes left in the second half they still have gas in the tank," Kellogg said.

Kellogg inherited a difficult out-of-conference schedule – highlighted by Kansas and Vanderbilt – one that he made even more challenging by scheduling a game at Memphis. UMass lost to the NCAA title runner-up Tigers, 80-58, on Nov. 17 and will face defending champion Kansas Dec. 13.

Kellogg has realistic expectations, understanding it is unlikely the Minutemen are ready to defeat a top-tier program, but feels the experience of playing the best teams pays off down the road.

"To realistically go in [against top teams] and beat them, that's a tough task," Kellogg said. "Now, can you go in there, play tough and maybe put a scare into them? Well that's the goal."

Since being hired, the former Minuteman says some of the nostalgia has worn off, but Kellogg is excited for the upcoming season.

"There is nowhere else I would rather be coaching than in this gym right now," Kellogg said, while holding practice at the Mullins Center Thursday. "I'm enjoying being around the guys, but the nostalgia of 'hey! coach is home!' and all that other stuff has worn off.

That's fun until you really start the season, but now the fans want you to win."

How the Minutemen handle the new offense and situation down-low will determine how much they do.

As a point guard at UMass from 1991-1995, Derek Kellogg led the Minutemen to four straight NCAA Tournaments.

Coach Kellogg answers the tough questions

Eli Rosenswaike

Eli Rosenswaike: Let's get right into it. You ready, coach?

Derek Kellogg: Go ahead man, fire away.

Eli: Firstly, is it acceptable to call you "Coach K," or is that only reserved for that guy at Duke?

DK: I think that's Duke's calling right now. We may have to come up with a better one for Coach Kellogg (laughs). I like "Coach DK," if anything.

Eli: You are going to be on the cover of The Score Magazine, our yearly sports magazine – so I need to ask – which is the bigger honor: getting named UMass coach or being on the cover of The Score?

DK: (Laughs) That's a good question. I think being named head coach of UMass supersedes it a little bit, but I do know the importance of that magazine, so it might be neck-and-neck right now.

Eli: With Luke Bonner and Matt Hill out with injuries, rumor has it that you are trying to find another year of eligibility for Matt Pennie (DK laughter). Can you comment on that for the record?

DK: You know what, it would be nice to find another year for Pennie. The funny thing is that he's still kind of around and lurking in the bushes. An extra year of anybody over 6-foot-4 would be useful.

Eli: Speaking of eligibility, my time at UMass is running out. I've been a student here as long as you were at Memphis. If I don't graduate soon, my parents are going to kill me. With that said, can you promise me a berth in the NCAA Tournament this year? This is my last chance, I don't want to cover the NIT again.

DK: Well Eli Blutarsky as we're going to call you for how many years you've been in school, promises are a little difficult to come by these days. But I will say we'll have an opportunity to compete in this Atlantic 10 regular season and conference tournament – and hopefully we can make a little run and at least give people some hope that we have a chance to get there.

Eli: I see you have a really nice office here, with that big contract of yours. I was thinking that you could throw some funds – or a corner of your office – to The Collegian. What do you think?

DK: (Laughs) Yeah, we'll give you a corner – you can take that table over there to the right-hand side. It would be good to have all 10 of you guys there hanging out, we'd at least have a fun time.

Eli: Fill in the blank. When you heard Travis Ford was leaving UMass for Oklahoma State, you ___?

DK: Immediately called. (Laughs). Do you want me to elaborate, or is that what you're looking for?

Eli: You can keep going.

DK: I immediately called to make sure the rumors were true this time. And I was excited to potentially have the opportunity.

Eli: Be honest, how much did you read The Collegian in your playing days? How about now? And how does it compare with Memphis' student paper?

DK: Everyday when I was playing to follow what was going on; every other day now that I'm here, because I don't usually go through the front part of the Mullins Center to get up here, so I have to make a special trip to get downstairs. And it crushes the Memphis paper.

Eli: That's good. Good answer. How long could you last doing suicides?

DK: Right now? Five minutes, five suicides.

Eli: I see you couldn't reach the 1,000-career point mark at UMass. You had four years to do it, what gives?

DK: Cal (laughs). I was a pass-first point guard, shoot second. So actually, pass first, pass second and pass third, and if the shot was there I could take it. When you play with Marcus Camby and Lou Roe – two All-Americans – you're supposed to get the ball to them.

Eli: Be honest, you don't even know what the dribble-drive motion offense is, do you?

DK: Yeah, I do (laughs).

Eli: Can you explain it?

DK: Well, right now I think our guys are having trouble knowing what the dribble-drive is, but they're learning everyday and getting better. It's a motion offense predicated on the dribble instead of the pass, and it opens up driving lanes for guys and lets them be creative and make plays. Normally it takes a little time to get it to where it needs to be and we're just on the first layer of it. When you get really good, it gets to the second, third and even the fourth layer sometimes.

Eli: What kind of booby traps did Travis Ford leave in your house when you bought it from him?

DK: (Laughs) Well, the washing machine bounces a little bit and the ice machine in the refrigerator is not working properly, but everything is pretty good over at the crib.

Eli: Think you could take me in a game of horse? And are you willing to prove it?

DK: Absolutely and absolutely.

Eli: (Laughs) We're going to have to make that happen.

DK: As long as there is a lunch wager on it.

Eli: Fair enough. What would happen in a game of one-on-one with you and coach Calipari right now?

DK: No contest.

Eli: Meaning?

DK: Meaning, he can't keep up (laughs).

Eli: You had more assists in your career than both Rick Pitino and Al Skinner, does that mean you are a better coach or just more helpful?

DK: Right now, more helpful. Hopefully at some point someday I can be compared in the same breath of those guys.

Eli: What is one thing you would want to tell the fan base?

DK: Come to the games. That we're going to play a great style and if we want to have a national program and be considered a national program that you have to have people in the seats. And that helps with recruiting, that helps when you're on TV and it helps build to where we want to get to.

Eli: What is one thing the fan base doesn't know about you?

DK: That I'm a great family man. My free time is really spent with my wife and new son. And watching him grow up and watching her be around him is the most joy I've had in just about anything in my life.

Eli: Who is the best-looking coach in the A-10? And don't tell me it's not Rick Majerus.

DK: Oh no, no. Phil Martelli (laughs). Gotta go with coach Martelli.

Eli: Why?

DK: He's the senior spokesman and he's got his TV show and radio shows, and he's a big-time celebrity in Philadelphia. It's gotta be the looks and charisma.

Eli: How nerve-racking was the interview process at UMass?

DK: Very nerve-racking. The anxiety of leading up to the interview … I think I sweated more that day than in any college basketball game I've participated in as a player. And the only other time that I think I've come close was my first head-coaching game against Arkansas-Monticello (laughs).

Eli: Could you ever have imagined having your dream job by age 35?

DK: No. I anticipated, as I viewed things, of having it a little bit later in life. Maybe 38, 39. I think 35 is a great age to have your dream job or a job of this caliber, because you're still young enough to be energized in recruiting, coaching and spending the time that's necessary to get the program at the level we want to see it.

Eli: You were a pretty good 3-point shooter in your day, do you think you could give coach Ford a run for his money in a 3-point contest?

DK: Oh, absolutely. That's not even a question (laughs).

Eli: Is the new longer 3-point line too much for you to handle, though?

DK: No, it's perfect. I mean, my range is out to NBA-range now. So our guys will co-sign for that on the team.

Eli: April 23, 2008. Sum it up in 10 seconds.

DK: April 3, 2008…

Eli: April 23rd.

DK: What did you say, 23rd?

Eli: Yeah, that was the day you were hired.

DK: (Laughs) I know, I was just messing with you (laughs). I had to get back at you for all the questions that you're asking. No, it was an unreal, surreal experience that just the energy and passion that charged through me was something that you only feel when something like that happens to you. And I wanted to get in the car and drive right up here on that minute, that second. Actually, we jumped in the car only a few days later with our infant son who was only five-days old, for an 18-hour drive.

Eli: You took over 10 seconds, but I'll let it slide.

DK: Thank you, I appreciate that.

Eli: Reports are that you made a trade with the UMass football team for former Boston University basketball player Ben Cobbyn. What are the terms of the deal?

DK: False (laughs). There is no contract. We're going to stick with the squad.

Eli: Does Mel Kiper, Jr. do your hair?

DK: No, Barry Melrose (laughs).

Eli: What kind of hair gel do you use?

DK: LA Looks. Top of the line stuff.

Eli: You are the 21st coach in UMass history, how many can you name?

DK: Five, seven?

Eli: In all Collegian interviews, for reasons I couldn't tell you, we ask all potential employees that if you could be one animal, what would it be. What's your answer and why?

DK: Hyena.

Eli: Why?

DK: That's the way I want my team to play.

Eli: How relieved are you that I have no questions left?

DK: That's great (laughs). I was getting the anxiety as if I was coaching my first game again. That was pretty good, though. Did you come up with all those questions on your own?

Eli: I did.

DK: That was right out of the ESPN Hot Seat.

Eli: So yeah, you are now off the Budweiser Hot Seat.

DK: I appreciate that.

NoHo continues protests

BY SEAN MCDONOUGH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A crowd of 80 to 100 students, Northampton residents and panhandlers marched last night in the latest of a series of protests against Ordinance 285-53, which seeks to implement limitations on panhandling and related activities.

Protesters held signs that read, "No free speech if you are disabled" and "No free speech if you need help."

If passed, the ordinance would ban people from asking for money within 15 feet of any bus stop, ATM machine, public telephone, bank or public bench.

The protest was organized by the Poverty is Not a Crime Committee (PINAC), and Bands United for the Voices of the Oppressed. The PINAC organization, whose members come from all walks of life, works in collaboration with the Freedom Center, Arise for Social Justice in Springfield and Social Change in Mind.

There was a Mock Ordinance Enforcement demonstration at 4 p.m. Black tape was placed on the ground, showing the areas in which people would not be allowed to panhandle under the ordinance. Protesters held signs at the boundaries.

This was followed by a march in which protesters chanted slogans demonstrating their opposition to the ordinance. After the protest, there was a public hearing at the Public Safety Subcommittee meeting, where various residents of Northampton spoke out against the ordinance.

"This is a constitutional issue" said Caty Simon, of the PINAC, who said this ordinance would infringe upon free speech.

"I understand this is a hot topic," said Mayor Mary Higgins in response to the protest. "We are trying to provide

Jogger, alleged assault victim

On Saturday, Nov. 22, a male University of Massachusetts employee was allegedly assaulted by at least two unknown males.

According to the Amherst Police Department, which is currently investigating the incident, the 59-year-old victim was jogging alone on North Pleasant Street near the North Village Apartments and Mark's Meadow School at approximately 7:40 p.m., when he was allegedly thrown to the ground and repeatedly kicked by his assailants.

He suffered from abrasions, a lump on his forehead, a gash on his nose, other facial injuries and a possibly dislocated shoulder. He was later hospitalized at the Baystate Medical Center in Springfield and treated for hypertension, according to the Daily Hampshire Gazette.

Police said that, initially, the man returned home and did not remember the attack right away. He then called the police an hour later.

The incident was also reported by an eyewitness, who described the attackers as late-teenaged males, according to the police.

In conjunction with this incident, police have reported that a similar incident occurred two weeks ago in South Amherst, although there is no definitive evidence linking the two, according to University of Massachusetts Police Chief Deputy Patrick Archbald.

Web site offers rides home to students

BY JOSH WALOVITCH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Gas prices have decreased to about $2 per gallon in Amherst, but it can still be costly for students to get around, especially when it comes time for students to head home for the holidays.

However, there is a way to minimize transportation costs if not eliminate them through the using Ridebuzz.org.

Ridebuzz.org is a non-profit, community-driven ridesharing program that provides rides to anyone in the Pioneer Valley. The Web site allows users to submit posts in which they can ask for or offer a ride somewhere. Some users ask for carpoolers to chip in for gas while others will drive you for free.

"We really hope that students will take the initiative to consider using responsible, economically and environmentally friendly ways to get around," said Ridebuzz founder and executive director, Jeff Brown. "Ridebuzz is an option students have which allows them to collaborate with each other on a weekend trip, grocery shopping or vacations."

There are roughly 1.4 million empty car seats that travel 15 billion miles annually in the Pioneer Valley, according to a statement by Ridebuzz.

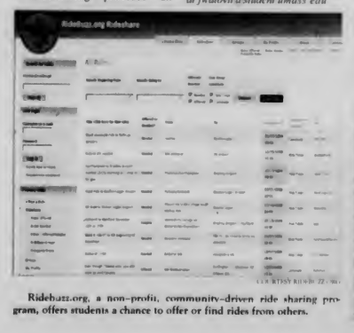
"By sharing rides we can rapidly save on fuel costs and immediately reduce greenhouse gas emissions without significant changes or investments to our transportation infrastructure," Brown said.

Ridesharing can cut fuel consumption and gas bills in half, all while building community connections, according to Ridebuzz's Web site.

Ridesharing provides an opportunity to offer a ride to the disabled or the elderly, who might not be able to drive. The elderly population is expected to increase 80 percent from 2005 to 2025.

"I think Ridebuzz is great idea," said UMass senior Callah Spinheimer. "Thanksgiving is known for having tons of cars on the road and tons of traffic no matter where you are trying to get home to. I would much rather be stuck in the car with a student for a few extra hours instead of my parents."

Ridebuzz.org says it provides accessible and flexible transportation options that aid underserved communities, deliver significant fuel savings to carpoolers, increase social cooperation, reduce carbon emissions and fuel consumption and promote the use of more efficient transportation options.



"I think that a community ridesharing Web site is a good idea, not only will it help people save on gas but it will also help in saving the environment," said UMass senior Jen Fitzgerald.

Ridebuzz.org also hopes to be a way for students to meet new people, providing users with anonymous opportunities for people to share information if they wish.

There are no employees at Ridebuzz.org, it is a voluntary effort. In the spring Ridebuzz will be working with over 400 students offering them a community marketing and sales class.

"This opportunity will allow college students to apply their skills to real world situations that will benefit UMass and the community directly around the college," Brown said.

Minutemen fail to hold last-minute lead

Junior Ricky Harris hides in his jersey after UMass failed to hold a six-point lead with under 2 minutes remaining against Jacksonville State. The Minutemen lost 75-74 in new coach Derek Kellogg's first regular season game at the Mullins Center.

College students love anything free and usually make the best of it.

But the Massachusetts men's basketball team failed to capitalize twice in the final minute from the free-throw line. The Minutemen's miscues allowed Jacksonville State to come from behind and pull off a 75-74 victory at the Mullins Center.

After struggling to regain the lead since 2 minutes, 30 seconds into the second half, UMass (1-3) put together a run a 13-0 run that started with just over 6 minutes left and the Minutemen trailing 66-59.

DeAndre Bray hit a 3-pointer with 1:10 left to end the run bringing Jacksonville to within three at 72-69.

Chris Lowe hit a lay-up on the ensuing drive to bring the lead back to five. Tony Gaffney was fouled on the following possession giving him an opportunity to extend the lead to seven with a 1-and-1 opportunity. Gaffney missed the first shot, and the Gamecock's followed by sinking a 3-pointer with 0:23 remaining.

On the shot, Lowe fouled Crawford, allowing him to complete the four-point play to bring the score to 74-73. Jacksonville, immediately fouled Ricky Harris sending the senior to the line for a 1-and-1, the second for the Minutemen in the final 29 seconds of the half.

Harris missed the first free throw, and Jacksonville's Geddes Robinson grabbed the rebound. The Gamecock's leading scorer, Jonathan Toles, drove down the other end of the court and hit a lay up to take the lead back, 75-74, with 9 seconds remaining.

"We made dumb mistakes by the veterans. Putting a senior and a junior at the line for 1-and-1 with a chance to close out the game and missing both," Gaffney said after the game. "It's unacceptable."

After a Jacksonville timeout, Lowe received the inbound, drove down court, failed to penetrate the Gamecock's defense, and passed to Anthony Gurley who missed a 3-point shot. Lowe grabbed the offensive rebound but was unable to get a shot off before the clock expired.

"They came in here and outworked us and out scrapped us and out hustled us and they deserved to win," Gaffney said.

JSU coach James Green said after the game that the game was one that he hoped both teams could learn from, but Gaffney disagreed.

"This isn't even about learning. [Players] need to learn about themselves. [Players] need to go home and look in the mirror and decide if they want to play here or if they

Student arrested for drug possession

Investigators from the Amherst Police Department and the Massachusetts State Police executed a search warrant at a local apartment complex, resulting in charges of alleged drug dealing and an arrest of a 22-year-old University of Massachusetts student.

Thomas S. Tannozzini, 22, was arrested on Nov. 20 at 11C Brandywine Drive, Amherst and charged with possession with the intent to distribute a Class B drug (LSD), possession with the intent to distribute a Class D drug (Marijuana) and possession of a Class B drug (Ecstasy.)

"The search warrant execution follows an investigation over the last several weeks," said a spokesperson from the APD in a statement to the press.

Discovered at the scene of the 4:30 p.m. raid was "a large amount of LSD tablets, several ounces of marijuana and ecstasy tablets (MDMA)," according to the statement.

Tannozzini was scheduled to be arraigned Nov. 21 in Eastern Hampshire District Court.

Information from the University concerning whether Tannozzini will face possible expulsion was not available as of press time, although there are precedents as to what happens in the event of a student being arrested.

"Generally speaking, when students are charged with drug related offenses they will be placed on interim expulsion until their trial," said Devlin Man, a senior BDIC and Political Science major who is the supervisor of the Judicial Advisors Program. "The results of the trial will determine if he'll be expelled."

What is your opinion on this matter?

Chancellor Holub has assured there would be no mid-year fee increases or financial aid decreases, but that cuts to programs and a hiring freeze would be necessary. Do you think that the hiring freeze is a good option? Would it be better to increase fees or decrease financial aid? What things could stand to be cut?

"I've been getting these emails, and they talk about energy efficiency. I think it is necessary to implement that in the future, for the environment's sake, not just financially. I think that they should have been more careful,going on and hiring some people. If you can't afford to pay these people, why did we hire them, and get their hopes up for one semester?"

-Rachael Ferranti

Classics major

"We were discussing in class that maybe high-end administrative jobs should be cut first, such as bonuses, which are only supposed to be given out in a time of surplus. When there are shortages, students shouldn't be cut by themselves, but everyone should be cut as a whole."

-Rachel Seavey

Operations Management major

"I'd say that fee increases are probably necessary, just because budget cuts are not going to keep working. We can't keep taking money away. We need the money to have the resources to keep this university the best in the region. Prices are going to go up, it is just a fact of life. As far as tuition goes, raise it, I get free tuition anyway."

-John Dunn

Psychology major, Pre-med

"I think fees are going to increase no matter what. Every year, the economy gets more messed up, with inflation, and everything increases. And as the school gets renovations, we need more money to pay for them."

a reasonable place and manner restriction on soliciting behavior, whether it is panhandling or raising money for organizations, that allows everyone to share the sidewalk amiably," Higgins explained.

She also added that "there is no prohibition of panhandling in the ordinance. It simply sets up a place and time that it can happen."

Simon said that if the ordinance is passed, "It will be incredibly difficult for people to panhandle. They say only 21 percent of the city will be affected but that 21 percent that will be affected is the area where most people will be out walking."

Opponents of the ordinance were handing out pamphlets to tell people Northampton was undergoing gentrification, the process of forcibly moving low income people into slums, ghettos or jails when wealthier people move into a community and find comfort in being surrounded by people of their own class.

"They say it is about safety but it is not," Simon said. "Middle class people are 20 times more likely to be attacked by people from their own class."

Higgins said Northampton has taken very seriously its responsibility to the town's underprivileged residents and will continue to do so by providing shelter, meals and permanent housing to those who need them, and is working with non-profit organizations to do this.

"This ordinance is part of an effort to push undesirable people out of an area that is to be a business improvement district," said PINAC member Nina Asharti a. "It is important that we protest to show our outrage. This ordinance is not being voted on by the people, it is being voted on by city council members."

Northampton police officer Andy Trushaw said the police were not notified of the protest.

"It would be nice to have had a heads up so we can set it up and make it safer for people," said Trushaw.

"Even if this ordinance is passed, we the people will intensify our efforts and resist," Asharti a said.

CampusLIVE gains national recognition

By Lisa DiMatteo
Collegian Staff

Jared Stenquist, CEO of CampusLIVE, and his team of six other former University of Massachusetts students, have been honored as third on BusinessWeek's list of "America's Best Young Entrepeneurs of 2008."

The team at CampusLIVE, Inc., was honored by the Massachusetts Statehouse and Gov. Deval Patrick last Thursday, Nov. 20, for earning the distinction.

The event, called "Enterprise on the Rise", was sponsored by the Massachusetts Office of Housing and Economic Development and was intended to celebrate the four young Bay State entrepeneurs.

The keynote speaker for the night, Tim Rowe, the CEO and founder of The Cambridge Innovation Center, delivered a speech about why the economy is ripe for the development of new businesses.

Ryan Durkin, the director of business development at CampusLIVE, agreed.

"Right now the economy is so bad that it levels the playing field for new businesses, which means we can spend more time developing the new sites, we don't have to rush," said Durkin.

As well as being a tremendous honor, the BusinessWeek article has resulted in an incredible response from students at campuses nationwide who want to bring CampusLIVE to their schools. CampusLIVE sites are now up and running at 34 schools and another 20 sites are being prepared to launch within the next two months.

"We have been working very hard to expand this resource to every college campus requesting our service," Stenquist said in a statement. "The biggest struggle thus far has been keeping up with student demand. I guess that's a good problem to have!"

CampusLIVE is also preparing to introduce its new and improved Web site sometime after the Thanksgiving break. This new site will include some new features and widgets designed to make the site more user friendly. Durkin was quick to recognize the invaluable feedback CampusLIVE gets from their 35 UMass interns and accredited many of the new Web site's features to them.

The 35 interns, half of who are interning through the Isenberg School of Management internship program, are encouraged to take on individual projects meant not only to benefit CampusLIVE but to give students experience in different fields.

"For example, if an intern is a finance major but is sick of numbers they can start a marketing project," Durkin explained. "Or, if another intern is a marketing major but also really likes to write, we'll set him up on the blog and give him a chance to do something different."

Business continues to grow for the team at CampusLIVE and anticipation is mounting as it prepares to launch the new Web sites for 20 more campuses.

Economy puts plans on hold

By Harriet Johnson Brackey
McClatchy Newspapers

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. — Joe Perri had big college dreams.

He wanted to pursue a degree in photography from an arts school.

He and his family saved, hunted for scholarships and applied for financial aid, but they eventually realized they simply couldn't find enough help to offset the $40,000-a-year cost for his first choice schools — the California Institute of the Arts and Ringling College of Art and Design in Sarasota, Fla.

"It was a big bummer, but I understand," said Perri, 18. "You get accepted to this big school, and you get so excited, but then your parents start throwing reality at you. We don't have that much money."

So Perri changed course. He's now a freshman at Broward College, formerly Broward Community College. He plans to spend two years there, saving money that he earns through a photography business he started on the side.

Getting into college is tough enough, but students now have to face a tough economy. About one out of six students have put their search for a college on hold, according to a survey conducted in October by MeritAid, a scholarship Web site. Another 57 percent said they're looking for a less expensive, lesser-known school, just as Perri did.

Here's what they face:

The most difficult competition ever: A record number of high school seniors are applying to college now.

Tough new economic hurdles: More restrictive lending requirements, driven by the national credit crunch, has led to a decline in the availability of private student loans. According to Mark Kantrowitz, publisher of FinAid.org, a Web site devoted to financial aid, 37 of 60 private lenders are not offering student loans this year. Federal student loans remain available.

Savings have taken a hit: The sinking stock market that has slashed college savings accounts for many families and declining home values have also made it difficult for families to borrow against their houses to finance an education.

Rising costs: Public college costs have doubled in the last decade.

With his own retirement nearing and college costs coming at the same time, Perri's dad says it'd be very difficult to pay big tuition bills without taking on student loans.

"For most parents, with the economy being the way it is, the last thing you want to do is sink yourself into debt," Mike Perri said. "I said 'Joseph, your dream

Changing college plans

is still there, but sometimes we have to take side roads. The point is, you're going forward.'"

That cherished family and financial goal of sending the kids to college is under serious pressure.

"You can hear about the economy a million times in school, but when it really hits home, the students realize what's needed," says Pam Kirtman, a college advisor at Nova High School in Davie, Fla. "A college education is very important to them, but they may be losing their houses, their parents are losing their jobs, and even professionals aren't working."

A sign of the crush: A record number of applications were received by the University of Florida last year and a near-record number by Florida State University. Those records may crumble when the current crop of applications is counted. At the University of Central Florida, 8,900 applications have been received from prospective freshman so far, up from 7,200 last year.

The reason?

"We wonder if many more students will be staying closer to home," said FAU Director of Admissions Janice Finney, which had two years of near-record applications.

Another possibility is cost. Florida schools are regularly touted as "Best Buys' in education. Not only are in-state tuition levels comparatively low, but Florida's Bright Futures program makes it possible for students with high grade point averages to earn scholarships.

Community colleges are gaining, too. At Palm Beach Community College, enrollment – 28,600 students currently – is 11 percent higher than last fall. At Broward College, current enrollment is up 6 percent over last year at 33,600. The number of applications from high school students jumped by 20 percent.

For some students, a community college is a good place to beef up skills to increase their marketability in a tough job market, said Grace Truman, director of college relations and marketing at Palm Beach Community College. For others, it's the cost savings that drives them to community colleges. "The real savings is being able to live at home for the first two years," she said.

One issue all schools have to face is private student loans, which have become both essential and very difficult to find because of the credit crisis. Two-thirds of all undergraduates borrow some amount.

"I don't want to do student loans," says Sarah Cochran, a senior at Pembroke Pines Charter High School, echoing the concerns of other students. "All those people are still paying them off while they're paying bills when they're older."

Cochran wanted to go to the University of Central Florida to study hospitality, with the goal of eventually working for Disney. Instead, she said she's going to go to Broward College and hunt for scholarships and financial aid.

The loans that parents take out for students – "Plus Loans" – also are showing signs of distress. Plus Loan denial rates have jumped 26.5 percent over last year, through June.

"It's a contagion effect," Kantrowitz said.

It began with the surge in subprime mortgages going into default, he said. Mortgages are bundled into securities and sold to investors. So are student loans.

"The lack of oversight of these irresponsible people has left us with this situation," said Nova High Senior Lauren Barriere, who has decided to go to college in-state if she doesn't make it into an Ivy League school. "If it's to pay a total over 120 grand for four years of college just to have a little bit better education, probably it isn't going to be worth it."

Waiting has paid off for some air travellers

By Julie Johnsson
McClatchy Newspapers

CHICAGO — For the first time in memory, airfares are falling rather than rising as the holiday travel season approaches.

The phenomenon, a byproduct of the deteriorating economy, means many procrastinators are paying about $90 less per trip than early birds who locked in pricey tickets months ago when airfares seemed certain to rise in advance of the holidays, as they typically do.

It provided an early Christmas gift for Chicagoans Carly Cannell and husband Jorge Orozco-Cordero. They had decided to skip their annual yuletide family gathering in Albany, N.Y., when fares appeared to be stuck beyond their budget in the $350 round-trip range.

That was a month ago. The couple kept checking airfares and last week landed tickets that were $75 cheaper.

"Jorge had told his mom we weren't coming," said Cannell, president of Weetu, a commercial and hospitality design firm. "That same day, he found something [at a reasonable price.]"

The spate of holiday bargains comes after financially strapped airlines shrank U.S. operations by about 10 percent this fall, the equivalent of grounding a major airline. Analysts predicted the capacity cuts would keep planes full and prices sky-high for year-end travel.

But carriers are suddenly struggling to fill seats as consumers spooked by market and economic turmoil trim their spending on everything from Christmas gifts to vacations. Analysts say the steep falloff in travel over the past six weeks caught carriers, hotels and car-rental companies off guard.

Airlines are responding with deep discounts. Southwest Airlines last week extended a three-day sale through Dec. 8, with some tickets priced for a mere $90 round trip. United and American Airlines also unveiled sales for travel in December and into the new year.

"Obviously, about the only thing they can do is cut the price for days where they aren't particularly full," said syndicated travel columnist Ed Perkins. "It's the old law of supply and demand working pretty quickly and obviously."

There are some exceptions, however. Airfares remain high to some destinations, including New York, and may have increased during peak travel days: Nov. 30, Dec. 20 and Dec. 26-28, according to BestFares.com.

But airlines also may have alienated passengers by ratcheting up rates and pushing through a host of new fees for services that previously were offered free of charge. During the first seven months of the year, carriers attempted 22 price hikes, 15 of which were successful, according to FareCompare.com.

"The airlines made no friends with anybody this summer," said Tom Parsons, chief executive and founder of BestFares.com. "I think a lot of consumers are just frustrated.... They're going, 'Guess what? Why don't we just drive?'"

Jason and Maria Maxham, Forest Park, Ill., residents with two small children, said they would rather brave an 18-hour road trip than fly to central Maine to visit family members in December. They still have vivid memories of a nightmarish, 16-hour plane trip home from Boston that the family endured last summer.

"We're trying to decide what's the lesser of two evils: driving or being stuck in an airport or on a runway with no food or water," Jason Maxham said.

Carriers hiked holiday fares in September and early October, thinking their capacity cuts would spur a shortage of airplane seats for Thanksgiving and Christmas, Parsons said. But the move backfired. They priced themselves out of the market for many regular customers.

Elmhurst, Ill., resident Kelly Marzano, who visits siblings in the Carolinas each Christmas, is among the multitude who simply made other plans in September, when holiday fares were well out of her price range.

Instead of planning a Christmas gathering, she visited her family over Halloween, when fares were cheaper. But she was dismayed to see prices for December travel tumble the week after she returned home.

Now, Marzano finds herself "flying solo" for the holidays and rooting for fares to fall even further.

"We've got more than a month to Christmas," she said. "Something could miraculously come through."

Obama annouces top economic advisors

By Steven Thomma and David Lightman
McClatchy Newspapers

CHICAGO — President-elect Barack Obama worked to send a message of confidence to jittery markets and consumers Monday, unveiling an economic team tested in crises past and present and promising a massive stimulus package big enough to send a "jolt" through the economy.

Obama vowed quick action, ordering his team to produce a plan in coming weeks. He said he hoped they could send the blueprint to the new Congress in January, even before he's sworn in.

The goals of that plan, Obama said at a news conference, include stabilizing the financial system while "addressing our growing foreclosure crisis, helping our struggling auto industry and creating and saving 2.5 million jobs."

The jobs he wants to create, Obama said, would include "rebuilding our crumbling roads and bridges, modernizing our schools and creating the clean energy infrastructure of the 21st century."

He said he'd offer more details about his future budget Tuesday.

Stock markets reacted favorably. The Dow Jones Industrial Average rose 396.97 points, or 4.98 percent, to close at 8,443.39. The tech-heavy NASDAQ Composite Index rose even more, up 87.67 points, or 6.3 percent, to close at 1472.22. The S&P 500 index rose 6.5 percent, or 51.78 points, to close at 851.81.

In an unusual sign of cooperation during a change at the White House not just of presidents but also of political parties, Obama said he'd told his economic team to work with the outgoing Bush administration, which he'd criticized repeatedly as a candidate.

He said he'd spoken with President George W. Bush earlier Monday, as well as with Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke, and would honor all public commitments that Bush made to fight the economic crisis.

That's a sharp change from a similar and oft-cited precedent in 1932, when Democrat Franklin Roosevelt refused to work with outgoing Republican President Herbert Hoover, preferring a clean break as the best sign of a fresh start.

"With our economy in distress, we cannot hesitate and we cannot delay," Obama said as he emerged from two weeks of near seclusion. "Our families can't afford to keep on waiting and hoping for a solution."

The president-elect, who's announced his White House staff picks via written statements, appeared in person to unveil his first Cabinet appointment and his economic team.

Timothy Geithner as the secretary of the treasury. As the president of the New York Federal Reserve Bank, Geithner already is deeply involved in the federal rescue of Wall Street and will spearhead Obama's plan for the overall economy.

Lawrence Summers as the director of the National Economic Council. A former secretary of the treasury under Bill Clinton, Summers helped manage financial crises in Mexico, Asia and Russia. He'll coordinate Obama's administration-wide economic policies from inside the White House, with an eye on making sure that the poor and the middle class do better.

Christina Romer as the director of the Council of Economic Advisers. An economics professor at the University of California-Berkeley, Romer also has worked with the National Bureau of Economic Research and the Federal Reserve.

Melody Barnes as the director of the Domestic Policy Council. Barnes is a former aide to Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., and a vice president of the Center for American Progress, a liberal research center in Washington headed by Obama transition co-chairman John Podesta. She'll help develop a health-care overhaul _ providing coverage to the uninsured and reducing costs for those with insurance _ an issue that Obama calls key to economic recovery.

"We know this won't be easy, and it won't happen overnight. We'll need to bring together the best minds in America to guide us, and that is what I've sought to do in assembling my economic team," Obama said, as the four stood behind him.

In dispatching them to write a new plan for rescuing the economy, he signaled a willingness to be pragmatic, even about some of his own campaign promises.

Obama is likely to propose a stimulus plan with a price tag that will dwarf the $175 billion he proposed as a candidate. Though he refused to say Monday how much he'd propose, congressional Democrats say it could cost $500 billion to $700 billion.

He said that "we'll have to scour our federal budget line by line, and make meaningful cuts and sacrifices." He warned, however, that next year's federal budget deficit could be jarring, given his new proposals atop the extraordinary measures already approved, such as the $700 billion bailout of Wall Street.

"It's going to be costly," Obama said. "Even if we did nothing further for the remainder of this year ... we're going to see a substantial deficit next year, bigger than we've seen in a very long time."

Obama stressed that there's a rare consensus among conservative and liberal economists that a massive federal stimulus is necessary to revive the economy even if it swells the federal budget deficit temporarily.

He also said he was open to delaying his proposed tax increase on those who make more than $250,000 a year but that they eventually would have to do more to help pay the bills.

He said he'd wait to hear whether his economic team recommended repealing the Bush tax cuts next year for top earners or keeping them intact and letting them expire as scheduled at the end of 2010.

The president-elect also discussed aid to the ailing American auto industry. He said it was essential but that Washington couldn't simply write a "blank check" for the Big Three Detroit automakers.

He said Congress was correct in telling Detroit executives last week to draft a plan on how taxpayers' money would be used to retool their companies to make them competitive and efficient. He said he was "surprised that they did not have a better-thought-out proposal when they arrived in Congress."

Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, the Republican leader in the House of Representatives, urged Obama to craft an agenda that includes eliminating the capital gains tax, overhauling energy, stopping unnecessary lawsuits and cutting taxes.

That suggested areas of possible bipartisan negotiation and agreement, particularly on energy and tax reductions.

Obama: hope for Muslim America

Subhan Tariq

I was never as proud to be an American as I was on Nov. 4. The moment Barack Obama was declared the next president of the United States, I was standing among peers at the Choose or Lose Jamboree in the Student Union Ballroom. It was intoxicating to be there. Feeling the electricity of the moment, hundreds of people celebrating America's first black president felt as if they had all just won the lottery.

I saw people in tears. Not John McCain supporters agonizing over their loss, but men and women who witnessed and partook in the civil rights struggle of previous decades and who were now witnessing the culmination of it all.

But it's a struggle not yet over and Barack Hussein Obama himself is proof of that.

During one of McCain's town hall meetings in October, a woman voiced her concerns about an Obama presidency. "I can't trust Obama. I have read about him and he's an Arab," she said. To this John McCain replied, "No ma'am, he's a decent family man citizen that I just happen to have disagreements with on fundamental issues and that's what this campaign is all about."

Does this exchange sound absurd to you? Let's do a little exercise: replace the word 'Arab' with the word 'Jew', and reread the exchange. Replace 'an Arab' with the word 'black', and reread it again. Sounds a lot more absurd now, doesn't it?

This incident wasn't a mere anomaly of the presidential campaign, but one of many trying to defame Obama by "linking" him to his own Islamic roots – roots that he felt forced to deny again and again.

You may think that eight years of Republican rule has been bad for the average American, but for the Muslims in America – it has been downright oppressive.

Obama is a Christian, but there is no doubt that he hails from a Muslim family on his father's side, has lived in a Muslim country and has a Muslim name. And it is sad that in America – after so many civil rights struggles – a man has to deny his roots to get elected.

Some say that every race and religion has been discriminated against here in America and now it is simply the turn of the Muslims.

To that, I say: Isn't this the nation that is the "leader of the free world" where "all men are created equal" and where people have the right to "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness"? If these are the ideals that our nation was founded upon, then why is it that hundreds of years after the founding of America that 9 million Muslim Americans are being publicly villainized based on their religion?

Collin Powell discussed this in an interview with Tom Brokaw on Oct. 19, the day he endorsed Obama. "Is there something wrong with being a Muslim in this country? The answer's no, that's not America," he said. Powell, a Republican and former secretary of state to George W. Bush, blamed his own party for the discrimination, saying, "Yet, I have heard senior members of my own party drop the suggestion: 'He's a Muslim and he might be associated with terrorists.' This is not the way we should be doing it in America."

You may think that eight years of Republican rule has been bad for the average American, but for the Muslims in America – it has been downright oppressive.

The insinuation that we are all terrorists has lead to arrests without trial, harassment by law enforcement and silence in the media when Muslims are attacked verbally and physically. And it is the Republican Party, who fear that sympathy with American Muslims will decrease support for their wars against Muslims abroad, that have lead this abuse of the principles our nation was founded upon.

When I first became politically conscious right before the 2000 presidential election, I was leaning Republican. If I had the power to vote at the time, I would have cast it for Bush. As a social conservative and an economic liberal, Republicans seemed to share some of my ideals.

Bush even catered to Muslims during his run for the presidency, visiting mosques and promising to create a Palestinian state. To say he fell below the expectations of the American people would be an understatement. For American Muslims, who in 2000 voted as a bloc for Bush in Florida (enough to tip the state in his favor), his presidency has been a calamity – and that is an understatement, too.

Though he and his party have been wrestled from power, the struggle against the hate created during his reign must continue. On Tuesday, Nov. 18, a coalition of mostly non-Muslim students led a protest against Islamophobia and against all discrimination based on race or religion on the steps of the Student Union.

It was beautiful to see so many diverse groups get together to speak out in defense of the religion I practice and it reminded me that the struggle for civil rights is worth making.

Because alone, Muslims are a mere 3 percent of the population of this country, but united with other Americans who truly believe in the values enshrined in our Constitution, we become a force that can overcome all obstacles – the same force that ended segregation in 1968 and in 2008 elected Barack Hussein Obama, a black man with Muslim roots to the presidency of the United States of America.

An extra helping of history

Chris Amorosi

Today, my apartment-mates and I celebrated our fourth day of Early Thanksgiving.

Early Thanksgiving starts five days before normal Thanksgiving, symbolizing the so-called "Five Civilized Tribes" and their ruthlessly driven journey down the Trail of Tears to Oklahoma in the 1830s. The food represents the bountiful harvest grown on the natives' land once they were gone.

We ease our grief for past injustices by eating a lot of comfort food and going to sleep to escape the inexorable guilt. Because I major in history, I could handily answer all their questions regarding the origin of Thanksgiving and why they were eating the foods dripping down their chins.

The first Thanksgiving was held in Florida by Spaniards, but the Spanish have little to do with the United States. Therefore, the first real Thanksgiving was held in Plymouth in 1621 by the Pilgrims. The Pilgrims were a group of Calvinists, previously oppressed by the nations of Europe, who decided to apply what they learned about intolerance in the New World.

When the Pilgrims arrived in Massachusetts, they held a great feast to thank God for their great fortune. Not only had the Pilgrims survived their first winter, but they realized the entire continent was filled by people with no knowledge of gunpowder. In fact, Native Americans had not developed anything more intimidating than lacrosse. The Pilgrims decided to put on a fireworks display, but they were forced to wait until their supply ship returned with rockets on July 4.

Every food on the table carries its own story.

The mashed potatoes are a retelling of the old adage that "you can't make an omelet without breaking a few eggs." Early colonists, having an insufficient amount of tools for lumberjacking, were forced to form small hovels out of potatoes. But potatoes are round and nearly impossible to stack, exasperating the colonists so much that they pounded the potatoes with their fists in frustration.

Because I major in history, I could handily answer all their questions regarding the origin of Thanksgiving and why they were eating the foods dripping down their chins.

The settlers found the resulting paste to be a primitive yet delicious mortar for their huts and so they survived the winter. The colonists later discovered that their frustrations with the natives could be solved with a similar smashing action. The British were so impressed by the new method of keeping subject people in line that they imported potatoes into Ireland, but in their confusion the British promptly blighted the crop.

Corn was invented shortly before the infamous Salem witch trials in the 1600s. A witch had cursed the entire fall harvest in Massachusetts Bay in 1692 and Gov. Simon Bradstreet, fearing for the good of all his colonists, ordered that suspected witches and all the colony's foodstuffs be burned. Before Bradstreet could realize his plan, his successor, William Phips, arrived from Britain.

Phips benefited from a rigorous education and instead ordered that the witches and food be tested for buoyancy to see if they were inhabited by devils. Because both the food and witches floated, Phips ordered the mix be boiled alive.

The only food to survive the scalding water of righteousness was the corn, which was deemed holy enough for consumption.

The turkey takes its name from the country in Asia thanks to the staggeringly large ego of Christopher Columbus. Columbus, a particularly obstinate person, steadfastly refused to believe he discovered a new continent. His financiers, Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain, pressured him to admit his error but Columbus only responded with claims of greater absurdity. Columbus' desire to prove he indeed found Asia was so great he introduced some of his captives as Indians to the king and queen.

The royals remained skeptical when the "Indians" refused to work for a fourth of what Spaniards were paid. Columbus, desperate for funds, tried to pass off some captured birds as the Sultan of Turkey and his harem but the king and queen fired him on the spot. Columbus refused to recant until he was on his deathbed and presented with a Canada goose, proving undeniably that he had reached the Americas.

Pumpkin pies – the mainstay dessert of many Thanksgiving feasts – represents the genius business acumen of a sleepy village in New York. Derelict jack-o-lanterns moldering after Halloween is an eyesore for any other suburban town.

Now imagine the town is haunted by a pumpkin-hurling demon from the depths of history. Further imagine that the myth of the demon leads to many popular movie adaptations that require stunt pumpkins. From these three copious sources of raw material came a burgeoning pie industry filling the hollow town with wealth.

The origin of turkey stuffing isn't as lewd as one may imagine.

THE CHANGE IT NEEDS....

An ode to UMass' unrecognized

Greg Collins

Thank you.

Thank you to the unrecognized University of Massachusetts student for valuing family and friends.

For spending more time talking with your parents and siblings than shouting down people with whom you may disagree. For helping friends when they are sick, have to go to Health Services or need to be walked home at night. Thank you for giving up your time and energy to provide support for a friend when they've lost a loved one and for being there for your roommates when they just need someone to talk to.

To that student, I just wanted to say, "Thank you."

To that student, I just wanted to say, "Thank you."

Thank you to the unrecognized UMass-Amherst student for taking care of the little things. For holding doors open for people in the Student Union. For thanking the MBTA bus driver. For giving up your seat to an elderly person. For picking up that piece of trash near the campus pond. For removing your headphones when talking to people.

To that student, I just wanted to say, "Thank you."

Thank you to the unrecognized UMass-Amherst student for taking care of the important things. For assuming responsibility for your actions and not using the UMass' Student Legal Service Office to hide behind immoral behavior. For not making excuses for bad grades, class absences or late papers. For forgoing a night of partying to study for a test or prepare for a presentation. For being willing to say, "I was wrong."

Thank you to the unrecognized UMass student for recognizing a greater good.

Thank you to the unrecognized UMass-Amherst student for helping the poor. For teaching in inner city schools. For bringing clothing and food to the homeless in Springfield. For teaching English as a second language to UMass employees. For tutoring the children of low-income families in Holyoke. For going on Alternative Spring Break and helping rebuild hurricane-torn areas. For participating in food drives, raising money for needy families and treating the poor as people and not objects.

To that student, I just wanted to say, "Thank you."

Thank you to the unrecognized UMass-Amherst student for sacrificing your life to enter the military. For undergoing hell in training. For braving IEDS, RPGs and roadside bombs daily to help innocent Iraqis and Afghans. For being willing to experience life-and-death realities most of us can only imagine experiencing. For wearing your uniform proudly and selflessly. For defending America day after day, month after month and year and after year.

To that student, I just wanted to say, "Thank you."

Thank you to the unrecognized student for putting everything in perspective. For cracking a joke in "My Body, My Health." For going to McMurphy's on the weekend. For undermining your physique and ordering Wings at 3 a.m. For participating in the hot dog eating contest every spring at the Mullins Center.

To that student, I just wanted to say, "Thank you."

Thank you to the unrecognized UMass-Amherst student for defying the status quo. For having the courage to take a stand for something you believe in, regardless of whether it is popular on campus. For not being afraid to voice your opinions in class or in newspaper columns – regardless of how many names you are called. For studying a nontraditional major.

For having the guts to perform in front of tens of people at the Fine Arts Center. For representing UMass Athletics as a true student-athlete. For realizing that public approval is sometimes the wrong kind of approval.

To that student, I just wanted to say, "Thank you."

Thank you to the unrecognized UMass-Amherst student for recognizing a greater good. For practicing your faith. For your internal strength. For realizing you do not have all the answers.

To the UMass-Amherst student whose acts of selflessness, courage, dedication, bravery and integrity were not mentioned in this column – whose unrecognized efforts, day after day, year and after year – get overlooked.

As Thanksgiving approaches, I just wanted to say one thing:

Thank you.

Non-aesthetic construction nonsense

Ted Rogers

This may surprise some of my readers, but I went on a very important fact-finding mission recently. It may shock you, but under Whitmore, in a bomb shelter a half-mile below the surface, a meeting took place.

It was an important meeting taking place between members of the Deconstruction Institute Clearing KomiteeS.

It's a secretive thing. All members need to dress up like Darth Vader, lest their identities are revealed. The details are scary.

It started like this: The man at the head of the table said "All right, people. It has come to my attention that there is not enough construction going on at the UMass campus. What can we do to fix this?"

"Well," another man started, "How about we close off a big part of campus with fences, and then tear up all the asphalt in the area?"

"Will it take more than one semester to do?" The first speaker inquired.

"Definitely. I'm sure if we try hard enough, it can take at least two, if not three semesters."

"I'm not sure about this," said a woman. "How can we be sure that the students are thoroughly inconvenienced?"

"Easy. We fence off a part of campus that lies in the middle of a major walkway. That way, we can ensure that all students are at least 5minutes late for each class", a man across the table said.

"It's settled then!" The first Vader yelled. "We cordon off the Campus Center at dawn!" "Now we can feast," he continued, "Bring out the puppies!"

It was about that time that I ran out of the room, screaming.

OK, you can probably figure that I was making this up. But what gave it away? The fact that the members of the administration would probably like dressing up as the Emperor better? Maybe that puppies are too expensive for everyday meeting buffets? It probably wasn't the possibility that the UMass administration likes to make getting from point A to point B as difficult as possible, though.

The point that I'm trying to get across is this: It's damn near impossible to get from one end of campus to the other without running into problems.

Most of the administration and education buildings on the west side of campus look like an architect with a concrete fetish had a seizure.

It's not the design of the campus itself. It's the people trying to "improve" it.

Here's an example: From the start of the school year, the campus side of the Franklin Dining Commons has been seeing road work. They just finished. For the past two months, students wanting to walk from Central to the DC have had to deal with heavy equipment being moved, cops asking them to wait for trucks to go by and trying to avoid patches of cement. That's to say nothing of the 8 a.m. alarm clock that comes in the form of a jackhammer.

So what is to be shown for all this work? Not much. We have a road and we have sidewalks by Franklin again – but the key word is again. You can drive from Franklin Dining Commons to Worcester Dining Commons in a minute, if you decide you didn't eat enough the first time. For the record, it takes about the amount of time to walk there.

And of course, this kind of thing isn't rare. You can barely walk anywhere on campus without running into chain-link fence. I've either been visiting or attending UMass since 2005 and I can't remember a single time where there was no construction/destruction on campus.

The constant construction doesn't just make our campus hard to navigate. It makes it look trashy, too. An informal Internet list puts UMass as the second ugliest university in the United States. I really don't think many would disagree.

Most of the administration and education buildings on the west side of campus look like an architect with a concrete fetish had a seizure. The southeast side of campus is reaching its goal of 100 percent asphalt coverage. The campus pond is so filthy, biology teachers use it as an example of an "anoxic environment" – something so unhealthy even most bacteria wouldn't want to live in it.

And then there is the money issue. Because of the recession, we've needed to make huge cuts into our budget. And yet, there are at least a few new buildings being completed within the next year. To make up for this, you'd better believe our student fees are going to be raised.

I think that with all the fees we pay, we should have a choice where it goes. We should be able to make it clear that we want the administration to make the campus more pleasing to the eye – or at least make them stop actively trying to make it so ugly. There's been a change in politics and a change in weather recently.

Why not try for change at UMass, too?

Giving thanks and having fun

By Robin Roenker
McClatchy Newspapers

LEXINGTON, Ky. - They say necessity is the mother of invention, but Louie Stotz feels God's hand was there, too, that Thanksgiving day 31 years ago when he came up with the idea for The Thanksgiving Game.

Stotz was doing what he could to hold off dinner until his wife's parents arrived, but everyone was growing hungry and restless.

To pass the time, Stotz whipped out pencils and scraps of paper and declared, "We're going to play a game." He told all the players to write down what they were thankful for that year, and then afterward had them try to guess who wrote what. Players earned points for guessing correctly.

"I remember it like it was yesterday," said Stotz, a retired entrepreneur and airline sales agent. "You just don't start Thanksgiving without your mother-in-law."

The game was such a hit, it became a family Thanksgiving tradition.

Now the family has professionally developed the game and hopes to share it with the rest of America.

For its first year on the market, the game has met considerable success, earning rave reviews from merchandise buyers wherever it's been tested, said Stotz's son-in-law, Tim Lester, who left his job with Kentucky state government to become the game's full-time marketing director.

Retailing between $14.99 and $19.99, The Thanksgiving Game is available at 100 Kroger locations in Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois and Tennessee as well as all of the nearly 600 Cracker Barrel stores nationwide and at Amazon.com and many Christian bookstores across the country.

On Friday, a crew from The 700 Club filmed the Stotz family - Louie and his wife, Jo Ellen, and their children Maria and John and their families - at Louie and Jo Ellen's home in Lexington for a segment to air on the show on Thanksgiving Day.

The family thinks their game is the first and only Thanksgiving game on the market. They feel it epitomizes the call of Ephesians 5:20 in the Bible, which encourages the faithful to be "always giving thanks to God the Father for everything, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ," Lester said.

Although no data is in yet on sales figures for this year, Stotz said there are literally tens of thousands of games on the shelves this year available for purchase.

If each one is taken home and played by a family of three or more, it will "add up to millions of expressions of gratitude to God and others," he said. "That's a lot of thanksgiving. We are completely convinced that this is not our game, but God's. We give him all the credit for any success that it has."

Getting serious.

It was two years ago, at the close of the family's 2006 Thanksgiving dinner, that the family got serious about developing and marketing the game. Tim Lester, married to the Stotzes' daughter, Maria, stood up from the table and urged Stotz to "share the game with the world," Stotz said.

In 1992, the family had made an initial attempt to formalize the rules of the game and have it produced for the marketplace, but those plans never got off the ground and were shuffled aside while John pursued an MBA and Maria attended seminary for a career in music ministry.

The second time around, everything seems to have fallen into place.

Last October, with only seven prototypes of the game to their name, Lester earmarked one for the Cracker Barrel seasonal merchandise buyer in Lebanon, Tenn.

He was told that the company's buying for the Thanksgiving 2008 season had already been done, but he sent the game anyway - only to have it lost under some Christmas merchandise at the Cracker Barrel offices where it went unopened for months. When it was finally found, the buyer had her staff members play they game. They loved it so much, she replied to Lester immediately, informing him that Cracker Barrel would carry the game at all stores if he could have it ready by June 8.

It was a nearly unheard-of success for a game in its first year of production. "The signs are abundant that God has a purpose for it," said Stotz, an active member of Calvary Baptist Church and longtime youth volunteer there.

Stotz and his wife are donating a portion of the proceeds of the game's sales to both Mission Arlington, a ministry in Arlington, Texas, where youth of Calvary Baptist have often done mission work, and Mission Lexington, begun locally by Calvary Baptist and modeled after the larger Arlington ministry.

Even unexpected twists and turns in the development process have had a higher purpose, Stotz believes - for example, when the initial Wisconsin distributor suddenly bowed out of development, leading the family to search for another company in Chicago to develop the game.

And the downturn in the economy might actually bode well for the game, Lester said, as people reconnect with the simpler, more affordable pleasures of just spending time together. Families are looking for ways to spend less money on things with short-lived value, but are willing to spend on things with lasting value, he said.

The game "will create fond memories for years to come for everyone who plays it," Lester said. "It provides a forum or a format to open the door to discussions about what we're thankful for - so appropriate for Thanksgiving Day - a dialogue that might be unnatural or forced without the game."

'It never gets old'

Maria Lester, Stotz's daughter, knows the game must offer something worthwhile to have stayed fresh and fun for her own family for 30 years running.

"It never gets old," she said. "I want to play. I want to win every year."

Sometimes the entries are funny. During years when there were new babies, parents have listed that they were thankful for pacifiers or late-night TV to keep them company during feedings. Others are predictable. Louie's mother-in-law, Perryda Pike, always includes "a warm house" as one of her answers. Everyone always knows that one's hers.

When the game is over, usually after about 45 minutes to an hour when ten people play, the family awards a small prize, such as a Christmas ornament or next year's calendar or even the largest piece of pumpkin pie, to the winner.

For Jo Ellen, Louie's wife, the game represents an easy, fun way to include everyone - close family and guests alike - gathered together during the holiday.

Playing the game "gives you a chance to feel you've connected with everybody that's there. It's fun and it's meaningful," she said.

Jo Ellen has kept the Thanksgiving shared cards from every game the family has played for three decades, and she often pulls out entries from past Thanksgivings to reminisce about family members who have passed away.

"The game is so simple," said John Lester, Louie and Jo Ellen's son. "But people these days are so busy that they just don't stop and tell each other how much they appreciate each other. To me that's the reason we've played the game all these years. It gives you the opportunity to say thank you to the people who mean the most."

The Thanksgiving game, patented by a Kentucky family, is said to be reminiscent of a simpler time, and allows its players to appreciate what they are given.

First novel in 10 years brings history, violence, heartbreak

By Claude Peck
Star Tribune

MINNEAPOLIS - Wally Lamb's new novel, 450,000 copies of which have just arrived in bookstores, is big enough to threaten Thanksgiving and maybe even Christmas, as readers ignore turkey basting and tinsel tossing to turn the 723 wide-ranging, heavily plotted pages of "The Hour I First Believed."

Lamb writes big books. And popular ones. Oprah Winfrey famously pulled an all-night reading Lamb's first novel, "She's Come Undone," the painful, funny coming-of-age saga of Dolores Price. She later included its paperback version and Lamb's 960-page second novel, "I Know This Much Is True," in her Book Club, a bestowal that invariably sends the anointed novel on a rocket ride.

Both novels made it to the top of the New York Times bestseller list and were optioned as movies (never made).

Lamb's millions of fans have been on a starvation diet since 1998, when his second novel was published.

"It's not like I've been goofing off or anything," Lamb said with a laugh when asked about the long gestation of his new book, which he delivered to his publisher about four years past deadline. "The story takes as long as it takes. It comes to me very slowly."

I met Lamb, 58, in his hometown of Norwich, Conn., on a sunny fall day that was perfect for taking photos at the cornmaze owned by his brother-in-law, an element of the book's plot. We talked in a meeting room at Norwich Free Academy, where Lamb attended high school and taught English for 25 years.

His beard is salt-and-pepper. He is small-town casual, wearing jeans and a sweater. In the four hours we spent together, Lamb displayed none of the impatience or high-horsed-ness one could expect of someone who has sold as many books and made as much money as he has. And though there's a hint of sadness in his eyes, he was unfailingly gracious.

In a hallway busy with students, a security guard greeted him as "Mr. Lamb" and assured him that since taking his English class she has continued to write and hopes to produce a book one day. Like any good teacher, he offered her praise and encouragement.

"I always assume, when I finish a book, 'OK, now I must know how to write a novel,'" Lamb said. "But as it turns out, I only knew how to write that novel. This one I had a terrible time starting."

"I had to get over this best-seller stuff and go back to the reason why I started writing in the first place, which was to entertain and inform myself."

In the decade between novels, two and three, both of Lamb's parents died after long declines in health, and his wife, Christine, had three sons at home, including a special-needs boy they adopted at age 4 to remove him from a perilous family situation. And Lamb became very involved with a volunteer job running a writing workshop at York Correctional Institution, Connecticut's only maximum-security prison for women.

Despite a political dustup with the Connecticut attorney general, the subject of an eventual "60 Minutes" report, two anthologies of the women's works with introductions by Lamb, eventually were published.

The outside world was no less full of big events, from the Columbine High School shootings to the 9/11 terrorist attacks to the Iraq war and Hurricane Katrina, all of which ended up playing a role in "The Hour I First Believed."

Although there are dozens of characters in Lamb's new novel, it has at its center the spunky and disconnected Caelum Quirk and his wife, Maureen. Their marriage splinters over an infidelity. Seeking a new start, they move from Connecticut to Collegedale, Caelum, a teacher, and Maureen, a nurse, each get jobs at Columbine High School. When Caelum is away, Maureen witnesses the 1999 rampage of Eric Harris and Dylan Klebold that left 15 dead and many more injured.

Beset by post-traumatic stress disorder, Maureen sinks into depression and addiction, and the two move back to the Connecticut farm where Caelum grew up. But Maureen ends up in a women's prison, founded by

'Enter' here

Canadian-based Celtic fusion group delivers to NoHo fans

By Michelle Fredette
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — By 8:30 p.m. Saturday, a line had formed outside Northampton's Iron Horse Music Hall to see Enter The Haggis' 10 p.m. show.

Since advance tickets had sold out before the day of the concert, fans without seats braved frostbitten toes to earn a door ticket. Those who had tickets arrived early as well, hoping to snag a table with a good view.

As the 7 p.m. show ended and patrons left the theater, they joked with the frozen, waiting fans, saying, "It's too bad Craig broke his [bagpipes] and they had to cancel the 10 o'clock show."

Fans of Enter the Haggis (ETH) are extremely dedicated. Had the 10 p.m. show actually been cancelled, they probably would have stormed the Iron Horse and demanded a show anyway, with or without bagpipes.

Many wore ETH merchandise from past shows and a few fans even bought tickets to both the 7 and 10 p.m. shows.

Once inside, the dim orange glow of lights made the Iron Horse feel almost like a local Irish pub. The mood was appropriate for the Celtic-themed Canadian band ETH, blending well with the bagpipes, fiddle and tin whistles used. Some band members even came on stage with pints of beer in hand.

ETH kicked off the show with the edgy instrumental number "Lancaster Castle" and the four standing band members moved around the stage energetically, approaching one another for brief jam sessions.

With ETH's energy, some fans couldn't help but get up out of their seats and dance, a rarity for the Iron Horse.

The applause was so loud after the first song that it was impossible to hear member Brian Buchanan thanking the audience and announcing the following song.

It was as equally hard to hear the vocals when the band started playing again, starting into "Cynical" from its 2006 album "Soapbox Heroes." The bagpipes, electric guitar and bass drowned out much of what was sung. Fans didn't seem to care, however, as they knew all the lyrics already and sang along.

After playing a song to be released on ETH's next album, which is said to likely be out by St. Patrick's Day, the band switched gears and played a traditional Irish song with a heavy metal twist. While fiddle and heavy metal don't typically go together, ETH made the odd combination work in its performance and audience members were head-banging to the music.

The constant shifting of styles in ETH's show was mirrored by the continuous switching of instruments. Buchanan began on keyboard, then switched to guitar, then busted out the fiddle for the fourth song.

Member Craig Downie alternated between guitar, tin whistle, harmonica and his standard Highland bagpipes throughout, while Trevor Lewington stuck mostly to electric guitar, switching for acoustic every so often.

Only drummer James Campbell and bassist Mark Abraham stuck to the same instrument for the entire show.

Enter the Haggis played back-to-back shows at the Iron Horse Music Hall for its loyal local fanbase. The group's set elicited many dancing audience members, as well as head banging and cheering, which was a rowdy night for the usually relaxed club scene.

While such fluctuation often leads to a disjointed or choppy performance, Enter the Haggis' changeability worked completely. Each of the band's songs is made up of such a blend of different styles that at least one element in a song would translate into the next.

"Another Round," which began with a bit of a funk influence, moved seamlessly into a fiddle jam session, followed smoothly by a new song called "The Ghosts of Calico."

Similarly, the switching of instruments was done fluidly. With five band members, one could change instruments and tune up while the others started into the songs, as was done on some instrumental pieces and a song tentatively called "March of the Zombies."

Enter the Haggis remained uncertain about many of the names of its new songs, which added humor to the night. Buchanan joked that one of the potential titles for "March of the Zombies" was "Susan Sarandon Shops at Gap."

On another new song, Buchanan commented, "I think the tentative title is 'Broken Birds'" to which Downie responded, "... You wrote the song."

As the night went on, the band and audience became more and more energetic. ETH played some favorite songs like "Down With The Ship" and "Gasoline," which had audience members shouting out "One, two, three, four." ETH also experimented in other numbers. Campbell played the electric guitar with his drum sticks and Buchanan did a reel on his bass.

Everything culminated in the final song, as ETH encouraged everyone to get up out of their seats. The crowd acquiesced happily, clapping with the music, and Lewington stepped off the stage and onto a table in the middle of the audience.

Bagpipes and fiddle never seemed more hardcore than they did Saturday night at Enter the Haggis' dynamic performance.

Enter the Haggis drummer James Campbell impressed audience members last Saturday night by being one of only two members of the live-man group to use the same instrument all night.

West releases crooning album

By Ian Nelson
Collegian Staff

The new Kanye West album "808s and Heartbreak" officially dropped yesterday on Island Def Jam.

Last year's "Graduation" showcased West's ability to beef up his production styles with heavy synthesizer tones, prompting fans to anticipate more in the way of glorious tracks about good times and hope.

This is not the case for the high-profile new release. This may stem from West's confusing career pattern: one forgets he started as a producer, a big-time producer at that, prominently cutting tracks for the likes of Jay-Z.

Enamored by the prospect of fame, he went on to put out his own record, 2004's "College Dropout." While he does rap on this release, the best verbal parts of the record definitely come in the form of guest spots by Talib Kweli, Mos Def and the previously mentioned Jay-Z.

His rapper career trajectory has been at a down-slant ever since, with "Late Registration" (2005) dipping to feature some fairly unsatisfactory guest spots (Paul Wall, Adam Levine of Maroon 5, Brandy) slightly balanced out by some good ones (Nas, Lupe Fiasco).

"Graduation" saw West really blowing it verse-wise [all of "Drunk and Hot Girls," rhyming "shooting stars" with "shoes and cars" in "Flashing Lights"] with the utter end coming in the form of "808s and Heartbreak" ("How could you be so/Doctor Evil").

One may ask: If Kanye's not rapping, what reason is there to listen? One must delve back to when his producer proficiency was first recognized. Every single murmur on the new record sounds perfect, save the purposefully over-driven Roland TR-808 drum sounds (which, in a good way, resemble "Closer" by Nine Inch Nails).

This record has been compared to a sort of Thom Yorke-style "Eraser" offering, an eerily fitting description despite the general downcast tempo. The lowered rhythm has never been Kanye's strong point (exception: "Slow Jamz"), but its melodrama resembles a break-up record.

Imagine that: Hip hop's first break-up album. The tones are ice cold as West recites line after line about heartache, loneliness and the constant theme of the frozen nights [though he recorded the record in Hawaii]. He's rumored to be returning to rapper form for his next record, supposedly due out next summer, but for now the dead of winter hosts this release.

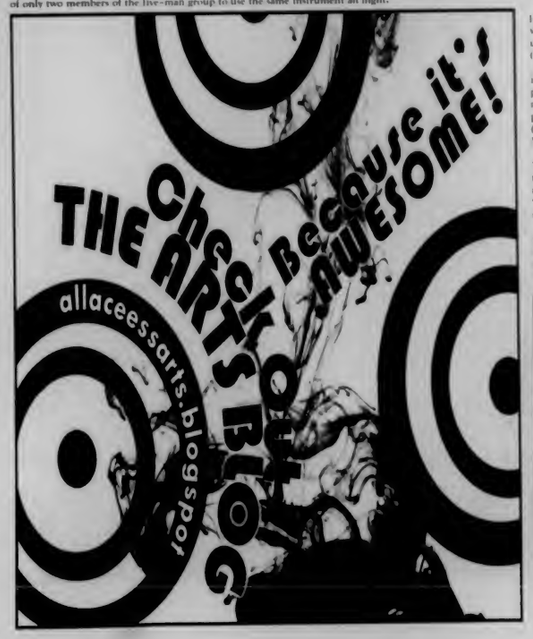
Song-wise, there are few losers. The final version of "Love Lockdown" (after many leaked versions and re-workings) is simply great, the drumming mimicking a beautifully synchronized African drum-line. "Heartless" does not disappoint either, released as a single earlier this month. Reggae keyboard lines compliment the omnipresent auto-tune perfectly.

The auto-tune is a point of contention for a lot of listeners for many reasons: the pitch correction makes everyone sound the same, whether they are a trained professional on top of their game or an amateur with the flu, it makes every vocal sound super-processed and inhuman; and like many fads which have come and gone, auto-tuning is a fad and nothing more. Why would Kanye conform?

First and foremost, almost any auto-tuned single will get tons of airplay, so it's money in the bank. Secondly, the omnipresent processed feel is supplemented by extra-terrestrial production on the entire album, synthesizers blipping and pulsing while West's digitally enhanced voice nearly makes him pass as a singer.

That's not even the meat of the record, however. "Robocop" is the most glorious track, with skittering percussion throughout in addition to huge drum sounds, orchestral flourishes and dainty xylophone tinkling.

The best tracks are "Paranoid" with Mr. Hudson and "See You In My Nightmares" with Lil' Wayne. "Paranoid" sounds like if James Pants produced a Jock Jams track for MTV, with the only warm synth tones on the entire record matched up with cheesy, dated percussion meant to bang in the club.



"See You In My Nightmares" hardly has the ability to fail with Weezy on the hook. It pulses and eases in until the climax where Mr. Carter gets vicious. "You think your s--- don't stink/Well you are Mrs. P.U." Well put, Wayne.

Most everything Kanye says on the record sounds terribly important and pressing, evidence of his apparent emotionally draining breakup. Listeners can only hope West gets over it and reclaims his position as one of the best party figures in popular music. Until then, we have a stark collection of moody, monochromatic tunes, radio-ready as far as they are desperate and introspective.

Kanye West recently released his album "808s and Heartbreak," which is comprised of many slower, more melodic tones than his previous rap CDs, and is still loved by his fans.

one of Caelum's ancestors). Caelum takes in two refugees from Katrina, and finds a teaching job where one of his students is a maimed and deeply troubled Iraq war veteran.

Caelum somewhat reluctantly dips into his family's ancestral history when it's presented to him in the form of a doctoral thesis by one of the boarders. He also discovers secrets and lies about his parentage.

The tragedies and trials faced by Caelum and Maureen are contemporary, even the nonfictional ones. (Lamb opted to use real names in writing about Columbine, for instance.) But in Lamb's mind, their story, like all narratives, reflects an ancient one.

When, at age 32, Lamb entered an MFA program at Vermont College, a professor, Gladys Swan, gave him advice that stuck with him. "She told me that I would never tell an original story," Lamb said. "The best you could do is tell your version of the archetypal stories."

This dovetailed with Lamb's existing interest in myth. His second novel was based on the Hindu tale "The King and the Corpse." The classical myth of Theseus and the minotaur is the spine of "The Hour I First Believed," which sets key scenes in a rural Connecticut corn maze that stands in for the famed underground one created by Daedalus in the ancient Greek story.

"When the Columbine news broke, I came to view Klebold and Harris as two-headed monsters," Lamb said. "I had dark days wrestling with this material. There was a monster at the middle of the maze."

Deciding to graft the actual event, including the names of the victims, into his fictional account, was tricky. But, Lamb said, "I felt that as a high school teacher for 25 years I could put myself in those corridors and empathize."

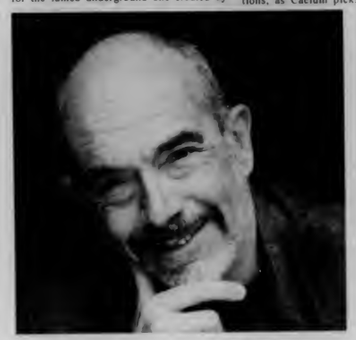
The whorl of American violence is seen not just in Lamb's Columbine chapters and stories of Caelum's father's penchant for drunken bar brawls, but also in a gory account of his great-great-great-grandmother Elizabeth Popper's work as a nurse in Washington during the Civil War.

"It is a dark novel, but we live in dark times, and I think that is a measure of its honesty," said Terry Karten of HarperCollins, who edited the book.

Karten (who also edits Doris Lessing, Barbara Kingsolver, Francine Prose and Louise Erdrich) said she was "astonished by the ambitious reach of the novel and by the kind of commentary it provided on the role of war and violence in American history."

Lamb, who said he is "not that much of a history buff," wrote the Popper history all at once, and then a German editor suggested it might be best to leave it out. Instead, he chopped it up and included it in shorter sections, as Caelum picks up and puts down the manuscript. "The Hour" also dips into history via letters, news stories and flashbacks.

Lamb seems to be arguing that history, whether of a nation or an individual, matters.



Then there is the topic, somewhat unfashionable in contemporary literature, of belief. Readers who expect a novel with this title to be centered on religion will be disappointed at how little there is about church and faith.

"I'm certainly not talking about organized religion," Lamb said. "It's more about how Caelum holds out the possibility for hope," even amid the considerable chaos and heartbreak of his life and marriage. "What exactly did he believe?"

Raised in a big Italian Catholic family, Lamb said that while he still goes to church occasionally, he considers himself "a questioning Catholic, more attuned to the social-justice aspects of the church.

"I'm being purposely ambiguous," Lamb added with his trademark modest smile. "All I'm saying at the end is that God may only be in the forward propulsion of life, in the invisible pull of our ancestors, who may be affecting our lives in ways we may never know."

Lamb's nervy goal in a novel that sprawled more than he intended is to suggest something broader about individuals, and something narrower about the sweep of time.

Author Wally Lamb's newest publication, "The Hour I First Believed," comes 10 years after his second novel, titled "I Know This Much Is True," and 16 years after his first piece, "She's Come Undone."

NKOTB more mature in vocals, ballads

By Kevin C. Johnson
St. Louis Post-Dispatch

The New Kids are back on the Block. The popular '80s group has a new CD - naturally titled "The Block" - and is touring.

And if the guys have anything to do with it, they'll keep it going.

"If everyone stays happy - meaning us, meaning the fans, meaning the record label - then we'll keep going," singer Jordan Knight said from a tour stop in Minneapolis.

"We do all have five different lives and paths and stuff like that. But if God is willing and it keeps working, we'll keep doing it."

The group also still includes Donnie Wahlberg, Jonathan Knight, Danny Wood and Joey McIntyre.

Fans probably recall NKOTB hits "Step By Step," "Hangin' Tough," "You Got It (The Right Stuff)" and "I'll Be Loving You (Forever)."

"The tour has been very successful," Jordan Knight says. "A lot of people are telling us that coming to our show made them feel young again and that it takes them away from the hum-drum of everyday."

The concert is "good, old-fashioned entertainment," he says, not something where the band will "pull out a few tricks from the past to get cheap applause."

All the group's big hits are here, though often given a contemporary sheen to avoid sounding dated. But the spirit of the song remains.

"We want people to still get that good feeling when they hear the hits," Knight says.

The show also features cuts from "The Block." The CD features guest turns by the Pussycat Dolls, Akon, Teddy Riley and Ne-Yo. The group likes the old school-meets-new school vibe Ne-Yo brings to "Single."

An unexpected name on the disc is new singer Lady Gaga, a left-of-center choice for a group this mainstream. She's featured on "Big Girl Now."

"The song called for a female singer, and she was in the studio," Knight says. "So we thought, 'Why doesn't she just do it?' She blew us away."

Most surprisingly, the CD features a collaboration with fellow boy band New Edition. Both bands hail from Boston and started out under the thumb of Maurice Starr. He first pulled together New Edition, and after they left over money, he formed New Kids on the Block.

Knight doesn't admit to the competition many assumed was naturally there.

"We would never say, 'We're coming after you and we're gonna blow you away.' We couldn't blow them away on stage or in a recording, and we're smart enough to know that," Knight says.

He says New Kids looked up to New Edition the same way Backstreet Boys and 'N Sync cite New Kids on the Block as influences.

Still, "it took us this many years for both of us to be mellow enough to say, 'we can get on the same record and celebrate what we did in the past,' Knight says. "It was our tribute to them to put them on the record."

Former Strokes drummer brings 'Joy' with new CD

By Len Right
McClatchy Newspapers

One of the oldest jokes in rock 'n' roll goes like this:

"What's the last thing a band wants to hear the drummer say?

"'Hey guys, why don't we try one of my songs?'"

Well, at least one drummer may have the last laugh. On Nov. 4, Fabrizio Moretti, stickman for indie-rock hipsters The Strokes, released a CD he recorded with his girlfriend, singer-guitarist Binki Shapiro, and singer-guitarist-keyboardist Rodrigo Amarante of Rio de Janeiro indie-rockers Los Hermanos. It's called "Little Joy," which also happens to be the band name chosen by Moretti, Shapiro and Amarante, and its lilting pleasures are as plentiful and charming as they are unexpected.

"Making this record was learning how to be humble again," says Moretti from Los Angeles after finishing a breakfast of bacon, eggs and toast. "It was therapeutic for me and for Binki and Rodrigo.

"Rodrigo was going through tough times with his band and I was on hiatus with my band, not knowing what was coming next. And I had all these lost love kind of feelings. ... If I hadn't made this record I would be sucking my thumb in a corner. It turned out to be a big catharsis for all of us."

"Little Joy," named for an Echo Park lounge in Los Angeles where the band members lived and recorded, shares little of The Strokes' trademark swagger or snarl. But its unpretentious pop songs are chilled with urban cool and served with a chaser of loungey Brazilian tropicalia.

"We tried writing about love from every kind of perspective," says Moretti, who plays guitar, piano, bass and melodica on "Little Joy." "We weren't trying to revolutionize anything, just trying to sing about what we were feeling. ... Some (songs) were born of real heartbreak and some from a new kind of hope, a new discovery of love."

One instance of the former is the disc's most Strokes-like track, "Keep Me in Mind," about a crestfallen guy who's told by his ex that "some day you'll learn to be someone better fit to pursue me." "That was in a letter I got a while ago telling me I was no longer someone's boyfriend," says Moretti, who had a high-profile five-year relationship with actress Drew Barrymore end in January 2007 and has dated "Spider-Man" star Kirsten Dunst.

Similarly, the reggae-tinted pop song "Shoulder to Shoulder," while dreamily romantic on the surface, has a sharp edge. "It's about the inevitability of lost love," says Moretti, "and how we repeat the mistakes of our parents. ... Two people, no matter how close, cannot be one person, ever."

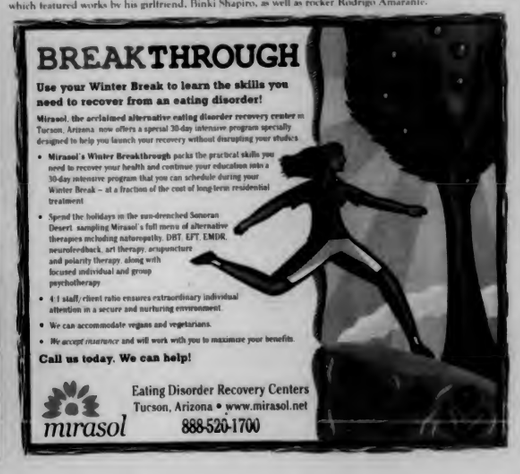
On the other end of the spectrum are the warm and bubbly "Next Time Around" and the breezy, sunshiny "Brand New Start." "When I fell in love with Binki I had to express that," says Moretti.

Because virtually all of The Strokes' material is written by singer Julian Casablancas, Moretti had a stockpile of tunes. And though several of them ended up on "Little Joy," "none of them had their identity until all three of us had our hands in it," Moretti points out. "That's representative of how we work as a band."

He cites the rootsy track "Don't Watch Me Dancing" as a prime example. "The verse was Rodrigo's, the chorus was mine, and Binki turned it into something different when she started singing the song."

Rio-born, New York City-bred Moretti, whose brother in Brazil would send him tapes of Amarante's music, finally met the Los Hermanos frontman when the Strokes played at the same festival in Lisbon, Portugal. When Amarante came to work in Los Angeles with Devendra Banhart on his 2007 album "Smokey," they renewed the acquaintance and started making music. Then Binki was brought on board.

Before the Strokes reconvene in February "to throw ideas around", the band has been inactive since releasing its third studio album, "First Impressions of Earth," in 2006. Moretti, Shapiro and Amarante, along with a drummer and bassist, have hit the road in support of "Little Joy." Their 17-date tour began Nov. 7 in St. Paul, Minn.



Asked how Little Joy's relatively delicate music will be received in grungy clubs, Moretti replies with a laugh. "I've got my fingers crossed. We've got the (Portland, Ore.-based) Dead Trees opening up for us, and they're a rock 'n' roll band, so that should help.

"I really wanted a magician to open for us," he adds. "That would prepare people for our slower music."

The Strokes' drummer Fabrizio Moretti recently released an album independent of the indie-rock group, which featured works by his girlfriend, Binki Shapiro, as well as rocker Rodrigo Amarante.

UMass falls in home-opener

are going to play with heart and passion," Gaffney said. "From the jump no one played with that urgency."

The Minutemen quickly lost a 5-0 lead to start the game, eventually falling behind 20-13 after an 11-0 run by the Gamecocks. After falling behind again 29-23 with 5:13 left in the first half, UMass needed an 11-2 run to take the lead, 34-31 entering the half.

JSU came out on an 18-7 run to start the second half, extending their lead to six with 12:35 remaining. The Gamecocks led by as many as seven before UMass 13-0 run to take a six-point lead with 1:46 to go.

Gaffney was tied with Lowe with a game-high 20 points. The senior forward recorded his second double-double in the last two games as he also recorded 13 rebounds and eight blocks in 39 minutes.

Harris had a poor shooting night going 3-for-8 and 1-for-3 from behind the 3-point line. The junior put up nine points and three rebounds in 34 minutes. Harris also struggled from the free-throw line, hitting only 2-of-5. UMass was a combined 8-of-14 from the charity stripe on the night.

Tyrell Lynch played well in the limited minutes he had as he filled in for an injure Luke Bonner. The true freshman had six point, six rebounds, a block and a steal in the 20 minutes he saw on the court.

As for the Gamecocks, they were led by Toles who was 3-for-3 from 3-point range as he scored 18 points, grabbed six rebounds and had five assists.

The loss was UMass' new coach Derek Kellogg's first regular season game at the Mullins Center since taking over the Minutemen.

"It was almost the perfect storm of everything that could go wrong in a short period of time. From missed free throws to missed assignments to putting a 3-point shooter on the [free-throw] line," UMass coach Derek Kellogg said after the game. "I'll probably watch that last minute and a half 50 times over the next couple of days to see if there is anything we can do as a coaching staff."

Wiggins suspended

Kellogg and Athletic Director John McCutcheon announced Monday that junior transfer Doug Wiggins was suspended indefinitely.

The UConn transfer was involved in an off campus incident. Kellogg said after the game that Wiggins, who is in his redshirt season after transferring, is suspended from practices. But when Kellogg was asked if there was a possibility for Wiggins to return, Kellogg there was.

"Yes, but we're going to find out everything that was involved and then go from there."

Game notes

The Mullins Center was more than half full (4,821) for Kellogg's first regular season game at home as UMass' head coach ... JSU's bench contributed with 30 points while UMass got eight points from its bench.

Lack of height hampers Minutemen

By Eli Rosenswaike
Collegian Staff

Matt Glass and Tyrell Lynch are too old at this point to grow any taller.

But they're also too young to be relied upon to solve all the problems of the undersized and undermanned Massachusetts men's basketball team.

With the way Tony Gaffney keeps playing, they may not have to. But his heroics on both ends of the floor fell one-point short Monday night in a 75-74 home opening loss to Jacksonville State at the Mullins Center.

"Right now Tony is the only one playing with leadership," senior point guard Chris Lowe said after the game. "Just because I had [20] points that doesn't mean anything. I'm not providing as much leadership as I should, and if I don't do that the team is not going to be successful. Everything is really falling on me."

With 7-footer Luke Bonner and reserve forward Matt Hill out with injuries, it also falls on the underclassmen to step up their performances. But even with a fully healthy roster, rebounding and toughness inside was a major question mark this season.

Gaffney takes care of a lot of that by himself, but even though he played all but 1 minute Monday night in a strong all-around performance, he can't shore up the center and forward positions at the same time.

That leaves sophomore Matt Glass (6-foot-6) and freshmen Tyrell Lynch (6-foot-9) and Travon Wilcher (6-foot-7) in charge of keeping opposing offenses out of the paint and off the glass.

And no one could do that against JSU's Jonathan Toles on a drive to the hoop with 9 seconds remaining for the game-winning layup.

"I'm trying like heck," said UMass coach Derek Kellogg, referring to trying to get his team to play harder and with more fire. "My whole speech before, after and during the game is to play intense basketball for 40 minutes."

Kellogg admits that it's tough to rely on young players such as Glass, Lynch and Wilcher down-low at this stage of their careers, but he really doesn't have much of a choice right now.

"We played some strange, strange lineups tonight and that's who we have on our roster," Kellogg said. "And so I'm just going to try to play guys who are going to help us win and guys that will make plays defensively."

Gaffney made plays all night and in every possible way – scoring 20 points, grabbing 13 rebounds and blocking eight shots in a near triple-double. Lynch was solid early on, grabbing five rebounds and scoring six points on easy baskets in the paint. But he made no impact in the second half, registering a single rebound in 6 minutes.

With guards Chris Lowe, Ricky Harris and Anthony Gurley constantly on the floor – often all at the same time – that leaves three non-rebounders and interior defenders on the court. That enabled the Gamecocks to score 32 points in the paint, capped by the final basket of the game by Toles.

Kellogg talked after the game about how hard it is for his team to play with the intensity required on defense for the Minutemen to be successful.

"The second your guy catches the ball, you're on him. And you're covering a guy for all 35 seconds of the shot clock and then you run up the court and attack on defense, only to sprint back on defense," Kellogg said.

"And you never stop," he added. "Working that way is a hard thing to get across. It's hard to do when you really only have nine, 10 guys. Maybe I'm asking too much, but I don't think I am."

Kellogg is concerned that his team isn't taking enough pride on defense and is focusing too much on their offense.

"The thing I want to get our guys away from is not get excited when you make shots, let's get excited when you make a stop on defense," he said. "I think the floor is a little tilted right now where they run a little faster one way and not so fast the other day and we're trying to change that everyday."

They'll have to in order to compete in a deep Atlantic 10 this season.

Eli Rosenswaike can be reached at emwerow@dailycollegian.com

Senior Tony Gaffney had 20 points and 13 rebounds in the Minutemen's 75–74 loss to Jacksonville State in their home-opener last night.

Power play struggles

Wessbecker continues to stay in the lineup because UMass' defense doesn't have the depth its offense has at this point. But, the lack of depth doesn't show. The Minutemen have allowed three or more goals in four of their 11 games – two of those games UMass came out the winner.

Special teams slump

The Minutemen's penalty kill was, and still is, one of the best in the nation. For the six games before UMass' 2-0 loss to UMass Lowell on Nov. 15 the Minutemen were 29-for-29 on 5-on-4 situations. Since then, UMass has allowed three goals while its opponent was on the power play – one against the River Hawks and both of the Eagles goals last Friday were scored while being down a player.

UMass' penalty kill remains one of the best in the nation, going 46-for-51, having a 90.2 percent success rate.

The Minutemen's power play, on the other hand, has been struggling since the second period of the Minutemen's 5-1 win over the Friars (Nov. 1). Since then, they have gone 0-for-19 on the man advantage.

"Our power play is a real concern right now. We're not making good decisions in terms of when to move it," Cahoon said after Friday's game against BC. "We're not making good decisions as when to shoot it. We're not keeping shapes that we try to create that unbalances in alignment. We're a little bit off, and we've got to address that, too."

Although the Minutemen have been struggling creating offense on the man advantage Saturday, UMass' power-play unit of Wellman, Lecomte and Hobbs at forward with Nolet and Bevis playing the points moved the puck around using precise passes to create openings between the Eagles defense. Two seconds after the power play ended, Nolet wristed a shot from the high slot to put the Minutemen up 3-2 going into the second period.

Nolet's goal can be credited to the successful play of UMass' power-play unit just seconds before.

In the crease

The Minutemen have been splitting time between two netminders this season – sophomore Paul Dainton and junior Dan Meyers. Dainton was absent from the crease at the start of the season because he was recovering from an injury, but upon his return midway through the Oct. 31 game against Providence he took the ice and played in every game until last Friday against BC.

Meyers was taken out of the Oct. 31 game midway through the second period after letting in four goals on 12 shots by the Friars. Meyers started last Friday against BC, allowing two goals, but he made 36 saves – the most since his 40 saves against North Dakota.

"Danny was great, and he's been great for most of the year except for that one period against Providence where he had a little struggle. He's been great every time we put him in there," Cahoon said after the loss to BC. "He's played against some of the best teams in the country, so I think Dan has done everything we asked him to do and he's going to continue to get better.

"I like our goaltending on that front; we've got two guys who give us good efforts and have a good mentality that will come up big at the end of the year," Cahoon continued.

Having two capable netminders will benefit the Minutemen throughout the season, and it has shown against Providence. If one goaltender is having a rough game it is important that there is someone just as proficient to replace them and that is something the Minutemen don't have to worry about this season.

Injury update

Freshman winger David Boehm hasn't played since UMass' 3-2 win over then-No. 5 North Dakota on Oct. 11 due to a lower leg injury. He was seen walking around without the aid of a walking boot that he had been wearing for more than a month, but will remain out of the lineup for an undisclosed amount of time.

Sophomore Chase Langeraap wasn't in the lineup in the Minutemen's game on Saturday because Cahoon wanted to give him time to fully recover after having surgery at the end of the 2007-08 season.

it best after the game.

"[The fight] was just us coming together as a team," he said. "BC was pushing really hard, we just pushed right back. Once we got everything settled in the third [period], we were able to come together, and dig down deep to get the two points in front of 8,300 [people]."

The night earlier, however, the Minutemen really had no reason not take at least a point from the Eagles. Neither team executed like they normally do. The only time BC executed better than the Minutemen was on its two goals – both of which came on the power play, the second on a 5-on-3.

It wasn't too long ago that UMass couldn't compete with teams like Boston College. Now that they can, and consistent success within Hockey East is a realistic expectation, dooming themselves with stick fouls late in one-goal games is the last thing they need to do.

It's not that UMass' penalty kill isn't good enough to diffuse the situations – it killed 29 consecutive penalties between its win over Rensselaer on Oct. 21 through the third period of the loss to UMass Lowell. The problem is more in the other locker room, goals are at such a premium in Hockey East that you can't allow your opponent too many chances and expect to win.

The parity in the league is helping the Minutemen for now. Teams go up and down from week to week, but sooner or later two or three teams will separate themselves and lock up home ice. That fourth spot is too hotly contested to allow points to slip away because of a factor as controllable as discipline.

A win against No. 13 Vermont tonight at the Mullins Center would tie UMass with BC in second place heading into its month-long break from conference play. And as the Minutemen demonstrated last weekend, if they stay out of their own way, they can beat anyone.

UM hosts Vermont in annual match up

Spillane, Madore split time for Catamounts

BY RYAN FLEMING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Coming off its third win against a top five opponent already this season, the No. 17 Massachusetts hockey team faces off tonight against Hockey East rival No. 13 Vermont.

The Minutemen will face the Catamounts at the height of their early season. Vermont swept then-No. 2 Boston University in its two-game series last weekend, outscoring the Terriers 8-6. By twice defeating the Terriers at home, Vermont has done something no team has done in 16 years.

The Minutemen (6-4-1, 4-3-1 Hockey East) host Vermont coming off a 4-3 overtime victory over the former No. 4 Boston College. But as important as that win became Saturday night, the Minutemen know how crucial it is to put last weekend behind them.

"We have Vermont [coming up]; they're going to be just as tough, if not tougher than BC," said senior Alex Berry.

The Catamounts (7-3-2, 4-3-1 Hockey East) have scored at least three goals in a game seven times this season and have yet to be held to fewer than two.

With depth at the forward position Vermont will prove difficult to stop offensively. Two players have scored more than 10 points and three are tied with nine.

Peter Lenes leads the Catamounts with 16 points, tallying four goals and 12 assists. The senior is coming off a three-point weekend in Boston, he registered a goal and two assists in Friday's win.

Vermont travels to the Mullins Center with some foreign talent as well. Viktor Stalberg, a native of Gothenburg, Sweden, is second on the Catamounts, with 11 points. The Toronto Maple Leafs draft pick provides his team with great speed, entering the offensive zone quickly. Stalberg leads Vermont with 41 shots and three power play goals.

Justin Milo (six goals, three assists), Brian Roloff (four goals, five assists) and Dean Strong (nine assists) are tied for third on the Catamounts, with nine points each.

Like many of the teams in the Hockey East, Vermont plays with a two-goaltender system. Mike Spillane has gotten most of the starts in net. Spillane boasts a .896 save percentage but a 2.93 goals against average to go with a 4-2-1 record.

Spillane shares time with freshman Rob Madore. Madore has shown promise early in the season for Vermont. The freshman has earned a .911 save percentage and a 2.76 goals against average. Despite playing two fewer games than Spillane, Madore has better overall numbers and a better record (3-1-1).

Special teams can often decide a game, and Vermont boasts one of the conference's best power plays at 21 percent. A huge factor on the Vermont power play is the play of Lenes, Stalberg and Milo. The three forwards account for eight of Vermont's 14 power-play goals. Its penalty kill, however, has struggled at 78 percent.

Freshman Casey Wellman scored the game-winning goal against Boston College with less than a minute remaining in overtime Saturday. The Minutemen host No. 13 Vermont tonight at the Mullins Center.

Senior Chris Davis has four goals and one assist for UMass this season. Saturday Davis was paired with Cory Quirk and T.J. Syner.

Change in lines sparks offense

Dainton, Meyers strong in net to help in team's success

BY MELISSA TURTINEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After a strong start to the season, the Massachusetts hockey team's offense hit a bump in the road and was shutout for the first time this season – in consecutive games (UMass-Lowell on Nov. 15 and Boston College on Nov. 21).

UMass Hockey

Before the two-game slump, UMass' top line of senior Cory Quirk, senior Alex Berry and sophomore James Marcou were unstoppable. The trio had been the only line to play together for the entire season, and it led the Minutemen in points, earning 33 of the team's 81 (over 40 percent of the team's total points) before last weekend.

UMass coach Don Cahoon decided to change things up and he jumbled the lines before taking on BC last Saturday – and it worked. The Minutemen defeated the defending national champions, 4-3, in overtime.

UMass' previous top line (Quirk, Berry and Marcou) were all moved from the top spot. Berry and Marcou were centered by freshman Casey Wellman, while Quirk centered freshman T.J. Syner and senior Chris Davis. UMass coach Don Cahoon has rotated a number of other players through the other lines, trying to find consistent combinations.

The top line became sophomore Michael Lecomte centering freshman Danny Hobbs and junior Will Ortiz. The remaining line saw ice time from sophomore Shawn Saunders and senior Scott Crowder at wing with senior Jordon Virtue at center.

The line changes were successful right from the start, with a goal from Marcou 1 minute, 18 seconds into the first period. The line of Wellman, Berry and Marcou earned six points in Saturday's match up. Wellman tallied the game-winning goal and two assists. Marcou scored two goals and Berry assisted on Wellman's game-winning goal.

DEFENSIVE STRENGTH

While the Minutemen's offense was changed around before Saturday's game, the defensive pairings stayed the same, and for good reason.

Thepairing of seniors Topher Bevis and John Wessbecker led the team in plus/minus. Bevis is plus-10 while Wessbecker is plus-12.

Chris Davis passes the puck to James Marcou who carried it in to score his second goal of the game Saturday in the 4-3 win over BC.

In the eight games Wessbecker has played he has been on the ice for only two goals scored by opponents. Wessbecker is the team's most defensively gifted defensemen, playing an integral role on the Minutemen's penalty-killing unit.

The absence of Wessbecker for more than half of the 2007-08 season led to the Minutemen's struggle late that season. After returning to the lineup on Oct. 21 in UMass' 6-0 win over Rensselaer he hasn't left the lineup.

Juniors Justin Braun and Martin Nolet see the most ice time of all the defenders. They standout as members of both the power play and the penalty kill as well as playing a key role in the offensive zone.

Braun and Nolet's amount of ice time gives Wessbecker the chance to rest because he is still recovering from injuries he sustained last season that required surgery.

Penalties causing losses for UMass

Joe Meloni

There was a time when Massachusetts hockey teams coach by Don Cahoon were the least penalized teams in Hockey East. Those teams weren't particularly good, though.

Since the 2006-07 season, when the Minutemen started to matter outside of Amherst, the discipline that kept UMass respectable when it wasn't as talented has become an inconsistency.

In Friday night's loss to then-No. 4 Boston College, the Minutemen committed six penalties in the third period; four of which came when they trailed by a single goal. Against UMass Lowell, nine days ago, the Minutemen found themselves in the same situation and cost themselves the game thanks to equally undisciplined play.

Saturday's dramatic win over BC may cloud the problem for the time being, but it's still there. It's impossible to score a goal when you're standing in your own zone watching two point men play catch at the blue line.

It's especially problematic for the Minutemen because, save for Brett Watson, their most talented offensive players are also their best penalty killers. Cahoon has experimented with different players on the penalty kill, but there's no denying that three of his four primary options in 5-on-4 situations, Cory Quirk, Alex Berry and Chris Davis, are also three of his most reliable scorers.

Cahoon pointed out after the loss that the Minutemen were among the least penalized teams in the nation; if not for the 40 minutes from Saturday night's fight, they'd be the least penalized team in the conference.

The problem, however, isn't the amount of penalties, it's the timing of the infractions. Down 1-0 to one of the most offensively gifted teams in nation midway through the third period, a slashing minor is inexcusable and completely avoidable. Davis' holding minor 29 seconds later didn't help things either. BC's Paul Carey scored 1 minute, 33 seconds after Davis' minor, locking the game up for the Eagles.

"It wasn't malicious discipline. It was someone getting their hands up on someone's back, or someone reaching in, or guys just not bearing down mentally to stay out of those situations," Cahoon said after the loss. "It's something we have to address, and it's something that will keep you from winning games; clearly we've got to make a change on that front."

The fight that developed midway through the second period on Saturday may seem like part of the same problem, but Berry put

Minutemen take first at BU

BY HOLLY J. GALVIN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts men's swimming and diving team traveled another early step forward in its quest to retain the title of Atlantic 10 Champions, placing first at last weekend's Boston University Invitational.

Not to be outdone, the Minutewomen had a strong showing as well, as senior captain Christa Narus highlighted the season's most anticipated meet to date by setting two new school records.

Though she set two new top times, Narus out-clocked only one UMass alumna. The other record she blasted was her own with a 1 minute, 51.77 second 200 free finish beating her old time of 1:51.95.

Former teammate and 2007 Minutewomen captain Liz Lovejoy's former 200-free record time of 57.02 will have to take a backseat, as Narus ousted it for a 56.69 finish that helped propel the Minutewomen to a third-place overall finish in an elite field of nine area programs.

For their own part, the ever-dominant Minutemen came out on top at a Competition Pool meeting showcasing some of the region's best – Northeastern, Boston College, New Hampshire, Central Connecticut State, Yale, Maine and Holy Cross were represented.

While freshman Joey Sbordon continued his early season dominance, it was often overshadowed by sophomore Max Butler, who quickly became an earner of for UMass. Butler won the 200 back with a time of 1:50.95, while helping to secure 400-free relay successes.

The youth movement was also visible on the women's team. Freshman Chelsea Downing was the top long distance performer for the Minutewomen, clocking in fourth place in the 1650 freestyle and earning a key individual tally of 15 points.

In the men's 1650, the seemingly unstoppable rookie performances of Sbordon continued. In a season where Sbordon had won all but one individual event heading into Saturday's action at Boston's Competition Pool, the Franklin native did not disappoint, winning the 1650 handily with a first-place time of 15:56.62.

Another top race for Sbordon included a top-10 finish in the 100 free, which added to the eventual total of 1,079 overall UMass points on the weekend.

The win caps the third-straight BU Invitational victory for UMass coach Russ Yarworth's Minutemen, who look to remain on track to win an unprecedented 11th conference championship in February's similarly structured meet.

Senior captains Nate Bromage and Narus proved their mettle throughout the weekend. Narus led a second-place 800 relay squad, while Bromage rocked Sunday's late competition with an individual win in the 200 fly and top-10 finishes in the 100 freestyle and 400 freestyle medley relay. Swimming the critical final leg of the relay, Bromage secured a third-place finish.

Senior captain Nate Bromage won the induvidual 200 butterfly Sunday. UMass' placed first in the Boston University Invitational.

Consistent Minutewomen veteran Kat Chalikis and sophomore standout Elizabeth Walsh grinded out a top-10 point victories for the Minutewomen. Along with multiple top-10 relay contributions from Chalikis, Walsh chipped in with a fifth-place 200 backstroke time of 1:01.51.

Teaming up and finishing back to back in the 100-yard free, Walsh and Chalikis boosted a Minutewomen squad that faces swimmers from Northeastern when they host the Huskies in Amherst after Thanksgiving.

Next week marks the competitive return of the Minutemen, who have scheduled the annual Maroon and White intrasquad scrimmage for Dec. 6.

Economy falls, applicants rise

BY KATE DEVANE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

In recent years, the number of high school seniors applying to colleges, especially at private colleges has rapidly increased.

With the United States' precarious financial situation, however, admissions officers have been questioning how long this trend will last. Many of them have said they simply don't know what to expect in terms of applicants this year.

Early Decision applications, which offer students early notification of an admissions decision in exchange for a promise to attend the school if accepted, were expected to see the greatest drop in applications, according to InsideHigherEd.com.

"I assumed ED [early decision] numbers would drop," said Jess H. Lord, dean of admissions and financial aid at Haverford College to InsideHigherEd. "[It was] absolutely my assumption that ED would be hit hard by the economy — that applying ED would be seen as a luxury and folks would hold off."

The opposite turned out to be the case. Early Decision applications poured into a number of private colleges this month, said InsideHigherEd.com.

Early Action applications, similar to Early Decision but non-binding, are also becoming increasingly popular.

Factors which may be causing this include budget cuts at state schools, promises of financial aid and a focus by schools on those students most likely to attend.

On the other hand, as cost becomes an increasing concern for families, students may choose to apply to several schools in hopes of receiving an attractive financial aid package from one of them.

Meaning, unlike Early Decision applicants, many regular applicants are shopping around.

In the Five College area, home to both the University of Massachusetts as well as four private colleges, admissions patterns have reflected similar trends.

At UMass, the number of applications has seen a 49 percent increase over the past eight years, from about 19,500 in 2000 to nearly 29,000 in for this year's freshman class, according to the University's admissions Web site.

The increasing number of applicants has allowed UMass to be more selective in admissions, admitting only 64 percent of all applicants in 2008.

UMass does not offer Early Decision, but there is a relatively new Early Action program. It was implemented in 2006 and 3,030 students opted to apply early. This number jumped to 4,797 in 2007 and 6,230 in 2008.

"As you may know, this is the fifth consecutive year that applications to UMass Amherst have increased, with nearly 29,000 high school students applying for admittance to the Class of 2012," said Chancellor Robert C. Holub in a letter to members of the UMass Alumni Association. "Three years ago, the campus began offering an Early Action admission program. This year, Early Action applications increased 30 percent, indicating that we are increasingly the first school of choice for many of these students."

"While the growing popularity of UMass Amherst is terrific, I am also struck by the upward academic trajectory of each entering class," he added.

At Mount Holyoke College, the number of freshman applicants increased 20 percent between 2000 and 2008, according to the college's admissions website. Of these students, 55 percent were accepted in 2000 compared to 53 percent in 2008.

In 2000, 8 percent of their total applicants chose to apply Early Decision, and of those students 74 percent were accepted. This past year, Early Decision applications also made up 8 percent of the total, but only 52 percent of them were actually accepted.

At Amherst College, between 2000 and 2008 total applications rose by nearly 45 percent, according to their admissions webpage. Nineteen percent were accepted in 2000, while the acceptance rate this past fall dropped to 15 percent.

Over the past eight years, Early Decision applications increased by 22 percent at Amherst College, while the acceptance rate declined from around 38 percent in 2000 to around 34 percent this past year.

UM professor honored

Professor Jean Willet recipient of President's service award

BY MATT ROCHELEAU
COLLEGIAN STAFF

University of Massachusetts professor and chair of the department of teacher education and curriculum studies, Jerri Willett, was recently honored as one of six recipients of the 2008 President's Public Service Awards.

At a luncheon in Boston on Nov. 19, University President Jack M. Wilson announced the winners, including Willett, who was recognized for her leadership in Access through Critical Content and English Language Acquisition Alliance, a collaboration that supports and improves the education of second language learners in Springfield, Holyoke and Amherst school districts.

"The program provides professional development for teachers, as well asschool district administrators, UMass faculty and future teacher educators," according to a statement from the President's office. "Professor Willett spends countless hours in the local schools, working with teachers in Holyoke and Springfield."

The service awards are presented each year to faculty members from the Amherst, Boston, Dartmouth, Lowell and Worcester campuses, who have been nominated by the chancellors in each of their respective campuses for "providing exemplary service to the Commonwealth," according to a statement.

The other recipients of the award include: Taylor Stoehr, professor of literature in the College of Liberal Arts at UMass Boston; Susan Krumholz, director of crime and justice Studies in the College of Liberal Arts at UMass Dartmouth; Regina Panasuk, professor of curriculum and instruction in the Graduate School of Education at UMass Lowell; Deborah Harmon Hines, professor of cell biology at UMass Medical School; and Jean King, professor of psychiatry in the department of neuroscience at UMass Medical School.

"Though the scholarly pursuits of these six professors vary greatly, they have one thing in common: they are committed to exemplary public service both in their professions and in their communities," said UMass President Jack M. Wilson at the ceremony.

"Their accomplishments shed light on the significant contributions of all of the faculty members at the University of Massachusetts who undertake public service part of the mission of a public research university."

"Through these awards, the University adds its own acknowledgement of their contributions to the honors that they receive from national and international organizations," he added.

This year's honorees join the 59 other faculty members who have been recognized since the awards were established in 1997.

"This year's award winners and their colleagues are poignant examples of what the University of Massachusetts is all about: academic excellence and service. These awards illustrate the importance of attracting and retaining top faculty members, even in tough economic times," said UMass Board of Trustees chairman Robert J. Manning.

"The University of Massachusetts is unwavering in its commitment to providing students with a world-class education without the outstanding work and dedication of our faculty members this commitment would not be possible," added Manning.

In the last seven years at ACCLAA, 65 teachers have earned graduate degrees while involved with the program. Almost 5,000 teachers and students have been affected by the program.

University of Massachusetts President Jack Wilson, stands with professor Jean Willet and Chancellor Robert Holub. Willet is a winner of the 2008 President's Public Service Award for the UMass system.

In late rally, UMass falls short

Senior forward Chris Davis fights for the puck Friday night with St. Lawrence's Alex Curran. Curran scored his first goal of the season in the opening period, helping the Saints hold on for the 4-3 win despite a late comeback attempt from the Minutemen.

Pulitzer poet to visit Smith

Pulitzer Prize-winning poet Mark Strand will visit Smith College [illegible] at 7:30 p.m. in Sabin-Reed 106.

Strand is a former United States Poet Laureate to the Library of Congress in Washington, D.C. A poet known for his quiet but accomplished style, Strand has also served as visiting professor at Yale University.

His poems are known for their clarity and deeply inward sense of language, and he has been described as existential, playful and mysterious—a poet of simple words and sentences that culminate in powerful universal experiences.

Strand has been the recipient of many distinguished honors, including a fellowship from the MacArthur Foundation in 1987, a Guggenheim fellowship in 1975 and the Edgar Allan Poe Award from the Academy of American Poets in 1974, for "The Story of Our Lives."

He and is a former chancellor of The Academy of American Poets and teaches English and comparative literature at Columbia University.

The reading will be followed by a book sale and signing. The reading is free and open to the public.

Mumbai attacks inflame old tensions

By Saeed Shah
McClatchy Newspapers

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan — India on Friday charged that militants with links to Pakistan were involved in the terrorist attack on major tourist sites in Mumbai, in which more than 160 civilians died. Pakistan denied the allegations but agreed to send an intelligence official to discuss them.

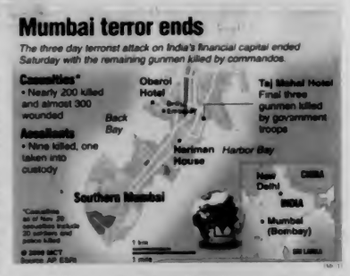
The rapidly rising tensions could scuttle a tentative peace process between the two nuclear-armed countries and even lead to a military confrontation, and some experts said they thought this might have been the aim of the terror operation.

"Preliminary reports point toward Karachi," Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh told his Pakistani counterpart, Yousaf Raza Gilani, Gilani's office said in a statement.

"Preliminary evidence indicates elements with links to Pakistan are involved," said India's foreign minister, Pranab Mukherjee. He added, however, "Proof cannot be disclosed at this time."

Gilani accepted Singh's request to send the head of the Inter-Services Intelligence, Pakistan's premier spy agency, Lt. Gen. Ahmed Shujaa Pasha, "for exchange of information." Later, Pakistan decided to dispatch a more junior ISI official instead, news reports said.

"When we're not involved, and we have nothing to hide, we should not fear about this," Gilani said at a news conference, defending the move.



Indian naval officials said the militants came by boat from the Pakistani port of Karachi, while the home (interior) minister, Jaiprakash Jaiswal said a captured gunman had been identified as a Pakistani. Vilasrao Deshmukh, the head of the provincial government, said two British-born Pakistanis were among gunmen arrested by Indian authorities.

A U.S. counterterrorism official said preliminary information indicated the terrorists may be from the Kashmiri separatist group Lashkar-e-Taiba, or Army of the Righteous, the armed wing of an extreme Pakistan-based Sunni Muslim missionary organization blamed for numerous attacks in India. The group has close links with Pakistan's intelligence services.

He said the group is known for staging highly coordinated attacks by skilled fighters who are prepared to die. He also noted, however, that there are differences between the group's previous attacks and the assault on Mumbai, which singled out foreign nationals. The official asked for anonymity because he wasn't authorized to discuss the issue openly.

Mumbai terror ends

The three day terrorist attack on India's financial capital ended Saturday with the remaining gunmen killed by commandos.

The terrorist attacks on Mumbai, India, began on Nov. 26, and culminated in over 200 casualties and nearly 300 wounded.

Here comes Christmas

Paul Payer

As the sun rose Friday morning, upon masses of tents and sleeping bags inhabited by weary-eyed shoppers outside the nation's Wal-Marts and BestBuys, it signaled the beginning of the holiday shopping season and thus the official commencement of all things Christmas.

At about 6 a.m. Friday morning, I arose from a turkey-induced coma to the sounds of my mother and sister prodding me to join them in their excursion to the Holyoke Mall in pursuit of recession-enhanced holiday deals. With a fear of being trampled to death by frenzied shoppers, I politely shut the door in their tired faces and coupon-stuffed jackets to continue my traditional, post-thanksgiving snooze marathon.

My mom and sister weren't too lonely though, as preliminary data from industry analysts indicated that nearly 172 million shoppers visited retail stores and websites on black Friday, generating $10.6 billion in sales. Those sales figures represent a three percent increase from last year, a far lower increase than in recent years, but still a positive sign for retailers fearing dismal holiday sales.

It is no secret that the Christmas season seems to begin a few days earlier each year. Retailers and the entertainment industry realize that the sooner people begin thinking about Christmas, the sooner they begin thinking about Christmas presents and holiday movies.

Television executives begin scheduling Christmas programming in November and holiday jingles infiltrate radio airwaves even before the first sight of cranberry sauce and homemade stuffing.

In Ireland, the city streets of Dublin were illuminated with Christmas lights three weeks earlier than usual this year, in a bid by the city's mayor to induce holiday spending in a weakened economy.

Given the correlation between the extension of the holiday season and increases in retail sales, it seems this formula has worked.

Is this even necessarily a bad thing? A lot of people enjoy watching Christmas movies and listing to holiday music. Perhaps this sense of holiday is a positive thing, even if their enjoyment creates the ulterior motive to head in droves to shopping malls.

Is this even necessarily a bad thing? A lot of people enjoy watching Christmas movies and listing to holiday music.

Unfortunately, more often than not, the simple joys of the holidays have become overshadowed by the pervasive reach of holiday stress. The combination of mall traffic, widening waste lines and credit card statements often creates the perfect recipe to wipe out any good feeling generated by the 43th viewing of "Elf."

Studies indicate that compared to the rest of the year adults experience the highest level of stress during the holiday season. Overcome with the need to prepare for family gatherings and satisfy demands listed in their children's wish lists, adults often find themselves unable to balance their daily lives of work and routine with the holiday season.

The key to avoiding all this and enjoying the holiday season without nearing a mental breakdown depends upon an understanding of balance and perspective.

Even holiday shopping can actually be an enjoyable experience. Finding the perfect present for a family member or significant other can make for a great holiday memory, but waiting two hours in line outside Macy's in 23 degree weather at 5:30 a.m. on a Friday morning can only lead to holiday disaster.

Christmas decorations, music and movies can be viewed as conspirators in materialism and commercialism or they can be taken at face value, reminders and expressions of the holiday season.

To truly believe that Rudolf and Nat King Cole are simply cogs of the capitalist machine would be a somewhat cynical perspective of the holiday. Nevertheless, allowing those holiday traditions to detract from enjoying the season and motivate further causes for stress is a negative thing. Perhaps this year's holiday decorations need not include the outdoor light display which took three days to set up last year.

If anything, the stated purpose of Christmas should be seen as a rebuke against consumerism and stress. The intended purpose of the season aims to bring families together and instill a sense of selflessness and goodwill in individuals.

In today's society, that description of Christmas is written off as a cliché and wishful thinking. People justify this pessimism through what they see as the inevitable level of materialism and consumerism prevalent in American society. Although that observation has clear merit, it should not discourage people from enjoying the holiday season.

Perhaps radio stations playing Christmas music all day and city streets adorned with wreaths and holiday lights do indeed spur holiday spending. That may be true, but why should that prohibit anybody for simply enjoying them because they are signs that the Christmas season is upon us.

Endorsing the UMass brand

Nicholas O'Malley

If you're at all like me, Thanksgiving weekend involves taking in as much football as you do turkey.

But after my hometown was annihilated in its annual Turkey Day football event, 54-0, it seemed as though I was going to have to wait for the Patriots on Sunday to see a decent game.

Luckily, I got an offer to go to the Boston College game against Maryland that weekend. It turned out that my sister had gotten some tickets from a guy at work, who knows a guy that went to high school with this kid, whose brother has a friend who has season tickets.

I, as an Eagles fan for most of my life, accepted. And before you start grabbing sharp objects, my grandfather was a professor there long before I'd ever heard of Amherst.

Regardless of loyalties, I decided to make the game interesting by skipping right past any BC or generic Boston sports apparel I had access to and went straight for a UMass jacket. My second choice was the jersey of San Diego Chargers linebacker and former Maryland standout Shawne Merriman.

Despite my sister's claims that I would be heckled for it, I wore the jacket, indifferent to the fans that had more than enough time to get plastered for the 3:30 p.m. kickoff.

However, dressed as I was, I received nary a jeer, taunt, heckle or chide. Maybe it had to do with the opposing fans at hand, as the Maryland fans were telling the BC faithful to "go back to their mansions."

But in reality, the lack of response for UMass apparel at the BC event had to do with the fact that no one really cared.

Keep in mind that this is the same Boston College that has its teams booed at the Mullins Center when they happen to be leading in their respective games. UMass fans have been trying to pick a fight with BC fans for years.

But it's a one-sided hatred.

The Boston College athletic program is one of the most recognized in the country and is simply too busy with the likes of Notre Dame, Florida State and Virginia Tech to be dealing with UMass.

While the Minutemen have been able to compete with those very same schools in basketball and hockey, our school still lacks that national presence.

It's that presence, though, which the school has been so desperately clamoring for.

Since the recent changes in the school's administration, UMass has been focusing almost exclusively on improving its academic standing. The voices from Whitmore are almost unanimous in their preaching of "research, research, research," all in an effort to get the top students with the top faculty and the top campus.

In the middle of this effort to glamorize the school is the fact that we need to recruit the best students we can. But right now, the majority of the students coming in are Massachusetts residents. While this state does have a large pool of talented students, the key to UMass' success may lie in recruiting out-of-state students.

Highlights on Sportscenter can raise awareness of a school ... more than a cheesy "You were. You are. UMass" commercial.

Right now, though, the school's presence outside of state lines is quite weak. One way to raise awareness of the school would be to flaunt a top-flight athletic program that would at least put UMass on the map.

Casual knowledge of schools leads most students coming out of high school to look at Syracuse University before Yeshiva University. Both schools are based in New York, yet Yeshiva is ranked higher on the U.S. News and World Report college rankings.

Highlights on Sportscenter can raise awareness of a school just as much, if not more, than a cheesy "You were. You are. UMass," commercial.

But the school isn't at that point yet.

Just look at any ESPN catalogue or commercial for college sports apparel. You'll see Duke, Notre Dame, Texas and Miami among the headlining schools. You might even catch some Eagles apparel. But rarely, if ever, will you find Sam the Minuteman's likeness.

Inversely, that very same front page apparel is just as commonplace at UMass as the maroon and white. It's not unusual to see Texas Longhorns hats in Amherst.

The school has made enormous strides in the past to improve its national standing.

The men's basketball team has made multiple appearances on ESPN. There was speculation for years that the football team was going to move to division 1-A. The men's hockey team as emerged as one of the best programs in the country.

Despite all of this, the Minuteman is rarely spotted outside of the Bay State as the Eagle tends to hog most of the spotlight in terms of college sports in Massachusetts.

A school's athletic program is either loved or loathed. Sports fans love it for obvious reasons while opponents scoff at coaches whose contracts dwarf those of the faculty.

But if UMass is going to become the upper echelon school that it has always wanted to be, it may have to get some help from ESPN.

Legal prostitution, for safety's sake

Hannah Nelson

In the name of killing the sanctity of marriage, let's throw enemy number two – prostitution – in the ring. There is no such thing as the sanctity of marriage and there never really has been. It's an ideology created to vilify anyone who doesn't fit into the mold of traditional family values. As such, new impending legal action will make it harder for UK prostitutes to maintain their existing, protective actions. It is already a criminal offense to run a brothel or agency for profit, and soon it will be even harder for the 80,000 prostitutes in the UK.

Nearly three years ago, the UK was discussing the legalization of small brothels, but now there's been a complete one-eighty. The old proposal had included the idea of creating safe houses for women who could opt to transition out of prostitution and to receive help for substance addictions rather than face fines.

The new criminalization proposals advocated by Minister for Women Harriet Harman and Home Secretary Jacqui Smith would mean fines and carrying a police record if convicted of selling sex. Only individuals working on their own would be exempt, an option considered the most unsafe way to go about it. Anyone found guilty of paying for consensual sex would be liable for rape charges, and if committed could mean a life sentence in prison.

After a survey in the UK, the popular opinion is that new criminalization will not get rid of prostitution and showed a consensus that many citizens would rather see legalization.

According to "Belle de Jour," the pen name of a high class London call girl who is also a frank blogger and author, it's always better for prostitutes to go through a third party like an agency because it provides a buffer between them and the client.

Belle's story isn't the norm next to most stories that come from the profession, she came from a stable family life, never suffered abuse, wasn't a drug addict and chose her lifestyle freely. While hers is a rarer case than the norm, it goes to show that protecting this lifestyle protects the women who have entered into the profession through less desirable circumstances.

Like it or not, prostitution is a business and efforts to make it harder for the business to exist will only create harsher conditions for the women who work in it.

Prostitution will continue to exist ... trying to sweep it under the rug will not solve anything or protect anyone.

In Nevada, where the only legal United States brothels exist, there are reports of human rights abuses where the lines between rape and consensual transactions blurred. This is not the form of legal prostitution I'm advocating, but it is evidence to what actions are necessary in order to fix what broken laws do exist and institute laws where they don't exist.

Some who advocate abolishment claim that there is no safe and legal way to go about this, but I believe it is possible. It starts with admitting that prostitution will continue to exist and that trying to sweep it under the rug will not solve anything or protect anyone.

About 4,000 U.K. prostitutes are trafficking victims, though the number is estimated to be larger. In 2003 New Zealand joined the likes of Amsterdam when decriminalization action was taken, and the action has helped uncover trafficking rings. Prostitutes now feel as though they have greater rights, and freedom of choice in choosing clients and how they wish to operate.

According to Belle on the UK's latest scheme "The initial idea is to 'name and shame' curb crawlers, and to impose harsh sentences on men who use the services of trafficked women. As opposed to the more logical route of, say, imposing harsh sentences on those doing the trafficking, which would be difficult but worthwhile."

Generation Y has been put through the old song and dance about safe sex by this point in our lives more times than we can count.

As college students, we see the signs every day for Plan B, sexually transmitted disease and free condoms in our dorms. We are the best educated generation to date on sexual health, so it's only natural for us to be among the first willing to realize and recognize the necessity of safe working conditions for prostitution through appropriate legal measures.

In order to be in favor of legalized prostitution it is automatically assumed that as a female, you are a backward-thinking, anti-feminist and as a male, you're a womanizer.

Prostitution certainly isn't going anywhere, so why try to make it harder for the individuals who lead this lifestyle, whether it is by choice or circumstance?

Feminism is all about choice, the rights for women to choose how to live their own lives and make their own bodily decisions.

If a woman chooses to pursue a career in medicine, she can, pending she has the right socioeconomic background to pay for it. If a woman is a prostitute, let's face it, chances are she comes from the lower half of the spectrum, and that is exactly why it is important to ensure choice in both entering and/or leaving the profession legally.

Education, beginning with the good book

Eric Magazu

Thanksgiving has come and gone, and thus it would appear an auspicious time to examine the meaning behind this holiday. We are often taught the familiar story of the Pilgrims arriving in America and deciding to hold a feast with the Native Americans. This is an overly simplistic view of things, and the deficit of education on the subject has led most Americans to regard Thanksgiving as simply an enhanced version of the many three-day, weekend holidays that we have scattered throughout the year.

The reality is that Thanksgiving was set aside by the early settlers as a time to give thanks and praise to Almighty God for all the blessings and goodness he has bestowed on us. It is important to use this time of year, and to be honest, all times throughout the year, to remember that God is good to us even while we are deficient in our service to Him.

Realizing that we are not even taught these most basic truths about American history, it is urgent that we assess the state of public education.

First, we must examine what education is supposed to teach us, and second, how we can best constitute the structure of education to serve this end.

In our day, we adhere to a materialistic view of education as a method of maximizing income potential. We define virtue as social and economic success, and we define morality as the ability to make a lot of money and be influential among the elite.

Greek philosophers in the mold of Aristotle would have argued that moral virtue is the ultimate end of all education. Our American forefathers believed that the knowledge of God is the purpose of all education. This understanding is enshrined in enactments such as Massachusetts General School Law of 1647. Our ancestors believed education started with the ability of men to read and understand the Bible for themselves.

The foundation of education ... is rooted in the fear, awe and reverence of God.

We can begin to examine the true purpose of education by turning directly to the Bible, in which the 10th verse of the 111th Psalm teaches us, "reishis chochma yiras Hashem," which along with the next few words translates roughly as: "The beginning of wisdom is the fear of the Lord; good understanding to all who perform them; his praise endures forever."

Understanding the foundation of education to be that which is rooted in the fear, awe and reverence of God, we are able to turn a critical eye to the structure of public education. To start, we already know that there is a severe deficit in knowledge of the Scriptures, which will result in many readers disagreeing even with my initial premise.

This thinking comes not from an educated opinion on the Bible itself, but from the current fashions that exist throughout Western Civilization. We have placed our trust in the intellectual prowess of man, instead of rightly placing our trust in God alone. This has led us down the destructive path of abandoning the notion of universal right and wrong, and turned us away from the proper standard of good and evil.

The reason we have gone down this road is to due to major systemic problems in how education is structured in America. We have allowed politicians at the state and federal level to remove the right to educate children from where it properly belongs, which is with parents and local communities.

The problem with having the power to educate rest with these higher levels of government is that those setting our educational curricula are detached from the students they serve. We should not then be surprised to see a much lower standard of care, along with a lack of understanding of the values that parents want to see instilled in their children. Parents possess the natural right to educate their children in a way that befits the morals they seek to pass on to the next generation.

We must insist that federal and state government return the ability to set the standards, as well as the funding of education to local cities and towns. By insisting on this strictly constitutional approach to government, we return power to parents to have more direct control over the direction of the education of their children.

I am confident that this being done, we will gradually see a return to the teaching of right conduct, as well as the right understanding of God, in America's public schools. This correction of the fundamental purpose of education will lead to a remarkable boost in the rigorousness in the teaching of all subjects. Once we begin to make this course correction, it will take time to begin to see these changes concretely manifest – but they will occur much sooner than we can imagine.

This will happen quickly because when we follow His laws, God will be quick to reward us in the manner of the words of Massachusetts governor John Winthrop. "We shall see much more of His wisdom, power, goodness and truth, than formerly we have been acquainted with."

And more importantly, "We shall find that the God of Israel is among us."

How to be civil in extreme situations

Forni's new book, "The Civility Solution: What To do When People Are Rude," explores how people should be civil with one another.

BY VALERIE FINHOLM
THE HARTFORD COURANT

Was your idiot brother-in-law off on another political rant at Thanksgiving?

Did "sweet" grandmother comment on your weight as she handed you a piece of pumpkin pie?

And, finally, did someone steal your parking space at the mall?

It seems everyone might need some mannerly advice. So we talked to P.M. Forni, author of "The Civility Solution: What to Do When People Are Rude." The Johns Hopkins University professor of Italian literature is also the author of "Choosing Civility" and founder of the Civility Initiative.

Question: The holidays seem to be rife with rudeness. How come?

Answer: Because we are stressed. We have expectations of the season that very often don't pan out. This year at family unions there may be the added stress agent of economy, and the elections.

Q: How do you respond to rude people, especially if they're family members?

A: The key is to prepare for a situation. Prepare your response. If your uncle says, "Here we have our resident liberal whose candidate won the election," your response might be "I wonder how you determined how I voted. I don't remember disclosing that with you." Be assertive – otherwise they will repeat that behavior – but not aggressive. Handle it with as much detachment as possible.

Q: Do rude people know they're rude?

A: About 75 percent to 85 percent of Americans think that Americans are rude. But when you ask one American, "Do you think you're rude?" in 99 cases they will say, "No. I'm not rude." Very rarely do we see ourselves as part of the problem.

Q: You write that when rudeness can't be prevented, civility is your best choice. That's hard, especially if someone just given you a vulgar gesture. How do you keep from responding in kind?

A: Whenever you are at the wheel, expect the infamous finger may appear at some point. Picture the scene in your mind: There you are, calm and collected, even after the slight. Anticipating and visualizing make you feel in control and prepare you to deal at your best with the real thing.

Q: I was in a store recently where there was a sale on jewelry. A customer was hovering over the sale box at the counter, and when I tried to look into it, she swatted me away with her hand. I was stunned. What could I have said?

A: "Ma'am, if I inadvertently got too close, you could have told me instead of pushing me back." That is being assertive, not aggressive.

Q: And what should I say to the guy that steals my parking space?

A: "I had been waiting for that spot with my turn signal on for quite some time. I would appreciate it if you let me have it." If the driver responds dismissively or aggressively, just say, "I am sorry, you are not choosing to do the right thing. I just hope you think about it so the next time you will," and walk away.

Q: Are parents culpable for failing to teach children manners?

A: As a society, we have been very successful over the last two generations in instilling self-esteem in our children. We have not been as successful in instilling self-restraint.

Q: It's so hard not to respond to rude people rudely.

A: If you believe in civility, you don't respond to rudeness with rudeness. Accept that it has happened just like you accept that it's Monday, and it's raining. It's part of life.

Byrne's diversity showcased

Former Talking Heads front-man to play Calvin

BY IAN NELSON
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Few musicians can simply be described as sonic visionaries, constantly pushing boundaries while achieving consistent critical acclaim and never losing their social relevance.

David Byrne is one of those musicians.

Byrne will appear with an assembled band in Northampton at the Calvin Theatre Tuesday night, one stop on his "Songs of David Byrne and Brian Eno" world tour in support of his new record, "Everything that Happens Will Happen Today."

The new record sees Byrne collaborating with fellow musical genius Brian Eno, with whom Byrne has produced records since the second album of his former band, the Talking Heads. The 1978 album, "More Songs About Buildings and Food," combines a seemingly endless array of influences from funk to reggae to pop, all within an envelope conscious of world music.

The acceptance of varied cultures into Byrne's sound has been a trademark of sorts, never sticking to a pattern or expectation. His Talking Heads output was curt and concise, never spilling over into verbosity. This may be due a lot to Eno at the helm, a master of sound and arrangement since his early-70s work with Roxy Music.

Eno has worked with an impressive cast of characters, most notably Byrne, David Bowie, Robert Fripp of King Crimson and John Cale of the Velvet Underground. His first work with Roxy Music took on a glam-rock sound which spilled over into some of his solo work until his descent into ambient music.

Eno was the ambient pioneer, crafting music that exists as little more than atmospheric sound. His first record of this ilk, 1978's "Ambient 1: Music for Airports," defined "ambient music" and exists as an exercise in synthesizer tonality and sustainability, self-described by Eno as mimicking a wall-painting with sound. The piece was originally created as a sound installation to sooth the anxiety that is often paired with time spent at an airport, and was first installed at LaGuardia Airport in New York City.

Eno continued on with Byrne in the late 70's and into the early 80's, producing the Talking Heads' next two landmark records "Fear of Music" (1979) and "Remain in Light" (1980). His influence on the three Talking Heads records from 1978-1980 makes for their best three records, similar to Bowie's "Berlin Trilogy" of "Low," "Heroes" and "Lodger," where Eno did not produce, but performed on the three records and heavily influenced Bowie.

In 1981, Eno's ambient world collided with Byrne's world music infatuation, cultivating their renowned album "My Life in the Bush of Ghosts" (re-released in 2006). Multi-layered drums recall African rhythm patterns, while synthesizer squeals and eccentric samples rise high over funky bass grooves.

The record provided a breakthrough in the art of sampling, even though the record was produced before digital sequencing, all the sound was recorded in analog. This made for a whirlwind of trial-and-error sampling, working to good effect most of the time while other times creating odd accidents which worked in the artists' favor.

After his string of albums with Byrne, Eno went off working with various other collaborators, continually producing solo records and works with other artists like U2, including their albums "Achtung Baby" (1991) and "How to Dismantle an Atomic Bomb" (2004). Most recently Eno produced the new Coldplay record "Viva La Vida or Death and All His Friends."

Since the Talking Heads disbanded in 1991, Byrne has released multiple solo records, scores and soundtracks, furthering his career as a sonic and visual artist.

Before the end of the 80's, Byrne began his own record label, Luaka Bop. The label specializes in recognizing sounds from around the world, releasing albums from Brazilian Tropicalia legends Os Mutantes as well as Byrne's solo records.

David Byrne will play in Northampton this Tuesday night in support of his new album "Everything that Happens Will Happen Today."

In 1996, Byrne's first gallery exhibit opened at nearby Mass MoCA titled "Desire." This work was a collection of altered ad campaigns redirecting stimulating sentiments of consumption to pure stimulus, negating the original message while preserving the aesthetic technique of the advertisement.

This year Byrne took over New York City's Battery Maritime Building for his work "Playing the Building." In this piece, Byrne fashioned every imaginable aspect of the building (pipes, vents, anything) into a musical instrument, connecting the percussive element to a pipe organ in order to derive sound.

Byrne has also participated in various lectures, spreading his knowledge of the music business and its modern applications to the masses, including a recent talk at the Future of Music Policy Summit. He is a proponent of music not being restricted to a buy-sell arrangement, a model which "includes rather than sues its own customers."

He also likens music to the divisive concept of fashion.

"For music fans it tells them and their friends who they are, what they feel passionate about and to some extent what makes life fun and interesting," he said.

David Byrne will perform Songs of David Byrne and Brian Eno Tuesday night, Dec. 2 at the Calvin Theatre located at 19 King Street in Northampton.

Vital signs of faltering economy: the death of the mall

BY HANK STUEVER
THE WASHINGTON POST

Shopocalypse now!

We're living at what may be the beginning of the end of mallworld as we know it: Certain Circuit City locations are marked for death here and there, and certain Ann Taylor Lofts are not responding to the corporate chemo. Across the land, it's beebie-jeebie vibes in the homogenous habitat Bennigan's, Sharper Image, Bombay Co., Linens 'N Things, RIP. It's a series of harbingers. It's the end of Things 'N things.

A Wilsons Leather store, a Disney Store, a Zales, a Gap here, a Home Depot there. Club Libby Lu is shutting down all its tween boutiques (farewell, belly-shirted glitter imps!).

The Great American Fire Sale has finally taken its toll. The mall is a triage center. Hey, JCPenney, can you hear us? Blink twice, friend, give us a sign. Eddie Bauer? Buddy? How many fingers are we holding up? J. Jill, you with us, girl? Abercrombie, dude, you look a little peaked, the abs are going soft or something. And the shoe stores! The long faces therein, like refugees, seeming as if there is no worse fate in the world than trying to sell a brand-new pair of Air Jordans.

We are a people who've felt everything you can feel in a mall: We have been teen-agers in a mall, long enough to become grumpy adults in the mall. (It's been 26 years since Frank Zappa's daughter had that "Valley Girl" hit, which name-checked the Sherman Oaks Galleria, which was torn down so long ago nobody remembers it anymore. She's 41 now.) We fell in love in malls. We brought our babies to the mall, to PLAY. We had soaring satisfaction and buyer's remorse in malls. We went deeply into debt in the mall. We went to the mall whenever there was nothing else to do.

Yet it's hard to feel sorry for mallworld, because it kept expanding until market forces intervened. By then there was a box-store feeling to life just about anywhere, everywhere.

We are a people who've grown accustomed to the dire warnings from retailers that Christmas – in any year – was going to be a tough one, and that instead of making hundreds of billions of dollars in sales, retailers would only make ... hundreds of billions of dollars in sales.

Every year we spent more, and every year it never seemed to be good enough. We recognize now that this tended to be an abusive relationship, the dysfunctional family dynamic, like a Christmas comedy, only sad.

Economy: You never get me what I want.

Consumer: What? I buy you everything you ask for! Every year!

Economy: I still feel empty.

Now comes the strangest feeling of all: sympathy. (Sympathy? For the mall?!)

Yes, in a way. It's a lousy feeling to shop and feel bad about all the people who can't, even if they (and the mall) brought it on themselves. It's a lousy feeling to shop while knowing that if nobody else shops, then pretty soon nobody will have any money to shop.

Mallworld overpampered us, and we went willingly, again and again. Sorry to pick on Old Navy (with all those minus signs quarter after quarter on its financial reports and those of its corporate siblings, Gap and Banana Republic), but standing in the middle of it right now you feel — ashamed of everyone involved, from the upper echelons of bailed-out Wall Street all the way down to your overextended, overstimulated consumer self. This is not exactly joyeux.

You acquire a daily familiarity for numbers you used to never pay attention to, such as the consumer confidence index. You listen to those "This American Life" podcasts that all your smart friends keep raving about, in which Ira Glass and his nervous Nellies try to explain our global economic calamity. You learn about things like "consumer paper" loans. You finally read the Economist, after all these years of claiming to read the Economist. You figure out how many zeroes are in a trillion. (Twelve.)

You have dreams in which Paul Krugman and Michael Lewis make brief cameos. Neel Kashkari, who oversees the books on the federal bailout, is named one of People's Sexiest Men Alive. You start to see, at last, how it's all connected, like a game of Jenga. (Jenga: The Deflation Edition – families everywhere will find hours of fun!) Remove one piece (i.e., Christmas shopping) and the entire structure collapses.

But what if you don't want to shop anymore?

That's life in the shopocalypse. (Not our word. "Shopocalypse" was coined by Reverend Billy, a New York performance artist who has evangelized across the nation's malls and power retail centers every Black Friday for years, which he proclaimed "Buy Nothing Day," preaching the message of the so-called Church of Stop Shopping. Happy now, Reverend?)

We soak up the doom. We also buy a sweater at Lord & Taylor, and we like it until we bring it home, and then see it as a sweater of doom. We go to Harold's, whose employees got told the news Nov. 7. In its time, Harold's, with 42 stores in 19 states, was a venerable prep-wear supplier, the kind of place for people who thought they lived in Connecticut but didn't.

We buy a couple of dress shirts. There's not much left. The vultures have come and gone.

It's a sympathy purchase, we suddenly realize – the stuff you buy as a way of saying farewell? Lower prices are supposed to make you feel good. Now, lower prices make you feel worse.

"Sorry about the cheap bags," the clerk says, putting the shirts in a white plastic grocery bag with red letters that say THANK YOU. THANK YOU. THANK YOU!

You're welcome, welcome, welcome, and goodbye.

We stagger out feeling like lucky survivors, for who knows how long.

Police examine the death of a Wal-Mart employee who was trampled to death by a surging crowd in a New York suburb on Black Friday. Customers forced their way into the store in search of holiday bargains.

HBO examines values of 'Kids and Money' in documentary

HBO's new documentary, "Kids + Money," examines the way that children's worlds are influenced by money in today's culture.

BY MARY MCNAMARA
LOS ANGELES TIMES

HOLLYWOOD — Social corruption is never quite as startling as when it's illustrated by children. In the one-hour HBO documentary "Kids + Money," photographer and filmmaker Lauren Greenfield ("Thin") interviews 13 Los Angeles children about their relationship with money, and as you would imagine, it is not particularly healthy.

Here's Emmanuel, 17, who, with financial assistance, attends Harvard-Westlake School and obsessively dreams of being part of the wealth he sees every day.

Annika, 12, badgers her mother for a wardrobe that can pass muster in her school's cliques, and Sean Michael, 17, had to get a job when his folks refused to support his Nike shoe habit.

"In L.A.," explains Phoebe, 16, "the money is on the surface level. When you meet someone, it's like, 'Hi. I'm this person. I'm rich.' or, 'Hi. I'm this person. I wish I was rich.'"

This "whatever" acceptance of life defined by possessions is balanced by a few more sensible voices. Luis, 14, knows what it's like to go without food, and Zoie, 17, lives in such a tiny apartment that she shares a bedroom with her parents.

But the point is clear. Many children are part of a status infrastructure so rooted in wealth that it makes Edith Wharton's New York look like a socialist utopia.

It is easy to dismiss these kids, with their credit cards and spa birthday parties, as simply spoiled rotten. Tempting too — especially when one young diva gives her mother, who is in the next room, the finger, or the almost finger, before looking at the camera with a hackle-raising mixture of guilt and defiance.

But to view "Kids + Money" as merely a disturbing portrait of modern youth, or, for that matter, Los Angeles, would be a mistake. Yes, many of these kids are horrifying, but they're only giving voice to learned behavior. And although Greenfield, disturbingly, chooses to include only mothers in the interviews, the larger questions raised are not so much about parenting as they are about our values as a nation.

Obviously, a shoe collection like Sean Michael's is excessive even by Los Angeles standards, but there is no denying that American children consume in amounts and ways that they did not a generation ago. And why wouldn't they? They are marketed to by every company from the Gap to Nokia to Burke-Williams. Rich kids always have had their baby designer duds, but now it's the middle class that companies court, convincing suburban 12-year-olds that they need to shop at Abercrombie, get their eyebrows waxed, have $200 sneakers and get weekly pedicures.

As tempting as it is to feel smug while watching "Kids + Money," what is that mother thinking? What's wrong with kids today? – these children are only spitting out the words we've put in their mouths.

If Wall Street wizards can crash the economy by overspending, if thousands of adults can buy houses they couldn't afford, why shouldn't little Megan expect to get a paraffin dip every week? Why shouldn't Emmanuel think it is totally unfair that although he gets to go to posh Harvard-Westlake, he isn't as rich as his friends?

Money has become the sum of the American dream, and these kids are exactly what that looks like.

Junior guard Ricky Harris lost his right shoe against Jacksonville State on Nov. 24, but that didn't stop him from attempting to drive to the basket. Harris scored 27 points Saturday night against Wisconsin Green Bay, but the Minutemen fell 84-67.

UM falls to the Phoenix

Kellogg decided he saw enough and called time-out after Phoenix point guard Rahmon Fletcher stole the ball from point guard Chris Lowe for a layup.

"[Finishing games] has been our problem all season long. We come out in the first half and play really well and in the second half we just die," Harris said. "It just has to all come together and we have to figure out what it is we want out of this season."

The Minutemen didn't have an answer for Green Bay's run until Harris hit a 3-pointer to slow down the charge. They managed to cut the deficit to four points, which was the closest they would get to slowing down the Phoenix.

Even Harris's offensive spurt could not stop Green Bay's offense, which finished with five players in double-figures.

Cotton led the way for Green Bay with 21 points. UMass also struggled to stop forward Terry Evans (18 points) who finished with 6-of-7 shooting, which included perfect 3-point shooting on three attempts.

The Minutemen eventually switched from a man-to-man into a zone because Kellogg felt like they weren't playing with the intensity that he was looking for. The adjustment didn't work as the Phoenix kept hitting open jump-shots.

The Minutemen struggled to hit 3-point shots while shooting 18 percent in the second half after starting 6-for-10 in the first half. The opposite was true for the Phoenix, who went 8-for-12 from beyond-the-arc in the second half.

Green Bay forward Mike Schachtner gave his team its first double-digit lead of the game after nailing a shot from the perimeter as he was fouled. Another UMass turnover allowed Fletcher to hit Green Bay's second consecutive 3-pointer to extend the lead to 15 points.

The Minutemen's defense caused them to pick up plenty of cheap fouls throughout the game. Lowe and center Tyrell Lynch fouled out and shortened the bench to the point that Kellogg brought in newly-added walk-on Lex Mongo to play for a minute.

Kellogg's idea of man-to-man isn't just stopping their opponents from getting good shot opportunities, but also denying opponents easy passes to their teammates. Given the lack of depth and height that UMass has been forced to deal with this season, playing that type of defense hasn't come along easily.

"I don't think we can play the style that I want to play for 40 minutes right now," Kellogg said. "I have to make some adjustments to make sure when we do go to our deny man, it's at the level that I want it to be."

Kellogg's experience with zone is limited and has never used it prior to Saturday's game, so he would prefer not to use it, but he knows that until the defense improves there might not be much of a choice.

Lowe struggling in '08

[illegible] where an errant pass or a careless mistake allowed for a break-away at the other end. Green Bay scored 20 points off of turnovers.

"Some of those turnovers were just amazing to watch," Kellogg said. "I think we need to find a better way to take care of the basketball and not have everyone on the team push it."

Kellogg believes that much of the team's success will ride off of point guard Chris Lowe's [illegible]. As a former point guard himself, he knows what having a great distributor can do for a team designed to attack the basket.

An even better example of that was last season with Memphis point guard Derrick Rose. His ball-making ability allowed for the Tigers to reach the NCAA Championship and allowed him to be selected first overall in the 2008 NBA Draft.

This season, Kellogg is not getting the production he would like out of Lowe. Lowe earned an Atlantic 10 All First-Team selection last year after leading the Minutemen to the National Invitation Tournament and earning the praises of coaches nationwide.

Saint Louis coach Rick Majerus compared the senior to John Stockton after putting up 13 assists while committing two turnovers in a win over the Billikens on Feb. 17. Lowe also earned a comparison to LeBron James from Akron coach Keith Dambrot, who coached James in high school.

"He's creating opportunities for everybody on that team," Dambrot said about Lowe after losing to UMass. "He just has that knack to make winning plays on both ends of the floor. We tried to get two guys on Lowe, and we had our hands full."

But this season has been a struggle for the floor general, considering that Lowe has committed more turnovers (29) than assists (22). Last season, Lowe finished with 214 assists compared to 99 turnovers.

He has been the hardest critic of himself for not providing better leadership, especially following the 75-74 loss to Jacksonville State on Monday. With a five-point lead, the team captain fouled JSU forward Brandon Crawford as he made a 3-point shot with 10 seconds left in the game.

"If I don't [provide leadership], then the team isn't going to be successful. If we don't play well Saturday, then I don't know what the hell is wrong with this team," Lowe said after the loss on Monday.

The Minutemen are going to have a few days rest to figure out their turnover problems before heading to Toledo.

UMass first-year coach Derek Kellogg, center, looks on as Anthony Gurley, left, defends a Jacksonville State player in the home opener Nov. 24. UMass lost that game, and this weekend's tilt vs. Green Bay.

James Marcou leads the Minutemen with 17 points this season, registering seven goals and 10 assists. UMass lost this weekend to St. Lawrence, falling one goal short after a third-period surge.

24 of UMass 27 shots and improving greatly on his first appearance. The net minder covered up rebounds, limiting the Minutemen to only a handful of second-chance opportunities.

Saint Lawrence played a trap-style defense, which frustrated the Minutemen throughout the game. The trap forced turnovers and caused UMass to make more passes before entering the offensive zone.

The Saints (5-6-1) scored early in the first period and never looked back. At 6 minutes, 38 seconds into the opening frame, Alex Curran, positioned on Minutemen goaltender Paul Dainton's right, deflected a shot up and over his blocker to put the Saints up one.

Saint Lawrence continued to ride its momentum and physical play later in the period. Despite their best efforts to keep the puck in the offensive zone, UMass defenders were caught off guard, leading to a breakaway by Zach Miskovic. The defenseman rushed toward Dainton (17 saves), and flicked a shot that still found its way over the Minutemen net minder's glove, with 2:06 left in the first period.

The Saints added to their lead 9:11 into the second period on another breakaway. Mike McKenzie broke away from the nearest UMass defenders, separating himself by almost 10 feet before beating Dainton 5-hole.

After St. Lawrence added its fourth goal the Minutemen finally got on the board by a shorthanded goal. Scott Crowder skated into the opposing zone with Quirk streaking toward Moss. Crowder backhanded the puck, which bounced off Moss' chest. Quirk slapped away at the puck, which was caught between Moss' pads. The puck, forced by Quirk's effort, trickled past the goal line.

"We didn't compete as hard as they did," Quirk said. "It's unacceptable – you have to be held accountable for that."

said. "We got a little more off of that, got some looks anyway."

Following the game, UMass' captains Cory Quirk and Brett Watson expressed a sentiment of uncertainty.

They know exactly what the 26 men in their corner are capable of and don't understand how they've lost four of their last five games – including three to Hockey East opponents.

"We didn't compete as hard as [Saint Lawrence] did. From the first puck drop, they controlled the play and scored some goals as a result of it," Quirk said. "They out-battled us. It's unacceptable and we need to be held accountable."

It might seem a little sensational to assume losses to UVM and SLU in November could harm UMass' chances at a successful season come March. But you have to consider how that will be judged.

A long postseason is really the only way to judge on-ice success. Losses to Hockey East opponents in winnable games hurt UMass' chances at earning home ice in the quarterfinals. At the same time, only one team can win the Hockey East title; earning an at-large bid to the NCAA tournament depends on its overall resume of wins and losses. And the way the PairWise System works out, these games count as much as those in January and February. That's why the Minutemen weren't as far out of the picture last year as it seemed even after a dreadful second half of the season.

"We're distraught right now. The guys are all over the map, and I've got to try to give them some direction," Cahoon said Friday. "It won't be in the form of anything verbal. It will be definitely physical.

"If these guys think they're something because they beat BC one time or they beat BU one time, it is such a huge mistake. We talk about that all the time.

"There are Division I hockey players who become great teams, and there are Division I hockey players who become so-so teams. I haven't seen the great team yet. I've seen some great performances, but I haven't seen the great team yet. I'm dying to see it."

Harris' 27 not enough in loss to Phoenix

BY ADAM MILLER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

GREEN BAY, Wis. — Following its 75-74 loss to Jacksonville State on Nov. 24, Massachusetts men's basketball coach Derek Kellogg said his team "would have to play tough on defense for 40 minutes if it wanted to win a game.

What Kellogg didn't anticipate was that after a few days of working on defense, his team would deteriorate offensively.

|---|---|
| UMass | 67 |

An 8-0 run by Green Bay spoiled the 33-23 lead that UMass had early in the first half. Guard Ricky Harris (27 points) did everything he could to give the Minutemen a lead in the second half – which included scoring 10 straight points – but was not enough as the Phoenix routed the Minutemen, 84-67.

"I thought we had an opportunity in the first half to get a nice lead," Kellogg said after the game. "In the second half, they played better and executed their offense a little bit more and we didn't get quite as much ball pressure."

Despite committing 15 of its 29 turnovers in the first half, UMass (1-4) maintained a lead that eventually shrunk to two points.

"It's amazing when you go back and work on defense in practice for two or three days and not so much offense that [the offense] goes to a tune of 29 turnovers," Kellogg said.

The Phoenix (3-2) came out of the locker room with a 14-3 run in the second half to give them a nine-point lead. Green Bay opened with back-to-back 3-pointers by Chop Tang and Troy Cotton.

Offense not clicking early

BY ADAM MILLER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

GREEN BAY, Wis. — When Massachusetts men's basketball assistant coach Vince Walberg introduced the dribble-drive motion offense to Memphis and coach John Calipari, it seemed like the team had few problems executing his plan.

Since introducing the offensive move to coach Derek Kellogg and the Minutemen, it has struggled to be cohesive and productive. One of the biggest reasons for their slow start this season is their inability to take care of the basketball.

UMass (1-4) has turned the ball over at least 20 times in three of its four losses this season.

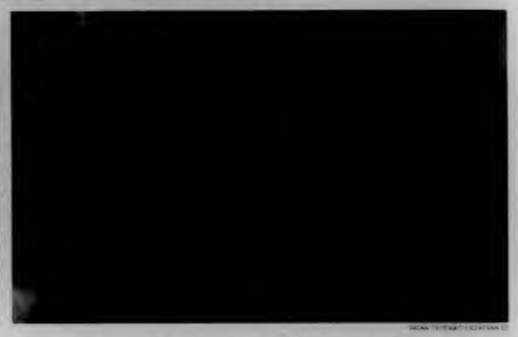
The Minutemen had 20 turnovers in their first loss of the season to Southern Illinois on Nov. 12 in the second round of the 2K Sports Classic. In the very next game against Memphis, they had 24 turnovers.

"I think they're just trying to figure out a lot of different things," Kellogg said. "I tell them you have to play fast but your mind has to be playing at a slower pace."

The Minutemen committed 29 turnovers Saturday night in an 84-67 loss to Wisconsin-Green Bay. UMass committed 15 of those turnovers in the first half alone with nine of them coming in the first seven minutes.

After the loss to Green Bay, guard Ricky Harris said part of the team's problems have to do with learning the dribble-drive offense, given how quickly it is expected to attack and move the ball around.

But Harris thinks the main problem has to do with not making careless mistakes.



"We've all been playing basketball for awhile now," Harris said. "We know how to dribble and we know how to not travel with the basketball so a lot of our turnovers were careless mistakes."

While many of the turnovers against the Phoenix happened to be travel calls, there were many

One miracle short

The Massachusetts hockey team came alive in the third period Friday night against St. Lawrence, scoring two late goals to spark a comeback attempt while goaltender Paul Dainton was pulled from the net, giving UMass an extra skater. Despite the late two goals, UMass coach Don Cahoon, pictured right, and the Minutemen needed one more goal to force an overtime.

Furious third-period rally not enough vs. St. Lawrence

BY RYAN FLEMING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Despite a late surge in the last minute of the game by the No. 17 Massachusetts hockey team, the St. Lawrence Saints held on for the 4-3 win Saturday night at the Mullins Center.

The Minutemen came into the game against St. Lawrence still suffering from the Thanksgiving Day side effects. Massachusetts lacked any clear emotion and energy – and were outskated and outplayed all game long.

The third period seemed like a recreation of the final frames in the last three Minutemen losses they struggled to get any momentum offensively and were handicapped by ill-advised penalties. The only difference was the late outburst in the final minute.

With less than one minute remaining, the Minutemen scored two goals – one by Alex Berry and one by Cory Quirk – after pulling Paul Dainton with about 50 seconds left in the game. UMass' final shot was blocked, which happened to be a common theme of the night.

UMass (6-6-1) had many chances, conjuring six power-play opportunities, but were unable to net a goal. Part of the problem was the willingness by St. Lawrence penalty killers to block shots. On one UMass power play the Saints blocked four shots, which lead to clears, killing time off the penalty. In the first two periods, the Saints blocked 25 shots. They finished with 27 overall.

"We didn't get the shots through on the power play to be successful," Quirk said. "All night they blocked our shots and sacrificed – and that is what you need to do to be successful in Division I."

The turning point in the power play was a 5-on-3 – if we could have gotten that first goal there it could have gave us a lift," UMass coach Don Cahoon noted.

Urgency not there for Mass Attack Friday

BY JOE MELENT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

When 8,389 people watched Casey Wellman beat Boston College in overtime nine days ago, there was excitement about the Massachusetts hockey team on campus.

The Minutemen enjoyed success in recent years, but there was something different about this version of the Mass Attack. They played entertaining, fast-paced hockey, they weren't afraid to defend each other, and they cared.

All of those still hold true if you ask the Minutemen, but the case on the ice since Wellman's dramatic tally has told a different tale.

"We're out of synch for whatever reason. We don't play with a sense of urgency, and we're not committed to the concepts that we've trained it. It's one thing to know it, it's another thing to do it," UMass coach Don Cahoon said following Friday's 4-3 loss to Saint Lawrence at the Mullins Center. "That speaks to the mentality of the group as a whole. We're obviously a little fragmented right now, and we need to work on that."

Much like last Tuesday's loss to No. 13 Vermont, the final minute of Friday's game proved much different than the 59 before it.

SLU controlled play and forced the Minutemen to play differently than they're accustomed. Not until Cahoon pulled sophomore goaltender Paul Dainton could UMass find anything resembling rhythm on the offensive end.

For most of night, the SLU defenders maintained a tight defensive shape in their own zone. Unable to find open teammates in the slot, the Minutemen tried to force shots from the blue line, resulting in 27 blocked shots by game's end.

In their wins against BC and Boston University, the Minutemen cycled the puck successfully creating open passing and shooting lanes. With such a heavy reliance on skating and constant movement, when those things disappear, goals go the same way.

"We spent almost two periods trying to force it from the top, and then we eventually changed the shape and the look and worked it a little bit from the side," Cahoon

UMass splits weekend pair in Classic

BY ELI ROSENWAIKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts women's basketball team put aside an embarrassing loss to Maine on Nov. 23, competing hard to reach the finals of the Coors Classic this weekend in Boulder, Colo.

The Minutewomen ultimately fell short in the finals against Minnesota, 86-67, after defeating Colorado, 70-62, in the first round of the tournament.

Sophomore forward Teya Wright led UMass (3-3) against the Golden Gophers, scoring 24 points and grabbing 13 rebounds in the best performance of her career. But foul trouble limited her impact and minutes against Colorado, as the Minutewomen faded in the second half to squander an 8-point halftime lead.

Colorado outscored UMass 58-31 after halftime. Wright had just two points and two rebounds in 17 minutes. Valerie Avebe also ran into foul trouble, leaving the Minutewomen with a small lineup and Colorado dominating the boards, 40-28.

"Our bigs were in foul trouble – Teya only played 17 minutes and was a non-factor – and we can't win games when that happens," UMass coach Marnie Ducko said after the weekend's action.

Ducko was concerned entering the game about the fatigue-factor, playing for the second night in a row in the high altitude.

"I didn't know if the fatigue factor or altitude factor was going to be a problem, and I think that it took some of its toll against Minnesota," Ducko said.

UMass bounced back well this weekend from the Maine loss, where the Minutewomen committed 27 turnovers in a 54-45 defeat. UMass shot 17-of-56 (30.4 percent) in that contest. Maine wasn't much better, turning the ball over 24 times and shooting 40.5 percent. But a four-point halftime lead didn't stick, as UMass was outscored 30-17 in the second half.

|---|---|
| Minnesota | 86 |
| UMass | 67 |
| UMass | 70 |
| Colorado | 62 |

The Minutewomen experienced similar problems against Minnesota (6-1). Squandering a sizeable halftime lead, UMass turned the ball over 20 times, leading to easy Golden Gopher baskets.

Cerie Cogrove was a bright spot for the Minutewomen, scoring 17 points on the strength of 5-of-9 shooting from 3-point range. Stefanie Gerardot scored 15 and Sakera Young had 10 points, six rebounds and five assists off the bench.

Mosgrove hit three triples in the win over the Buffaloes, but scored just the nine points. Gerardot and Kim Benton each scored 12 – with nine coming in the second half for Benton. Benton's 3-pointer less than two minutes into the contest gave UMass a 5-2 lead, an edge it would never relinquish.

UMass only turned the ball over 13 times, which helped it sustain pushes – led by the 36 points from Brittany Spears – by the Buffaloes.

"I was really proud of the way our kids came out and played, it was complete basketball from top to bottom," Ducko said.

UMass returns to action Wednesday at the Mullins Center against Providence.

Feds ease student loan process

Financial crisis sparks change

BY DINAH GORELIK
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Although many students face the difficulty of paying back loans, acquiring loans in the first place is now becoming a pressing issue. As a result, the US Department of Education is getting involved to make loans easier to secure by purchasing Federal Family Education Loan Program Loans (FFELP).

With the recent financial crisis in the United States, banks began to restrict lending, and people have found it harder to borrow money. This was especially tough on students, many of whom rely on loans to pay for their education.

Therefore, Education Secretary Margaret Spelling announced on Nov. 8 that the department will purchase loans, including the FFELP loans from 2007 to 2008, to "ensure availability of federal student loans, maintain the public/private partnership in the Federal student loan program, protect taxpayer interests by adding no net costs to the Federal Government, and provide the liquidity and support needed to stabilize the student loan marketplace."

The plans are to accumulate $6.5 billion in loans by buying $500 million worth of loans each week beginning in early December until Feb. 28, 2009.

The department will also buy fully disbursed FFELP Subsidized Stafford, Unsubsidized Stafford, and PLUS loans originated for the 2007-2008 academic year, according to the department's Web site.

"I am not sure where this will end up 20 years from now because student loans have high interest as it is. So going through a middleman will only increase the costs for a student," said University of Massachusetts student Rachael Mroz.

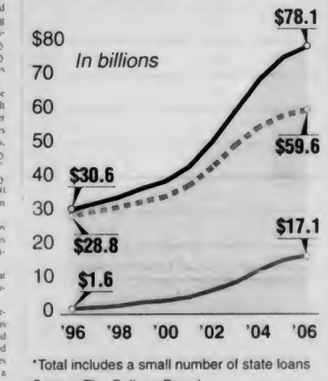
On Nov. 20, Spelling said in a statement, "I remain committed to making sure students and their families continue to have access to Federal loans for this school year and beyond."

These words may reassure those who think the department will not have the money to buy loans if the financial crisis continues.

"Today I am using the authority granted by Congress to protect students and their families during the unprecedented current market conditions and taking necessary steps to help ensure continued, successful disbursements of student loans," Spelling said.

"It is so important that students be able to continue their education and focus on learning rather than worrying about how and whether they can pay their college bills," said Anna Nagurney, a professor from the UMass Department of Finance and Operations Management. "Studying and getting the best education possible should be a student's primary concern. The investment now will pay the nation back many times in terms of human capital."

In terms of how this will impact the future, Nagurney said, "The default rate on student loans is still lower than the default rate on certain types of subprime-exotic mortgages. Thus, it is very likely that this investment by the federal government will pay off."



Last week, the US Treasury Department announced a new $200 billion consumer-lending program that can be used for student loans.

However, student advocacy groups are voicing their concern over this program, saying it benefits only private student lenders.

Student advocacy groups say that private student lenders prey on students with high-interest loans.

"The estimated 8 percent of undergraduates who take out private loans often are swayed by misleading and deceptive advertising, then saddled with interest rates two or three times as high as federal loans," wrote a Washington Post staff writer.

Higher educ. chair to resign

BY MATT ROCHELEAU
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Chairman of the state's Board of Higher Education, Frederick W. Clark Jr.

Frederick W. Clark Jr. will resign as chairman of the state's Board of Higher Education effective Dec. 6 – only 15 months after being appointed by Gov. Deval L. Patrick.

Senior vice president of Harrison Realty Corp., real estate development firm located in Easton, Mass., Clark cited the economic status in the real estate industry as the reason for leaving the 13-member board.

"Although serious and sudden economic conditions in my private sector profession (real estate development) sadly prevent me from continuing on in my volunteer capacity as a member and Chairman of the Board of Higher Education, I leave with complete confidence that the Board is in a stronger, more relevant, position to positively impact opportunities for the higher education advancement of our students," Clark wrote in a resignation letter to the governor, dated Nov. 20.

He expressed gratitude for his opportunity to serve as chairman.

"As a grateful alum of the system myself, I understand completely that but for Massachusetts public higher education, hundreds of thousands of students would simply not have had an opportunity to reach their full intellectual, economic, social or cultural potential," Clark said. "To work with and speak for the heroic faculty, staff, and administrators of these fine institutions has been a high honor for me – for which I am deeply thankful."

He plans to resign Friday after a special board meeting to recommend former Northeastern University President Richard Freeland as the next commissioner of the Massachusetts Department of Higher Education.

On Nov. 21, a search committee chaired by Clark unanimously recommended Freeland as the next commissioner, a nomination that must be approved by state Secretary of Education Paul Reville.

"Our likely commissioner recommendation to Secretary Paul Reville comes with the complete support of every constituent group within public and private higher education," said Clark. "I carry an unprecedented level of experience and respect, from governors to this, candidate will have a profound and lasting impact on higher education policy and planning," Clark said.

Freeland would take over for Patricia Plummer, who stepped down in September after a three-year term to work as a senior advisor at T-Mobile President Jack M. Wilson.

Freeland served as president of Northeastern and currently teaches at Northeastern and Clark universities.

Clark said he hopes to elect to have the Massachusetts Board of Education assist in the search.

"As I engage in assessing my support of public higher education, I do hope to find another crucial task in further contribution to the advancement of our colleges and universities and the students that they serve," he said.

According to Bob Wolfson, chairman of the Higher Education Coordinating Council, Clark's resignation is "bittersweet" for the state Department of Higher Education, whose mission is "to ensure that Massachusetts residents have the opportunity to benefit from a higher education that provides high value and advances their communities and the life, economic development, and progress of the Commonwealth."

Memorial to be held for Mumbai deaths

BY BEN WILLIAMS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

There will be a memorial in the Campus Center tonight for the Rabbi Gavriel Noach Holtzberg and his wife, Rivka, who were killed in the recent attacks on Mumbai.

Holtzberg, 29 and, Rivka, 28, were killed when terrorists attacked the Chabad movment's headquarters in Mumbai last week, according The Guardian. Their 2-year-old son escaped with a headquarters staff member.

"I think that when we see tragic events such as terror attacks like this, you think about those kinds of terrible evil forces, 'I can't do anything about that,'" said Hillel House Rabbi David Ruderman.

"[But] at UMass, we are a community of professors and people at the University who flock together and are against terror and make a statement against terror and refuse to be intimidated by [terrorists], and on the contrary use it as an opportunity to come together," he said.

The memorial is co-sponsored by the University of Massachusetts Hillel House and the Chabad House At Amherst.

Ruderman said the memorial will feature speakers and candles in honor of the deceased.

Holtzberg was an Israeli-born American who moved to Brooklyn as a teenager. He was a part of the growing Chabad-Lubavitch movement, whose main headquarters are in Brooklyn, according to The New York Times.

The movement is a denomination of the Hasidic faith that works to deepen the faith of secular Jews.

Chabad Houses around the world serve as places of worship for Jewish people, and are headed almost exclusively by young Jewish couples.

In 2003, the Holtzbergs opened the Chabad House in Mumbai and had run it ever since, according to The New York Times.

Chabad leaders said the Mumbai Chabad House will remain open.

The memorial will be held tonight in Campus Center 165-169 starting at 5:30 p.m.

Paintball club eyes comeback

BY NICK O'MALLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After their recent third-place finish in the National College Paintball Association (NCPA) tournament in Maryland, the University of Massachusetts Paintball Club is continuing to project itself – along with the game of paintball – as legitimate.

With 15 members on the current roster, the group is as strong as ever, placing in the top four at two NCPA events this year. However, this has not always been the case.

For many years, the Paintball Club was a Registered Student Organization (RSO), but the group said it suffered from a bad transition in leadership during the 2006-07 academic year, which led to the group's unraveling.

The Paintball Club lost its RSO status and all funding it once had, entering the 2008 fall semester with a $300 debt to the school. Since then, the team was forced to regroup.

"Our past president had too much going on at the time," said Paintball Club Vice President Eric Chi. "And the transition to the most recent president basically forced us to start again."

Starting from nothing was not easy for the club, members said. With no school support, the group had to operate as financially independent.

"We basically got no funding this year," Chi said. "Everything from hotels to the fees to the paintballs came out of pocket."

The performance in Maryland was a huge step for the players as they attempt to establish the program as one of the best in the region.

Facing off against teams like Boston University, Rutgers, and the University of Maryland, the UMass team advanced to the final round of the NEIC tournament. The team eventually placed third behind Navy and Northeastern.

The third-place finish was important in confirming the team's status compared to other teams nationwide. Members said it is particularly encouraging to the team that, as a group not financially supported by the University, it was able to face, and defeat, many teams that had much larger budgets.

"Many of the schools are in the same situation as us but there are a select few that get lots of money," Chi said. "Some schools pay for everything. I've heard that some schools get up to $10,000 from their schools."

Chi says the club is close to becoming affiliated with UMass again.

The club also hopes to expand upon its current focus on tournaments and include recreational play. But as of now, the team is determined to establish itself by performing well in tournaments against other college teams.

"Hopefully in the coming years we'll be able to prove to the school that we can not only perform well at tournaments but also that we're worth the money," Chi said.

As part of its efforts to expand, the team is seeking out any students interested in joining. For now though, Chi said their focus is on showing the world that their team – and the sport of paintball – is worthy of recognition as any other sports squad.

"Paintball is one of the fastest growing extreme sports in the nation and the more attention it gets, the more it will be recognized as a legitimate sport," Chi said. "At practice just like other teams we work just like other teams. But most importantly, paintball isn't just about running around in the woods anymore."

Nick O'Malley can be reached at nomalley@student.umass.edu

The UMass Paintball Club takes aim during a recent tournament. Club members are hoping their success in Maryland will aid their objective to regain RSO status at the University.

Obama unveils team

President-elect Barack Obama announces his national security team Monday, including naming former, Democratic primary rival Hillary Clinton as his secretary of state.

By Steven Thomma
McClatchy Newspapers

CHICAGO — President-elect Barack Obama named his national security team on Monday, vowing to bolster U.S. military strength with a renewed focus on diplomacy and alliances with other countries to combat terrorism and spread American values.

"The national security challenges we face are just as great and just as urgent as our economic crisis," Obama said as he unveiled the group. "In this uncertain world, the time has come for a new beginning, a new dawn of American leadership to overcome the challenges of the 21st century."

Underscoring his commitment to a high-profile diplomatic push overseas, he named former Democratic primary rival Hillary Clinton as his secretary of state, perhaps the only other American political figure as well-known around the world as himself, outside of President George W. Bush and former President Bill Clinton. Obama noted Clinton's "tremendous stature" as he selected her to be the nation's chief diplomat.

The president-elect lauded his choices as an experienced and diverse team that will bring him sometimes dissenting views to inform his governing decisions, then will work together to implement his policies, focusing on using "all elements of American power."

The team includes:

Robert Gates named as the secretary of defense. Gates, who now holds that job in the Bush administration, is the first civilian defense chief ever asked to stay on when a different party took over the White House. He's highly regarded for having steadied the military after six years of tumult under former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Eric Holder named as the attorney general. Holder was the number two at the Justice Department in the Clinton administration and served on Obama's search team for a vice president.

James Jones named as the national security adviser. Gen. Jones is a retired commandant of the Marine Corps and a former supreme commander of NATO, a post that requires as much diplomacy as it does military skill. He's expected to be looked to as a conservative forger.

Janet Napolitano named as the secretary of homeland security. The Arizona governor recently won her second term and is an expert on illegal immigration.

Susan Rice named as the ambassador to the United Nations. Obama will restore the position to Cabinet rank for his campaign adviser and former assistant secretary of state in the Clinton administration.

Throughout, Obama stressed a shift in foreign policy from the Bush years to one stressing cooperation with key allies and with international organizations such as the United Nations, many of which felt a cold shoulder from the Bush administration. Rumsfeld once famously dismissed allies such as Germany as "Old Europe" when they questioned the drumbeat for war in Iraq.

"We will renew old alliances and forge new and enduring partnerships," Obama said. "To succeed, we must pursue a new strategy that skillfully uses, balances and integrates all elements of American power: our military and diplomacy, our intelligence and law enforcement, our economy and the power of our moral example. The team that we've assembled here today is uniquely suited to do just that."

Teen dies in 'choking game'

By Samuel Spies
McClatchy Newspapers

RALEIGH, N.C. — It's called a game, but Kris Marceno's apparent attempt to get high by strangling himself ended up deadly.

The sophomore at Enloe High School in Raleigh, N.C., 15, died at his home on Nov. 2 from accidental asphyxiation, his family said. His death has schools, churches and communities talking about the "choking game."

In the "choking game," some children and young teens choke themselves or each other to experience the euphoric high that precedes blacking out, according to a report from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

The CDC has identified at least 82 "choking game" fatalities nationwide between 1995 and 2007. Three North Carolina children are believed to have died from the practice between 2000 and 2007, according to state medical examiner records.

"This is not a game," said Krista Regan, a death investigator for the North Carolina Child Fatality Review Team. "They think they can stop themselves, but they don't, they can't."

Kris was alone in his bedroom when it happened, and his death was initially ruled a suicide by Cary, N.C., police, the family said.

But family members soon began hearing from his friends that he'd choked himself before: even at school, Cary Police Capt. Michael Williams confirmed the case is open while police await the medical examiner's report.

"It's something big, that's out there," Kris' mother, Bobbi Jo Marceno, said Thursday. "There's a lot of kids doing it."

There were no warning signs that Kris was experimenting with this game, she said.

"He was a great kid. He was smart, funny, just the perfect son," Marceno said. "Talented beyond belief."

Kris could make anyone laugh and excelled in acting and drama, she added. "I don't think he took a shower without singing," she said.

A Wake County, N.C., schools official said the choking game isn't considered to be a major problem in Wake.

"We don't believe it's common," said Eric Sparks, director of counseling services. "We don't want to give too much publicity to it."

Regan has been tracking accidental asphyxiation for several years. She agrees that, among potentially lethal experiments lurking North Carolina children, it's an uncommon killer. Many more youth in this state, more than 10 a year, accidentally die after swallowing prescription pills they'd hoped would render a high.

The "choking game" has been around for decades. Youth have passed down techniques in schoolyards and at slumber parties since the 1970s. Now, videos dot the internet as teens find ways to communicate with peers beyond their neighborhood and school.

The CDC issued an advisory in February, warning parents to be on the lookout for signs that their children might be chasing a high through asphyxiation. Most of the deaths identified by the CDC were boys.

Kris' family is concerned that the practice isn't part of public health conversations, like drug or alcohol abuse.

"It amounts to the same thing," said Joe Marceno, Kris' father. "But you can't drug test them (to detect participation in this game)."

"It's the kids' responsibility to tell on their friends because if they don't, they're going to have to go to their funeral," Bobbi Jo Marceno said.

She plans to start an educational foundation, and will be speaking to a gathering of Kris' friends this weekend.

Adrienne Lumpkin, Enloe's PTSA president, said plans also are being made to talk about the choking game as part of a discussion about risky behaviors at a January meeting. She said they want to get the word out to parents about the dangers.

"It was a wakeup call for teens to be aware and do something about it," Lumpkin said. "If you have friends who are doing it, you need to go to their parents. This is something you need to make a stand on."

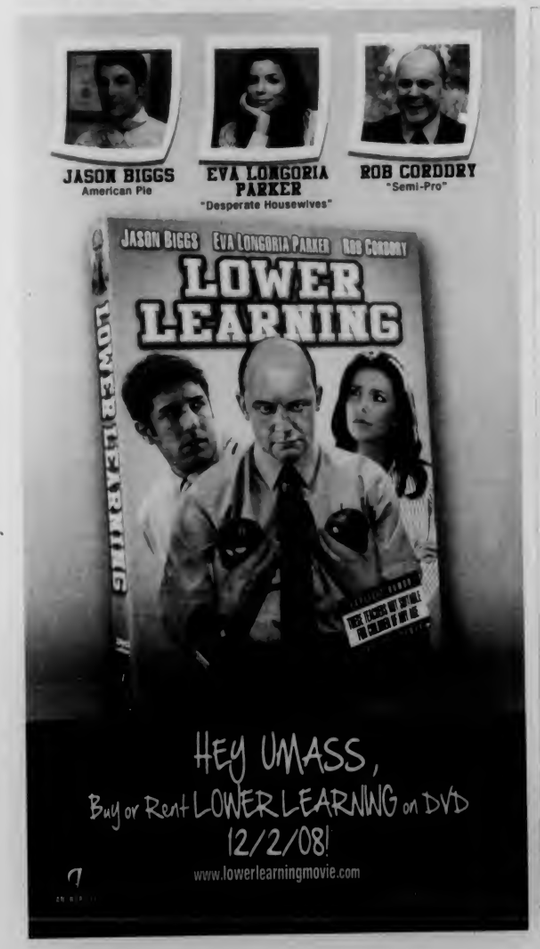
Value of online black market economy rises above $300 mil.

By John Letzing
McClatchy Newspapers

SAN FRANCISCO — The value of the underground Internet economy in fraud and stolen goods topped $276 million in the period between July 2007 and June 2008, according to a report published Monday.

Online security software maker Symantec Corp. the publisher of the report, said regularly advertised goods and services in the underground market included stolen credit card information and access to bank accounts worth up to $1.7 billion.

The market featured more than 69,000 advertisers and more than 44 million messages posted to online forums during the period, Symantec said.



The company described an "online underground economy that has matured into an efficient, global marketplace in which stolen goods and fraud-related services are regularly bought and sold."

North America hosted the largest number of servers used for underground economic activity during the period, Symantec said, with 45 percent of the total. Europe, the Middle East and Africa had a combined 38 percent of the world's illicit servers.

The data in Symantec's report was gathered by the company's observation of participating servers via its Security Technology and Response organization.

Symantec reported that stolen credit card information had sold for as little as 10 cents a card, while the potential worth of all stolen credit card information advertised in the period was $5.1 billion.

Credit card information proves a popular draw, Symantec said, because it's relatively easy to use for online purchases, while merchants find it difficult to identify suspect transactions before they're completed and goods have been received.

No body is perfect

Heather Waxman

Food.

For decades, this subject has proved to be an uphill battle between women and the media, and has recently reached a disturbing, all-time high.

From newspapers to television to radio to the Internet, the press sets impossible standards for women to achieve, calling the super thin too skinny and the healthy overweight. These absurd standards only fuel the staggering number of eating disorders.

Susan Bordo tackles this in her essay titled "Hunger as Ideology." In it she notes that women with eating disorders crave a "state they aspire to" that is "beyond appetite, beyond desire."

Namely, eating-disordered women are stimulated by the mysterious and phony world of retouching. Models and celebrities are made to look virtually flawless and are expected to convey that notion.

Scrolling through magazines, from advertisements to full-page spreads, these public figures are skyrocketed to a degree of perfection.

Although women with eating disorders know these photographs are a bogus facade, they ironically provide a great deal of willpower for those with the dreadful battle of the brain.

In a civilization filled to the brim with scrutiny over a woman's body, it seems almost impossible for women to knock the blasted devil off their left shoulder. Week after week, entertainment programs and tabloid magazines flash the latest celebrity diet and exercise regimens "guaranteed" to make women drop the pounds.

At the close of the summer, Star Magazine released a special "Summer Weight Winners and Losers" issue, analyzing the frail from the fat.

Likewise, People magazine recently reported actress Jessica Alba's routine that she implemented to acquire her post-baby body.

Not once was health cited in either of these accounts. All attention remained on how the celebrities lost the weight, not whether they were feeling energetic and healthy.

It is no wonder then that women, young and old, cannot help succumbing to the notion that a thinner body is a better body.

As a society, we naturally associate negative with bad. In the case of food, however, it appears that negating its presence is a good thing.

The media constantly report how celebrities cut and burn calories in order to rid food from their bodies, therefore presenting food as somewhat deconstructive.

Women readily absorb this information, essentially because there are not enough media sources combating the negative. Why? It is simply not as appealing, and the press is fully aware of that.

Women have long been fed the idea that glamour – not health – corresponds to happiness, so it makes sense as to why they would strive for such appeal.

According to Bordo, women have been taught to eat small amounts of food as far back as the Victorian era.

> It is no wonder that women, young and old, cannot help succumbing to the notion that a thinner body is a better body.

This tradition has been implemented throughout history, and is notorious in today's diet supplement and weight loss advertisements and infomercials.

The media understand these ideal standards are unachievable and preys upon women vying to lose weight, especially those with eating disorders.

They uses marketable strategies to target women and encourage them to "indulge" in unhealthy pills and undersized portions, further distorting people's grasp on the proper serving size.

The renowned diet supplement, Dexatrim, emphasizes the substantial amount of weight its pill-popping followers lose by investing their money in the product.

According to a "certified specialist," often an actor portraying a doctor, a "perfect" body is effortless, provided you use their supplement.

Ironically, however, in 2001, Dexatrim was recalled because of confirmed allegations that it contained phenylpropanolamine (PPA) ,an ingredient strongly correlated with a heightened risk of stroke. As a result, PPA was banned by the FDA.

NutriSystem, a diet planned around frozen pre-packaged meals, places an emphasis on a way to "lose weight without feeling hungry."

Statistics, however, show quite the opposite. Multiple complaints have been filed indicating NutriSystem's lack of variety, heavy amounts of sodium, as well as customers' tendency to feel weak and tired.

Despite such allegations, eating-disordered people and weight-loss hopefuls alike are susceptible to these products' claims – but not for the reasons most people would think.

The people in these advertisements and television commercials appear to be in a mental state that women with eating-disordered women want so badly. For the men and women in the commercials, eating is "no big deal."

These poster dieters appear satisfied in their current stage of life as a result of losing weight. They are not starving themselves or hoarding food into their mouths one binging session at a time. Eating is not a constant fly buzzing in their ear.

The minds of eating-disordered women desire this more than anything. It is not the physical, but the mental results that matter most to them.

For those with eating disorders, however, "big deal" does not even begin to describe what eating is to them.

It is their torture chamber. It is their crutch. It is their everything.

The media become so consumed with trends and will blindly follow them in order to make a profit.

Starting with our generation, it up to us to work together to combat the media's claims. We need to start the movement that is tried, true and acceptable: no body is perfect.

Rage of the road: keep the fast lane fast

Ben Rudnick

Raise your hand if you drove either to or from the Boston area for Thanksgiving weekend (or both).

Now slowly lower your hand and try not to feel too silly about the fact that you raised your hand because some newspaper columnist told you to.

I was debating what controversial topic to cover this week, but then I went through the torture of the Mass. Pike – twice – and I decided it would be much more fun to rag on how people drive than spend column inches analyzing tax structures, exploring economic bailout plans or presenting my plan for UMass to hire locally grown mimes to give directions on campus instead of spending $500,000 on new signs.

After a long debate, I couldn't get myself to change my mind. Besides, if you can't make fun of the way New Yorkists and Connecticuttians drive, then what good is it to have your own column?

Quick quiz: What do you do when you are in the passing lane and someone drives up behind you and blinks their lights at you?

Do you: A) Move to the right to let them pass at the first opportunity; B) Keep going the same speed while thinking what jerks Bay Staters are; C) Slow down so that they can get a better look at your neato collection of bumper stickers; or D) Do option "B" for 30 minutes and THEN do option "C" for another hour.

If you chose anything but "A" you deserve to have the flesh repeatedly flayed from your bones for all eternity on the lowest level of Hades – or be forced to watch your UMail inbox fill up with messages from UMass spokesman Ed Blaguszewski until it precludes you from getting important announcements from your department coordinator or to have to actually pronounce the name "Blaguszewski," whichever is the most torturous. (My apologies Ed, but the truth had to come out.)

> You're the one who sits in the left lane and says to yourself: "I'm going 5 mph over the speed limit, so I deserve to be in the 'fast' lane."

Admit it. It's you. Yes, you – the one reading this newspaper in The Hatch, Blue Wall, library, Learning Commons, Berkshire, Franklin, Worcester or Hampshire dining commons and who drives the Hyundai, Kia, Toyota, Ford, Subaru, Chrysler, Honda, Lamborghini, sport utility vehicle, wagon or scooter.

You're the one who sits in the left lane and says to yourself: "I'm going 5 mph over the speed limit, so I deserve to be in the 'fast' lane."

Well, guess what – you don't.

If people keep coming up behind you, hanging on your bumper for a few miles and then passing you on the right as soon as they can – you are part of the problem.

So do us all a favor and get your butt over to the right lane. You know what your clue is? If they salute you with one finger, it's not really a compliment.

But it's not just the Connecticutters, New Yorkians and the extraterrestrials (Vermonters) that cause problems. I reserve a special hell just for Massachumpians who wouldn't use their cruise control if Obama appeared to them in a beatific vision and assured them that every time they did Dick Cheney gets a painful electric shock.

If I am not mistaken (and for the purposes of this exercise you should assume that I am not), the speed limit on the Mass. Pike is 65 mph – not 65 in the flats, 70 going downhill and 55 going uphill.

Oh, and just to make sure that there is some educational value to this rant –that stick on the left hand side of the steering wheel does have a purpose (or if you drive a car made by General Motors, about 30 different purposes).

If you push it up, lights on the outside of your vehicle will indicate to everyone around you that you intend to move to the right and if you push the stick down the lights will announce that you plan to go to the left. As a bonus, you will get to see a pretty arrow on the dashboard blink on and off and get to hear a pleasant clicking or dinging sound. Won't that be fun?

I must admit that I owe some of you an apology. If you are one of the drivers that angered me so much over the past few days that I made it a point to get in front of you and then slow down until you were forced to move to the right, then I am sorry you were so annoying that I was forced to shame you in front of all the other drivers.

Who am I kidding? The other drivers loved seeing me embarrass you and I am sure I will be receiving many thankful e-mails in the coming days. I can't wait to bask in the well-deserved gratitude they will no doubt express and I can only hope that I will have enough time to give them all the driving lessons they will ask me for.

I just need to get my tongue out of my cheek before I teach my first "Drive Like Your Life Depends On It – Because It Does" class.

Selfish and anti-child

Greg Collins

In light of the heightened national conversation over education reform in America, brought to light recently during the presidential debates and the increasing popularity of Teach For America, there is one conclusion which needs to be emphasized:

Teachers unions are anti-child.

Why? Because the specific policies they oppose are ones that directly prevent children from receiving a better education.

The conditions for receiving a good education, like those of any other industry, are dependent upon creating the most opportunities for people to decide for themselves which opportunity best matches their specific needs.

For instance, teachers unions' strict opposition to school vouchers prioritizes helping teachers more than giving students and parents more educational freedom. Funded by public money, vouchers afford the option to parents to send their children to better school systems if the parents feel that the current school system is not meeting the children's educational needs.

In providing this freedom, children have more opportunities to be placed in classes with higher academic standards, stricter enforcement of attendance and higher graduate rates than those in failing public schools.

It is an undeniable fact that the overwhelming majority of parents in low-income school districts support vouchers.

There are also the selfish people who are anti-child.

Because it is also a known fact that an overwhelming majority of teachers in unions – as well as the nationwide teachers unions National Education Association and American Federation of Teachers – ardently oppose vouchers. They feel this will create competition for public schools while draining the schools' public funds.

Let's get myth number one out of the way: more funding for public schools by no means improves academic performance.

The outrageously high per-pupil spending throughout the years of notoriously bad school districts, such as in Washington, D.C., and New York City, has by no means produced a corresponding increase in math, science or reading skills among their students.

The point is not that public schools are able to function without any tax-payer dollars, but that immediate calls for more funding for schools to alleviate this problem are never the ultimate solution.

Unfortunately, teachers unions' selfish visions about how they think public schools should operate undermine any attempts to institute voucher systems. If public schools are faced with the threat of losing high-performing students to other schools, they would do what any rational person would do when faced with similar incentives: improve academic standards in order to retain students.

Improving academic standards does not mean throwing another $12,000 at each student. It does not mean succumbing to teachers unions' demands for increased pay, more time off or job security. And it most certainly does not mean accepting the status quo of underperforming schools.

Which leads to myth number two: public schools will not be strengthened because of the voucher system. In fact, it will create incentives to do the exact opposite. Improving academic standards does mean firing teachers who are not producing results in classrooms.

It does mean strengthening communication channels between teachers and parents to better facilitate a child's educational growth. And it most certainly does mean teaching facts before creative learning, punishing students for classroom behavior and enforcing attendance records.

These principles are often dismissed as typical simplistic pontification of close-minded conservatives. Yet for you students and faculty who did grow up in high-performing school systems – ask yourself why your educational environment was so good.

Was it because of high expectations from your teachers? Was it because of concentration on reading, writing, math and science? Was it because your parents expressed an interest in your educational progress? Was it because a community member, such as a clergyman, sports coach or grandparent, urged you to value your studies?

Unfortunately, these standards and such guidance are all undermined when teachers unions resist any competition within school systems that may benefit parents and children. Because in addition to vouchers, they also are hostile toward any notion of removing job security.

> Unfortunately, teachers unions' selfish visions about how they think public schools should operate undermine any attempts to institute voucher systems.

Due to guaranteed employment and tenure, teachers unions directly hurt students by allowing mediocre teachers to continue to teach without holding them accountable for poor classroom results.

Even though liberals and progressives identify themselves as supporters of change, those that blindly support teachers unions are promoting the direct opposite: maintainers of the status quo, resistant to any competition in education and hostile to those who disagree with their point of view.

In my brief time discussing politics with others, there has been perhaps no more intolerant group of people than this type.

Of course, it is easy to gloss over the continuing status quo of unions' resistance to change when we enjoy the privileges of a good education at UMass.

But for inner-city schoolchildren who have the limitless potential to become lawyers, doctors and engineers, they are hurt tragically by the breakdown of such school systems promoted by the selfishness of unions and school administrators.

And when these schoolchildren do not fulfill their potential when they grow up, we will know exactly who is responsible.

Jewish victims and the horrors of terrorism in God's name

Eli Gottlieb

While we all had happy Thanksgivings at home this past weekend, the city of Mumbai suffered an attack by approximately 60 Islamic terrorists. They killed 195 people, of whom 18 were foreigners.

If I sound like I take personal offense to all this, it's because six of these foreigners were Jews and a Chabad House was explicitly targeted. Apparently Islamic extremists no longer care precisely what their grievance is or who they target - they'll just attack anyone on their list of Shaitans (or evil-doers) wherever they find them.

They seem to have ceased acting like any form of rational or sensible paramilitary force and now behave as simply and stupidly as the villains of a Saturday morning cartoon. Also, Indian authorities actually had warning of a possible attack from the sea several months ago – much in the way that Bush had an intelligence report labeled "Bin Laden determined to attack inside the U.S." in the summer of 2001.

I think I speak for everyone when I say: well f.

On the "good news" hand, Muslims worldwide have condemned the attacks. From the Ramallah to Baghdad to Muslim Britain, leaders have condemned the Mumbai attacks. Inayat Bunglawala of the Muslim Council for Britain has said that they "bring the entire faith [of Islam] into disrepute" and Kazim al-Muqdadi of Baghdad University has called them "sick and ignorant."

Apparently the senseless terrorism of the past eight or 10 years has actually convinced Muslims that maybe "death to the infidel" is as bad a philosophy as we claim it to be – even if only because the "infidel" category has a tendency to grow until it includes people who actually fought in the start of the jihad. Even Hamas, which United States listed as a terrorist group in 1995, and Mahmoud Ahmandinejad, the president of Iran, don't seem to want to touch this one.

Still, I find myself in the mood to demand justice – the swift, sure and painful type – for the perpetrators of this horrifying massacre. Except that – wait a minute – they've killed themselves like cowards. Oh well, this behavior is typical of Islamic extremists.

So I suppose I should write about how we here in "the West" should respond to these attacks. The primary answer is that we shouldn't.

> We should act as mediators to make sure that India and Pakistan can do their best to get together and kill or imprison every last terrorist.

We should offer our full support to India. We should act as mediators to make sure that India and Pakistan can do their best to get together and kill or imprison every last terrorist.

What we should not do is invade India. I must admit that given our current government's past performance, I might expect such a thing.

Is it too much to ask that not every terrorist in the world target Jews?

I've attempted a thorough look through the news reports on Mumbai and there appears no actual reason the Lakshar-affiliated terrorists (or at least, CNN says they're affiliated with Lakshar and al-Qaida) targeted a Chabad House and the Taj Mahal hotel among various other minor sites that did not turn into hostage situations. Hell, why was there a Chabad House in India?

In fact, nothing seems to make sense about this terrorist attack – which, I suppose, is my point. We really should encourage India to make a more efficient police force, but I think if we can work diplomatically with the Muslim world, this could be the effective end of Islamic terrorism.

Muslims all over the world have begun to realize how damaging terrorism is to their own collective interest and now actively protest it. And in return, or rather in offer, it appears that India has refrained from demanding Muslim or Pakistani blood despite a long-standing religious conflict in the region every bit as old and bloody as anything born of the Middle East.

So let us pray that the horror of last week's attack may actually contain the seeds of a longer-term peace. Muslims are standing up to the cowards among them who commit murder in God's name and Hindus have so far not (as some have in the past) antagonized the Muslims.

In a startling development by which India has actually surpassed the United States for effective government (a marvelous feat considering the stories a friend of mine has told about the Indian police force and civil service), three top ministers of the Indian government have actually resigned in shame over this fiasco.

India may also begin sharing intelligence with Pakistan in a mutual effort to control the terrorist militias that operate across their borders.

Now if every terrorist hack stopped considering Jews an automatic target wherever we live or go, I could live a bit more happily.

Thanksgiving brings critics to big screen

Nicole Kidman and Hugh Jackman star in "Australia," which chronicles bombings of the northern region of the country in 1941. The flick is one of many which debuted over Thanksgiving.

By Justin Gagnon
Collegian Staff

Milk

It's not often that Hollywood produces a film revolving solely around homosexuality. Two big-name movies of this sort in the past 28 years come to mind – "The Birdcage," a comedy about drag and cabaret, and of course "Brokeback Mountain." However, the only thing they have in common is homosexuality.

This week marks the release of "Milk," the story of Harvey Milk, the first openly gay man elected into public office in the United States.

The film is directed by Gus Van Sant ("Good Will Hunting," "Finding Forrester"), and stars the dynamic Sean Penn ("Mystic River," "Last Times at Ridgemont High") as Milk. James Franco ("Pineapple Express," "Tristan & Isolde") has a supporting role as Harvey's lover Scott Smith. Emile Hirsch plays Cleve Jones, a gay activist mentored by Milk, while Josh Brolin ("No Country for Old Men," "W.") plays Dan White, a San Francisco city supervisor who plays a large role in the life of Milk, to say the very least.

In a few early reviews, "Milk" has received nothing but positive feedback. With its intriguing story and star cast, it has set itself up to be a mind-winning and truly inspiring film.

Australia

Baz Luhrmann may be better known for his voice in the speech-turned-song "Everybody's Free (To Wear Sunscreen)," but his short directorial career has proved to be quite respectable. His brief resumé includes the popular movies "Moulin Rouge" and "Romeo & Juliet." His latest work is of a similar genre, but may prove to be a bigger success.

The film is an epic drama that takes place in pre-World War II northern Australia. Lady Sarah Ashley, played by Nicole Kidman, ("Moulin Rouge," "To Die For") is a wealthy British aristocrat who inherits a large amount of land in Australia. She becomes interested in a stockman played by Hugh Jackman. ("X-Men," "The Prestige") who is unnamed and credited simply as a drover (an Australian stockman that usually cares for a large amount of livestock). When history takes its course and the Japanese bomb Darwin, the capital of Australia's Northern Territory, the two experience it first hand.

Critics aren't crazy about "Australia," which has received a lot of criticism for it length (almost three hours). However, it will be interesting to see what the public thinks.

Transporter 3

Jason Statham is back for the third installment of the "Transporter" series, which probably should have stopped after the first. "The Transporter" was received well by the common moviegoer, but was frowned upon by critics. The second was a slight downgrade with critics saying that it was a bit over-the-top.

As usual, the third movie in the series has a third director, Olivier Megaton. "Transporter 3" is lead by action star Statham ("The Italian Job," "Crank") as Frank Martin, with Francois Berleand, a French actor know mostly in America for playing Inspector Tarconi in the sequel's previous movies.

This chapter of the series puts a new twist on the story, as Martin must stay within a certain distance of his car or he will die. Early showings and screenings have not gone well, with critics complaining that the plot is lame.

Four Christmases

With Christmas right around the corner, it's the time of year for corny holiday movies that aim for an "It's A Wonderful Life" type of message, but end up filling clichés and boring the audience.

This year, it's Vince Vaughn ("Wedding Crashers," "Swingers") and Reese Witherspoon ("Legally Blonde," "Walk the Line") taking on the nearly impossible task of making a quality Christmas movie. This potentially hilarious pair stars as Brad and Kate, a happy San Francisican couple forced to return home for Christmas to visit their families due to some outlandish circumstances. Since all of their parents are divorced, they have to travel to four different places just to celebrate the holiday.

Robert Duvall, Jon Lavreau, Jon Voight, Sissy Spacek, and Tim McGraw, just to name a few, all play members of the various families.

"Four Christmases" is director Seth Gordon's first feature film, and it doesn't seem to be a good one. The "Tomato-Meter" on Rottentomatoes.com has given the movie a 21 percent so far, with critics agreeing that the film is just awful.

Bringing history lessons to life

Children work to understand Holocaust

By Stephanie Akin
The Record

FAIR LAWN, N.J. – The Fair Lawn, N.J., Jewish Center is filling its hallways with crayons.

In boxes or jumbled in clear plastic containers, the crayons, for now, are unbroken, their tips still come to a factory-perfect point.

But although they have never been used, these crayons are already serving an important purpose for children at the Jewish Center's Hebrew School, and it belies the bright colors of the crayons. They are helping the children learn about the Holocaust.

For the past year, students at the Hebrew school have been working to collect 1.5 million crayons – one for each child murdered.

The idea is that the sheer number of crayons and the time it takes to collect them will help the children understand the significance of a number so large most people have no idea how big it really is.

"Some of them, the younger children, can't even count yet," said Flora Frank, chairwoman of the project. "They don't know what one million even looks like, how many zeros follow the one."

The problem is a common one – The United States Holocaust Museum even provides tips for teachers trying to help children comprehend the massive number of victims.

Crayons struck Frank as a powerful symbol of children's lives lost, especially once the students see the volume of their finished collection.

"You always think of children with crayons," she said. "Most people can't understand how much 1 million, let alone 1.5 million crayons is. How much space does it take up?"

As the project grows, the students say they are starting to get a better idea of what Frank means.

Samuel Hanzman, 12, said he checks a bulletin board that shows how many crayons the students have collected every time he comes to classes at the Jewish Center. After a year, the students have collected 70,000.

"We've been doing it for so long, and you can see how many thousands t here are," he said. "And there's still a lot more left."

His classmates said they are constantly struck by how large the number is. "It's sad," said Rachel Toron, 11. "That's a lot of kids."

The project has been so successful that it is being adopted by public schools across the state, whose students will donate crayons to the Jewish Center as part of their Holocaust education curriculum, Frank said. At the end, the center will display some of the crayons into a permanent Holocaust exhibit. It will donate the rest to schools serving underprivileged populations. The center made an early donation on Tuesday, giving 10,000 crayons to two Paterson, N.J., schools.

Representative from those schools said they will work the donated crayons into lesson plans on the Holocaust.

"The crayon is something that is a very simple object," said Frank Puglise, principal of Paterson's PS 21, who collected some for his school. "In this instance, it's something that has tremendous significance."

Arlyne Berzak, guidance counselor at PS 24 in Paterson, said teachers in her school are supplementing the crayon lesson with a film about a school in Tennessee that collected 6 million paper clips, symbolizing the estimated number of Jewish Holocaust victims.

"They're really fascinated by it," she said. "Anything that's tangible makes the history more vivid to them."

Volunteers carry crayons donated by the religious school of Fair Lawn Jewish Center Congregation B'nai Israel in New Jersey. They are collecting 1.5 million crayons in memory of the children who died in the Holocaust.

Not in this 'Day & Age'

Recent release fails to follow earlier fame

By Peter Rizzo
Collegian Staff

Just who do the members of The Killers think they are, anyway?

When the group first rode the wave of universal acclaim for its hour-long dance party debut, "Hot Fuss" in 2004, it was easy to classify – a dance rock band fond of big singles. The sort of band you could listen to with friends, and also allowed your parents to belt out the chorus to "Somebody Told Me" while it blared on FM radio.

Flash forward four years and The Killers have become an enigma.

Four albums into its career, the group has reinvented itself at every turn. It took a trip to "Sam's Town," drenching its sound in the American southwest, a move made in hopes of shaking off its mock title as the "Best New British Band."

And as for its artistic stretching? The Killers received a resounding bull-whipping from music critics across the board, which was no doubt thanks to frontman Brandon Flowers' penchant for exaggeration, labeling "Sam's Town" as "the most important album of the last 20 years."

It was no surprise that its second CD didn't live up to the hype, even though it was as good as its predecessor.

Since then, times haven't been great. Its label scrapped together a B-sides album dubbed "Sawdust," which yielded little love from the big radio stations and MTV which had made the band mega-stars.

Then came "Human," the lifeless limp-bodied first single that was so saturated in melodrama and obtuse lyrics like "Are we human? Or are we dancer?" that Flowers sums it up the reaction best when midway through he warbles, "Let me know if your heart's still beating."

Now, at the end of 2008, The Killers have confounded predictions again.

Its latest effort, "Day & Age" isn't a return to form, but another foray into its imaginations, a dense musical journey sprinkled with space rock and the type of creative leaps to be expected of a regular band, not The Killers.

"Day & Age" manages in its own right to stand surefooted amongst the band's earlier works. The album's only glaring faults are its lack of consistency and The Killers' bread and butter, the big single.

While the album is an engaging, even enjoyable listen, "Human," "Spaceman," "Neon Tiger" and other would-be singles fail hit the high-water mark left by "Mr. Brightside" and "When You Were Young."

There isn't a tune on the record fit enough to survive in today's harsh pop landscape, which teems with hip country stars and auto-tuned rap beats. A sentiment best summed up in the words of Flowers himself in "The World We Live In," where he says, "This is the world that we live in/ and no we can't go back."

The album works best when The Killers allow themselves to experiment.

"Losing Touch," the first song on the album, is the band's kiss off to all those who "run and tell their friends" and "fill their heads with rumors of impending doom." Blistering with offbeat saxophone blasts and heavily distorted guitar, The Killers hit the ground running but quickly lose speed.

On tracks like "Joy Ride" and "A Dustland Fairytale," despite interesting musical backings by the band, Flower's melodrama weighs down the song, rambling on about "Cinderella in a party dress," and "slick chrome American Princes" while lines like "Moon river, what'd you do to me?" clunk so hard that it almost drowns out the intricately layered instrumentation.

"Day & Age" has a few mistakes. It's a tad long and overindulgent but The Killers are an ambitious lot, and at worst, still demonstrate the creativity and imagination to push to be better. In the end, even if the album were to be categorized as a misstep, it's a misstep in the right direction.

The members of the British-based rock band, The Killers, have recently released their third record, titled "Day and Age." While many songs provide great enjoyment, the CD as a whole is unable to out-do its predecessor.

Rising young star was 'born to sing'

By Dan Deluca
The Philadelphia Inquirer

WASHINGTON — Jazmine Sullivan has always been ahead of schedule.

"I came out of the womb singing," says the powerful-voiced 21-year-old rising star.

Sullivan currently has two hits from her debut album, "Fearless," on the Top 10 Billboard Hot R&B/Hip-Hop song chart – her breakout single, "Need U Bad," and revenge song of the year, "Bust Your Windows."

She was only slightly exaggerating about her ultra-early musical entrance.

Sullivan's husky, dusky, attention-demanding voice first started eliciting shouts of "Sing it, girl!" – as it did at Constitution Hall in D.C. last week with her stirring ballad, "In Love With Another Man" – when she was a soloist in the children's choir at St. Andrew's Fellowship Baptist Church in Philadelphia.

And even before that, her mother and manager, Pam Sullivan, recalls, her daughter had jaws dropping.

"I had a few members of the choir over at my house, and I was going over this note that they were having trouble with," she said in a separate interview backstage at Constitution Hall.

"Jazmine must have been about 2; she could barely talk. And from her crib, she just blurted out the exact note, with the exact pitch. And everybody just burst out laughing. It was over for choir practice that day. She made everybody look bad."

By the time she was 11, Sullivan was wowing host Steve Harvey, singing "Accept What God Allows" on "Showtime at the Apollo." But her oversize voice made her self-conscious.

"I had insecurities," she said. "Everybody wants to have a really high, pretty voice and I had the opposite of that. People always asked me, 'What's it like to have a grown-up voice trapped inside a kid's body?' But then I realized as I got older that it was my low and raspy voice that drew people to me."

People like Stevie Wonder, whom Sullivan sang for at his grandson's birthday party when she was 13. "I was so young," she says. "I didn't really understand the magnitude of what was going on." And people like Missy Elliot, who collaborated with Sullivan on "Need U Bad," the reggae plea from Fearless that topped the R&B charts during the summer.

She grew up listening to gospel, as well as her mother's Prince, Donny Hathaway, and Stevie Wonder records, and educated herself on singers like Sarah Vaughan and Ella Fitzgerald, whom people were always comparing her to. (Today, she names gospel singer Kim Burrell, Aretha Franklin, Hathaway, Wonder and Brandy as her five favorite singers.)

She missed her first week at the High School for the Creative and Performing Arts in South Philadelphia because she was in London touring. And when she was a sophomore, she landed a record deal with Jive Records.

Sullivan recorded "hundreds" of songs while she was signed to the label, most of them tentative collaborations with other writers. But when she was 18, and set to embark on her full-time career after graduation, the label dropped her.

"That was a big blow," she says. "I was angry. Everybody was going off to school, and I had already decided I wasn't going to college because singing was going to be my career."

Looking back, though, she understands why it didn't work out. "They didn't know what to do with me," she says. "I was young and I didn't know what to do with my own self. I didn't know who I was, so I couldn't take control of my career and tell them what I wanted to do."

The solution for that was "to start writing my own songs, so I could make an album that reflects who I am." Those songs, and a performance for legendary exec Clive Davis last year, earned her a new deal with J Records.

Which led to "Fearless," a musically varied, wholly impressive effort whose 12 songs range from the murder (in self-defense) fantasy "Call Me Guilty" to the girl-group goof "Switch."

Despite the album's title, two songs, "Lions, Tigers and Bears" and "Fear," are, in fact, about the things that Sullivan is afraid of, which include love, gaining weight, fame and failure.

"I think it's fearless to express that you have fears," she says. "I think a lot of people don't want to be that real or open with their audience, but I want to come straight out with it."

After finishing her tour this week with Maxwell, whom she calls "the sweetest person in the world" – the silky love man had flowers waiting for her backstage when she did two solo gigs – she'll take a break at her parents' house in Northeast Philly.

Early next year, she'll make her singing and acting debut on screen in "Red Tails," an Anthony Hemingway-directed George Lucas production about the African-American World War II pilots known as the Tuskegee Airmen.

In making music that blends her love for gospel and classic R&B with radio-ready beats, Sullivan looks to John Legend as a model. "To combine real music and still be able to appeal to the masses," she says, breaking into a chorus of Legend's "Ordinary People." "I hope I can do that."

But it's not her singing that gives her the most satisfaction.

"I want people to hear me sing," she says. "But more importantly, I want them to listen to the lyrics. I've always gotten compliments about my voice. But if you're good at something, and people tell you you're good at it, you're like 'Oh, whatever.' But if it's something you really have to grow into and work at? That means something."

Philadelphia native Jazmine Sullivan has recorded singles with artists like Missy Elliot, and recently released an album titled "Fearless."

Music releases to bring holiday cheer

By Jim Abbott
The Orlando Sentinel

It's time for turkey leftovers and a look at holiday CDs.

The sleigh is overloaded in 2008, so let's see if any of the new stuff packs enough quirky charm to match my reigning all-time favorite, the classic Mambo Santa Mambo. As is the custom, releases will be awarded candy canes or lumps of coal.

Before we go silly, let's start with something beautiful: "This Christmas," by Aretha Franklin, showcases the Queen of Soul on an assortment of classics and pop-oriented stuff. Hymns such as "Angels We Have Heard on High" and "Hark! the Herald Angels Sing," benefit from Franklin's gospel treatment. Three candy canes.

In the quirky department, we have duets with dead Elvis! "Elvis Presley Christmas Duets" takes otherwise nostalgic tunes such as "Blue Christmas" and melds duet partners ranging from Martina McBride to members of Little Big Town. Ickiness factor? Off-the-scale. Three lumps of coal.

There's nothing like Elvis duets from the grave to make one appreciate Faith Hill's new holiday album, "Joy to the World" is full of lushly arranged carols and traditional favorites such as "Holly Jolly Christmas." There are no surprises, which is good after the Elvis experience. Two candy canes.

Did someone say big? Genre-bending diva Sarah Brightman is typically super-sized on her first holiday album, "A Winter Symphony." Although there are enough strings on "Silent Night" to wake up the neighbors, these 12 songs are as lovely as they are large. Two candy canes.

When it comes to big production, the Jonas Brothers take a back seat to no one on "Joyful Kings," the group's medley of "Joy to the World" and "We Three Kings." It's the opening track on "All Wrapped Up!," a teen-oriented disc available exclusively at Target stores. There's plenty of pep, whether it's Miley Cyrus doing "Santa Claus is Comin' to Town" or the Plain White T's' "Christmas Won't Be the Same Without You." Very likable. Two candy canes.

For an old guy, Tony Bennett still has pep. Maybe that's what happens when you're singing in front of the Count Basie Orchestra, still one of the most reliable swing units on the planet. On "A Swingin' Christmas," Bennett and the band live up to the title on "I'll Be Home for Christmas," Silver Bells" and others. Enough to give that Mambo album a run for its money. Four candy canes.

It takes some moxie to inject original songs into the holiday mix, but R&B singer Ledisi does it with style on "It's Christmas." Her "Be There for Christmas" shimmies with the percolating beat of an old Motown hit. Even when she reinvents the traditional ("Children Go Where I Send Thee"), Ledisi has sass. Three candy canes.

Some reinvention is better left on the drawing board. So it is with "We Wish You a Metal Xmas and a Headbanging New Year," a 12-song collection featuring members of Queensryche, Dio, Dokken and other metal bands. On "Run Rudolph Run," even the usually cool Dave Grohl sounds ridiculous. Two lumps of coal.

For a more subtle blend of personalities, there's "Songs of Joy & Peace," by Yo-Yo Ma & Friends. The friends range from Diana Krall to James Taylor, who goes outside the holiday realm with his delicate take on "Here Comes the Sun." With intimate strings behind it, the song still sounds like a hymn. Three candy canes.

Although the songs are all holiday ones, Bela Fleck & the Flecktones stretch familiar carols into something improvisational on "Jingle All the Way." Keeper: A playful romp through "Linus and Lucy," the Peanuts holiday theme. Good grief. Two candy canes.

And, finally, what's more reliable than Ray Charles? His slinky version of "Rudolph, the Red-Nosed Reindeer" is among the 10 tracks on "A Jazz & Blues Christmas," a new compilation from Putumayo. There's also good stuff from B.B. King ("Christmas Celebration"), Charles Brown ("Santa's Blues") and others. There's lots of talk about the blues, but it doesn't stand a chance against this good stuff. Three candy canes.

Rhythm and blues crooner makes his way to the top

By Regina Robinson
Chicago Tribune

Singer and musician John Stephens has started a good checklist of things to do to leave a legendary mark on the music industry:

– Have legends take notice of your work.

Check.

On Al Green's new CD, "Lay it Down," the best song is a duet with John Legend, "Stay With Me (By the Sea)." Green's and Legend's voices are a harmonious treat for anyone who loves the old school soul sound.

Tom Joyner, the radio legend who's also known as "the hardest working man in radio," is also singing the praises of Legend, who has performed on the "Tom Joyner Morning Show," and also headlined his Fantastic Voyage cruise. "(I enjoy) his respect for old school," Joyner said via e-mail. "His mother taught him well."

– Give yourself the name Legend.

Check.

It's not arrogance on John Legend's part, just confidence in his music. Turns out he's right. Legend's debut CD "Get Lifted" went multi-platinum with the follow-up "Once Again" an even better project. There's not a song that can be skipped.

"When you change your name to 'Legend,' you've got something to live up to," says Joyner. "He put that pressure on himself because he wanted to do great things. He's shooting for the moon and even if he falls short, he's still way up there."

– Have thick skin.

Check.

A sound that doesn't fall in the cookie-cutter R&B/pop mold can get pooh-poohed (reference: Prince's 1981 "Controversy") by those mechanical ears programmed to only like what's familiar, until they realize how good different can be. For example, take Legend's song "Ordinary People," about the everyday emotion of love and how it falters, how it's hard to keep and hard to save, with Legend's soulful tenor and quiet passion on the piano telling the story.

– Win five Grammys before you turn 30.

Check.

Legend's hot singles from "Get Lifted," "Used to Love U" and "So High," received much love on pop and hip-hop, as well as R&B airwaves.

– Perform at the Democratic National Convention where one of the most historic presidential candidates accepted the nomination.

Check.

John Legend premiered his "rallying cry" song, "If You're Out There," on the opening night of the convention. He also performed in the "Yes We Can" video with other Barack Obama celebrity supporters including will.i.am, Scarlett Johansson, Common and Herbie Hancock. And who knows who will perform at Obama's inauguration ceremony?

– Keep your name out there.

Check.

The popular ABC show "Dancing With the Stars" last Tuesday featured Legend performing – singing, not competing as a dancer – during the musical extravaganza portion of the evening, along with the queen of legends, Aretha Franklin.

"Dancing With the Stars" is one of the top-rated shows in the nation with more than 16 million tuning in regularly.

Ohio native John Legend, whose birth name is John Stephens, showcased his talent in his albums "Get Lifted," "Once Again" and his most recent release, titled "Evolver."

New sounds from all genres

By Jim Abbott
The Orlando Sentinel

SCOTT WEILAND "Happy In Galoshes" (Soft Drive/New West)
3/5 stars

It's been 10 years since singer Scott Weiland released a solo album, "12 Bar Blues," a turbulent period that makes it enough of a miracle that Weiland survived, let alone make music.

Lowered expectations make it easier to appreciate "Happy in Galoshes." It's a long, fairly ambitious collection that ranges from boisterous, catchy rock songs in the high points to forgettable pop-flavored ditties in the low.

"Missing Cleveland" showcases the good stuff: It's a noisy rocker punctuated by slashes of distorted guitar and amplified by a chorus that's a densely packed wall of sound.

In the midst of the big arrangement, Weiland's voice still manages to assert itself. His raspy tenor is ragged but expressive, in kind of an Axl Rose way.

Happy isn't a pedal-to-the metal rock album. "Tangle With Your Mind" turns the opener's propulsive beat on its side for something that's a cross between country and pop. The presence of dulcimer and lap steel contribute mightily to the twang factor, but the slinky melody and "whoo! whoo!" backing voices add sass.

Although a solo project, Happy does feature at least one cameo: No Doubt's Adrian Young plays drums on "Paralysis," a track written by Young, Weiland, No Doubt's Tony Kanal and producer Doug Grean.

With so many people involved, one might think the result would be more transcendent than this mid-tempo slab of generic rock ballad. Ah well, it's impressive enough that Weiland is still around, remember?

It's really important to keep that in mind when Weiland gets to "Beautiful Day," in the album's home stretch.

No, it's not the U2 song, which sounds like the greatest rock song of all time compared with this long, utterly bloated opus.

Did I mention it was long? Technically, it's just over 5 minutes. When the psychedelic calliope sound-effects bleed into the next song, the 6-plus minutes of "Pictures & Computers (I'm Not Superman)," time unfolds as if in another dimension where seconds last for years.

Ah, well, it's amazing that Weiland is making music at all, right? So maybe it's too much to ask for him to make amazing music, too.

GUNS N' ROSES "Chinese Democracy" (Black Frog/Geffen)
3/5 stars

How is it possible not to be somewhat disappointed with an album 15 years in the making.

After all, its only rock 'n' roll as usual famous singer once told us, but in this case the long-awaited "Chinese Democracy" is only occasionally likable. Perhaps the Dr. Pepper folks didn't take it so much since the company had to make good on its offer of a free soda for everyone in America on Sunday, when the album managed to make its debut in 2008.

The music?

It's epic in scale, if not in content. The best part is the rockers that emphasize the guitar squalor and that signature Axl Rose scream, still plenty formidable. That voice is perhaps the most discernible link to the band's original DNA, which could hardly be expected to survive a boatload of personnel changes.

More than a dozen musicians contributed to the 14 tracks, including ex-Replacements bassist Tommy Stinson, Nine Inch Nails touring guitarist Robin Fincke and avant garde ax slinger Buckethead.

The opening title track introduces the band with a wash of moody, ambient sounds, more like a movie soundtrack than a rock record. Fortunately, there's a quick payoff when the scorching guitars strafe the landscape with sonic Napalm.

The guitars are also raw and powerful in "Shackler's Revenge," the first showcase for that signature Axl Rose screaming. When he pushes into the upper register, it's still with confident force atop the sea of soaring noise.

Alas, the ballads are less kind to Rose and the band.

Above a foundation of piano, "Street of Dreams" makes his overblown warbling sound like a parody when it aims to be moving. Likewise, the band throws way too many strings at the midtempo "There Was a Time" turning a stab at grandeur into bloated overkill.

In other moments, however, it all comes together. "Catcher in the Rye" is a 6-minute romp that turns the excess into something astounding. "IRS," with its slinky guitars, puts the band closer to a stripped-down rocker.

If Rose had managed to find such focus more often, "Chinese Democracy" might have been worth the wait. As it is, it's a blip, not a bang.

TRACE ADKINS "X" (Capitol Nashville)
3/5 stars

There's not much room for individuality in radio-friendly country music, but Trace Adkins still manages to separate himself from the pack.

On "X," it's his voice – resonant, slightly twangy that provides the personality behind songs such as "Sweet" and "I Can't Outrun You."

The former unfolds as a bluesy swagger, while the latter is a subdued piano ballad that's intimate without being sappy. There's a similar balance between the sentimental "All I Ask for Anymore" and the poppier "Let's Do That Again."

For mainstream country, this is good stuff.

MUDCRUTCH "Extended Play Live" (Warner Bros.)
3/5 stars

As much as I love Tom Petty and I do, his Mudcrutch debut album hasn't grown on me.

This live EP – featuring Petty and the other original members of his seminal Gainesville bar band including Heartbreakers Mike Campbell and Benmont Tench – delivers three of the album's songs and an oldie ("High School Confidential"). The music is merely a faithful reproduction, something for completists only.

Ricky Harris puts up a shot in UMass' home opener against Jacksonville State. The junior leads the team with 19.8 points per game.

out what it is we want out of this season."

Size isn't everything

There has been a lot of discussion concerning the Minutemen's lack of size in the frontcourt. Injuries to 7-foot-1 Luke Bonner and 6-foot-7 Matt Hill have left the Minutemen with only four players taller than 6-foot-7.

Despite being at a height disadvantage against nearly every team they have played, the Minutemen have out-rebounded their opponents 39.6-36.6. Much of this is due to the play of forward Tony Gaffney. Gaffney has averaged 13.2 rebound per game, including a career-best 19 against Memphis. His play has been a bright spot in an otherwise difficult start to the season.

"I wish there were 12 of [Gaffney] on the roster because he does everything you ask him to do," Kellogg said on Nov. 24 following the loss against Jacksonville State.

Harris, Chris Lowe and Anthony Gurley – the three starting guards for the Maroon and White – each average more than three boards per game, which minimizes the impact the team's lack of size has on the boards.

Gaffney also helps make up for the lack of the team's overall size by providing interior defense. UMass averages 6.8 blocks per game almost solely due to Gaffney, who accounts for 25 of the 34 shots UMass has blocked this season.

Ball security

Turnovers have been a major problem for the Minutemen all season, and are one of the biggest reasons for the team's 1-4 start. UMass has averaged 19.2 turnovers per game and forced 13.2 turnovers from opponents.

Point guard Lowe leads the team with 29 turnovers, but he is not the only player having trouble with ball security. No active player on the roster has a positive assist-to-turnover ratio.

A likely explanation for the turnover woes is the growing pains the team is going through trying to adjust to Kellogg's new dribble-drive offense. Players need to feel comfortable with their role in a scheme and the unfamiliarity can result in miscommunications, leading to turnovers.

Grabbing rebounds

total among all starting guards.

Benton is also a product of innovation as well. As the point guard, Benton has the ball constantly in her hands, and it is her job to find the open shooter or open lane to take her own shot. However, Benton has shown this season that she is more inclined to give up the ball, especially with a 3-point threat like Mosgrove on the floor, a role in which Benton thrived last season.

With both Benton and senior Sakera Young not providing a strong offensive threat at this point last season, Benton has the edge this year, averaging seven points per game, compared to Young's 5.3. This will need to change in order for UMass' new dribble-drive offense to work this season.

Senior guard Stefanie Gerardot has been the most consistent slasher for the Minutewomen. She is quick and has also been a defensive stalwart this season. Her 12 steals rank her just ahead of Wright's 11 for the team lead.

Gerardot's scrappy play is effective yet smart. While she leads the team in steals, she picks her opportunities well, fouling opposing players just five times this season.

Ball-Hawking a Success

The Minutewomen have a plus-1 rebound margin this season. Gerardot, Wright and sophomore forward Valerie Avebe all have double-digit offensive and defensive rebound totals. Yet there are numerous players who are tracking down defensive rebounds but transitioning their offensive productivity into scoring as well. Most notably, Mosgrove and redshirt sophomore guard Diatiema Hill have double-digit rebound totals but are dominant on the offensive side of the ball as well.

Hill has 17 defensive rebounds and nine points on the season, but the stat that is most eye-catching is her team-leading 22 assists. While her 10 steals make her primarily a defensive stopper, Hill's exceptional view of the court makes her a liability not only for opposing defenses but her open teammates as well.

UMass is not a shot-blocking team this year but it is edging opponents in rebounds (240-235) and steals (50-46). However, once they get their hands on the ball, the Minutewomen must learn to maintain possession.

The Maroon and White have recorded at least 20 turnovers in five of its first games of the season and each time the number of turnovers increased.

Many turnovers have come when nobody is guarding a particular Minutewoman and they often ruin fast-break opportunities. UMass is being outscored on the break this season by seven points.

Turnovers are hurting the Minutewomen, as opponents have scored 99 points off of miscues, compared to UMass' 95.

Having a strong handle on the ball is crucial to winning games. Committing fewer turnovers will leave more time for Dacko to teach her players more advanced plays.

They just need to learn the basics first.

Sakera Young has come off the bench to help UMass to a .500 record. The senior averages 5.3 points and 3.3 rebounds per game in just under 20 minutes per game.

Savard leading offense

the quarter mark of the season and the Bruins stand atop of the Eastern Conference, tied with the New York Rangers.

Coming off a 4-1 thrashing of the reigning Stanley Cup Champion Detroit Red Wings, the Bruins have established themselves not as a fluke team that happened to go on a nice run at the beginning of the year, but as one of the elite, young teams in the National Hockey League.

The Bruins are getting quality shifts from all four lines – getting their young players involved – and sport two of the league's best netminders, Tim Thomas and Manny Fernandez.

Marc Savard, who has been known as simply a one-dimensional player, has voided that assumption and become a key contributor on the both sides of the puck. Savard is tied for fifth in the NHL with 30 points and second in assists, with 22.

Phil Kessel had an up-and-down year last season, but after being benched numerous times by coach Claude Julien, the winger is first on the team with 13 goals and second on the team with 20 points. Kessel, known for his speed, finesse and quick hands, has taken after Savard and been seen contributing on both sides of the puck.

The Bruins boast young stars that have been a big reason for the team's surprising success. Blake Wheeler, David Krejci, Milan Lucic and Matt Hunwick have played vital parts for the Bruins and seemingly taken over as the fan favorites.

Wheeler, Krejci, Lucic and Hunwick (who has filled in after defenseman Andrew Ference went down with a broken tibia) have totaled 44 points and provide fans with a great sense of optimism that General Manager Peter Chiarelli is providing this Boston team with young, energized, tough players that can make an impact on this team.

Michael Ryder, one of the few off-season acquisitions the Bruins made, has brought an offensive spark that the team desperately needed this year. In the team's last two games Ryder has scored four points (two goals, two assists) and looms as another presence in front of the net.

At this early point in the year, one can't help but get excited to see what it is exactly that this team can do. They have all ready had two landmark games, Nov. 1 against Dallas and Nov. 19 against Buffalo.

Against the Stars, the two teams tallied 146 penalty minutes and displayed great camaraderie by sticking up for their teammates (if you haven't seen it on YouTube, you should). The game against the Sabres showed the Bruins' resilience as they overcame two separate deficits before winning 7-4.

Despite what happens this season, the Bruins are definitely a team of the future, with even more solid young players in the farm system. But for now I'll sit back, and watch this team inspire me with another reason to believe.

CAA advances 4-of-5 teams

Maine only loss in first round

By Kyle Pharo
Collegian Staff

With six Colonial Athletic Association teams finishing the season in the top 25 of the Football Championship Subdivision, it wasn't a big surprise that five of the teams made the I-CA playoffs. The CAA conference also proved its quality of teams by notching a 4-1 record in the first round.

CAA Football

JMU 38, Wofford 35

With the top ranking and an 8-0 conference record, James Madison will advance as it held off Wofford's second-half surge. At the end of the second half, the typically dominant No. 1 Dukes led 28-14. But by keeping possession for over two-thirds of the third quarter, Wofford scored two unanswered touchdowns and evened the score.

With James Madison reclaiming dominance in the fourth quarter by putting up 10 points, No. 8 Wofford made a final attempt. The Terriers scored on a 12-yard run with just more than a minute left, but the Dukes finished off the game by recovering a Wofford onside kick.

Much of the game was kept on the ground, which was the trend for the James Madison offense for most of the season. The two teams combined for 644 rushing yards, with two players from each side garnering more than 100.

Villanova 55, Colgate 28

Villanova bowled over No. 16 Colgate in its first game of the postseason. Villanova made a quick presence on the field by returning the starting kickoff for a touchdown. Once the flood gates opened, the Wildcats couldn't be stopped.

Like JMU, No. 6 Villanova kept the ball out of the air, tallying 386 rushing yards and six rushing touchdowns. Villanova also made use of its chances with the ball by scoring on eight of its 12 possessions.

Villanova will now head into the quarterfinals this weekend against James Madison. The game is scheduled for Saturday at 3:30 p.m.

Rich. 38, E. Kentucky 10

Holding No. 21 Eastern Kentucky to 269 offensive yards, Richmond's defense kept solid like it had throughout the season. The Spiders led by a touchdown at the end of the second half, but it was Eastern Kentucky's only visit to the end zone.

No. 7 Richmond also took advantage of its defensive performance, with a big portion coming from Eric Ward. The quarterback led the Spider offense down the field, throwing for 245 yards and three touchdowns, including a 45-yarder in the first half.

Richmond travels to United time defending national champion Appalachian State next weekend. The Mountaineers have defeated two CAA teams in the national championship game – Massachusetts and Delaware – during their run.

N. Hamp. 29, S. Illinois 20

New Hampshire also came out on top this weekend as it defeated No. 9 Southern Illinois. The No. 10 Wildcat offense reached the end zone once this weekend, but kicker Tom Bishop picked up the slack. Bishop, kicking for 17 points, made five field goals to keep New Hampshire from falling behind. The UNH special teams also returned a blocked punt for a touchdown.

New Hampshire heads to Northern Iowa for its quarterfinal match on Saturday.

N. Iowa 40, Maine 15

Northern Iowa was again be too much for Maine to handle. It was the second time the teams met this season. Maine lost the first meeting, 46-3. The Black Bears put up more of a fight than the last match, but Maine was still outplayed.

The No. 4 UNI defense limited No. 20 Maine to 264 total offensive yards, including four interceptions. The Black Bear defense allowed for 422 yards and five touchdowns.

UMass coach Derek Kellogg has stressed the importance of playing all 40 minutes to his basketball team, but has yet to see results. The Minutemen have been outscored in the second half of the previous four games, all losses.

Minutemen struggle to finish second halves

Turnovers continue to be an issue as team adjusts to offense

BY SCOTT FELDMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Massachusetts men's basketball coach Derek Kellogg made clear his intentions after the Minutemen lost 75-74 to Jacksonville State on Nov. 24.

"Let's play intense basketball for 40 minutes, let's go out there and compete on every play and every possession," he said.

Men's Basketball

It is how UMass plays the final 20 minutes of its games that has Kellogg particularly worried. The Minutemen have been outscored in the second half in four straight games, all of which were losses.

Nov. 12 against Southern Illinois, the Minutemen (1-4) jumped out to an early 15-point lead and ended the half up 39-29. Yet the Saluki's won 80-73 and put away UMass with a 10-0 run in the final three minutes. UMass was outscored 52-34 in the second half.

In its game against No. 13 Memphis on Nov.17, UMass was able to keep it close and trailed by 33-25 at the half. In the second half they were outscored 47-33 in the 80-58 loss.

The loss in their home opener to Jacksonville State highlighted the Minutemen's problems to closing out games. Leading 74-69 with 30 seconds left, UMass allowed a 6-0 run in 22 seconds and lost 75-74. During that span, the Minutemen missed two free throws that could have sealed the game.

Last Saturday, in the Minutemen's 84-67 loss to Green Bay, they entered the half on top 39-37, but were dominated over the next 20 minutes and were outscored 47-28.

It's not just Kellogg who sees the problems in the second half. Shooting guard Ricky Harris echoed the sentiment following the loss to Green Bay.

"[Finishing games] has been our problem all season long," Harris said. "We come out in the first half and play really well and in the second half we just die. It just has to all come together and we have to figure

UMass getting help from underclassmen

Wright and Mosgrove key scorers for offense

BY MIKE GILLMEISTER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Patience leads to experience, and experience leads to results.

The Massachusetts women's basketball team is getting experience now, but the results have yet to be determined.

UMass coach Marnie Dacko is employing innovative strategies to ensure the success of her young team. Specifically, she runs the court with four guards and one forward as her starting lineup.

Women's Basketball

Sophomore Teya Wright handles the post for the Minutewomen (3-3) and since Dacko instructed her to focus more on rebounding, her fouling has gone down and her point totals are up. After six games, Wright averages 11 points and 7.7 rebounds per game.

Most recently, Wright scored a career-high 24 points and 13 rebounds against Colorado (2-2), when UMass played in the Coors Classic in Denver. The Minutewomen lost the championship game to Minnesota (6-1), who shot 40 percent from the field.

In that game, Wright had two points in 17 minutes because of foul trouble. However, the continuous scoring effort of the Patterson, N.J., native is the result of her off-season training.

When she isn't in early foul trouble, Wright has been good for at least 10 points a game for the Minutewomen.

But Wright isn't the only productive sophomore in the starting lineup. Six-foot guard Cerie Mosgrove averages just more than 10 points per game, most of which come from 3-point range. Mosgrove is statistically the best 3-point shooter on the team, shooting 45.2 percent from beyond the arc and shooting 40 percent overall.

Naturally a guard, Mosgrove is a presence down low, grabbing 18 rebounds on the season, an average of three per game. She has a good handle on the ball as well. Next to junior point guard Kim Benton's 11 turnovers, Mosgrove's 13 is the lowest

See W. BASKETBALL on page 8

Sophomore Teya Wright played an important role in UMass advancing to the finals of the Coors Classic. She leads the Minutewomen in rebounds per game at 7.7 and ranks second in points per game with 11.

Bruins giving fans new hope

Ryan Fleming

As a Boston Bruins fan, I'm used to disappointment, maybe not nearly the level the Red Sox fans have left, but nonetheless I've been crushed numerous times.

The last time the Bruins won the Stanley Cup was the 1971-72 season, getting help from arguably the best player to wear skates, Bobby Orr.

Though No. 4 had help, he was the primary reason for the team's success until he was duped into leaving at the end of the '76 season.

Since then the Bruins have tugged at the hearts of their fans, coming so close but leaving with nothing. They have made it to the playoffs 30 times since '72, reaching the finals five times and swept twice.

Like the Red Sox, the Bruins also have their rival: the Canadiens. The Bleu, Blanc et Rouge have dominated the Black and Gold over the years.

Recently the Bruins have ended a 12-game, regular season losing streak with a 6-1 rout on Nov. 13 at the TD Banknorth Garden then following that up with a 3-2 shootout victory at the Bell Centre on Nov. 22. Maybe after all these years of being dominated, thrown aside and battered by les Glorieux perhaps it's the Bruins' turn.

Despite losing in seven games in the Eastern Conference quarterfinals to Montreal the B's gave their fans a reason to believe – that things are finally turning around, battling back from a 2-0 hole. In a spirited Game 6, the Bruins and Canadiens traded scores, checks and verbal lacerations. The Bruins came out on top, 5-4, in easily the year's best game (I know, because I was there).

We're now just a few games past

See FLEMING on page 8

The Bruins have started off 16-4-4 and hold a six-point lead over the Canadiens in the Northeast Division.

Less thanks, more complaints

Eli Rosenswaike

After Thanksgiving weekend with my family, I'm really tired of giving thanks. So now I must take the time to complain about everything sports-related I can think of.

Why does the letter 'C' still appear in the BCS? And how many screw-ups will there need to be to finally see a playoff system? I don't even care much about college football and this still bothers me. Correcting this needs to be Barack Obama's first order of business.

Why do fans care so much about the Heisman Trophy? It's lame. Every year it goes to a quarterback, and every time that quarterback makes it to the NFL (see Chris Weinke, Eric Crouch, Troy Smith, Jason White, Danny Wuerffell, Gino Torretta, Andre Ware, etc.) they play like they belong in Pop Warner. If I were Sam Bradford, Colt McCoy or Graham Harrell I would begin a smear campaign against my own candidacy and refuse the reward if I won. It's a kiss of death.

Why did Plaxico Burress shoot himself in the leg and not Stephon Marbury?

Speaking of 'Starbury,' check out what he said to The New York Post in Monday's paper...

"When things got bad and then worse, guys like Quentin Richardson say, 'I don't consider him a teammate. He let his teammates out to dry.' He didn't care. I was his teammate when I was banished. They left me out for dead. It's like we're in a foxhole and I'm facing the other way. If I got shot in the head, at least you want to get shot by the enemy. I got shot in the head by my own guys in my foxhole. And they didn't even give me an honorable death."

Can we get this guy a muzzle? I'm so sick of prima donna athletes.

I love it when athletes speak their minds, but Charles Barkley had it right. Can LeBron James please shut his mouth and play for Cleveland until his contract runs out – and then ditch the Cavaliers for a higher-profile team? And while we're at it, can Amare Stoudemire stop complaining? Is 22 points, eight rebounds, an 11-7 record and 38 minutes per game not enough for you? Stop crying about Shaquille O'Neal playing a prominent role on the team you play on. How many championships has he won? How many have you won? Right, OK.

Why does the Chris Paul vs. Deron Williams argument still pop up? Are we serious? Chris Paul leads the NBA in assists and steals, and Paul averages 2.5 more rebounds per game and 10.5 more points per game. Oh and less turnovers per game and better free-throw percentage. Got an argument for Deron over Chris? I'd like to hear one.

Why is Matt Ryan so good? And how in the world is Roddy White leading the NFL in receiving yards?

Why aren't more people lauding the Detroit Lions for being THIS bad. Playing that terrible consistently every week is no small accomplishment.

Why will Plaxico Burress not see one second of jail time after being charged with two felony counts of felony possession of a weapon in the second degree? He SHOT HIMSELF in the leg at a club – it's not like there's a lack of evidence. Why do the privileged get the special treatment with the law?

Speaking of which, why hasn't O.J. Simpson found the real killer yet?

Why is the 3-point line and shot clock different between men's and women's college basketball? Not only that, but why do they have like five hours to shoot the ball? Do they really need that long? And do they really need to play with different sized basketballs?

Why is CC Sabathia taking so long to accept the $140 million offer from the New York Yankees? If he doesn't want it, I'll take it.

Now THAT would be something to be thankful for.

AEPi teams for local restoration

Henry L. Pope III thanks members of the Alpha Epsilon Pi fraternity for their collective work on Amherst's historic Strong House.

Amherst's Strong House (pictured) was the site for a major renovation that could have cost $50,000 without the help of community support and AEPi.

Fraternity's shoulder tapped to upgrade local landmark

BY DOMINIC POLI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Henry L. Pope III felt the brothers of the Alpha Epsilon Pi fraternity at the University of Massachusetts had been unfairly dealt a poor reputation.

Like a stereotypical fraternity, AEPi had been labeled as a group of lazy troublemakers and were looked at negatively by some Amherst residents. But Pope felt there was more to the Jewish fraternity than that and decided to ask the brothers for a favor.

The exterior of the Strong House of the Amherst Historical Society & Amherst History Museum hadn't been touched in at least three decades, and Pope, who does volunteer work as the museum's chair, offered to pay AEPi to help renovate it.

"I approached AEPi because I was neighbors with them [on Sunset Avenue in Amherst] and I came to befriend them," said Pope, who thought the project could be a chance for the fraternity to improve its image.

AEPi, who in the past had assisted Pope and his family with similar projects in and around his house, agreed to help.

"They really did a bang-up job," he said. "The guys really came through for us. They were very helpful."

Pope, also the founder and CEO of a marketing company called EOSI (electronic commerce solutions incorporated), said in an e-mail that the brothers showed up on time every morning and worked with little to no necessary oversight.

He said that Mike DeFord, the fraternity's project manager, helped him market the opportunity among the brothers and got recruits.

Every morning, DeFord, along with brothers Paul Bejgrowicz, Dan Olds and Steve Miller, brought a crew of workers to the site and began work at 9:00 a.m. Pope said they managed their own time, kept tabs on one another's whereabouts, cleaned up the site at the end of the day.

The project, close to two years over the last one was completed two weeks ago.

Ben Ilo, brothers of AEPi women's the only [illegible] members who pitched in Pope also received help from community members, corporate sponsors and local businesses such as Sherwin-Williams in Northampton, Atkins's Pizza and Subway on Amherst.

In his statement, Pope thanked specifically Brian Dwosnky, Barbara Valentine, Matt Murray, Charles Allmendinger, Vito Rocco, Lisa Murphy, Bill Kaufman, Ralph Tomkiewicz and Rosalie Bergstresser.

Microbe gets more funding

UM project attracts four grants

EMILY REYNOLDS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Department of Energy has given four research grants to local companies. Qteros, formerly SunEthanol, which will be building a plant in Springfield starting next year.

The company is based around "Q," a microbe found in the Quabbin Reservoir by University of Massachusetts microbiologist Thomas Warnick. Professor Susan Leschine, chief scientist and co-founder of the company, found the qualities of "Q" that may revolutionize energy.

Basically, "Q" will eat plant waste from cars that use ethanol and then will create more ethanol from the waste, making it a carbon-neutral source of energy.

Qteros has already made huge leaps in the [illegible] productivity by 11 times. According to their Web site, the expense of breaking down plant material has been reduced with a new process, called C-I-Complete Cellulase Cocktail, which makes it so that "Q" can multitask. A four-step process has been turned into a three-step process by making "Q" decompose the plant waste and convert it into ethanol at the same time.

Qteros is being recognized as a contributor to reaching the goals set by president-elect Obama of reducing dependence on foreign fossil fuels.

He plans to invest $150 billion into researching clean energy technology, a step toward the Congress-mandated goal of 16 billion gallons of advanced cellulosic biofuels by 2022.

Energy conservation helps UMass economy, shrinks campus' footprint

BY GARY TARANTINO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Four years ago, the University of Massachusetts adopted methods of energy conservation that have helped it save more than $5 million per year. These measures have also cut consumption of steam, electricity, and water, according to Joyce Hatch, vice chancellor for Administration and Finance.

In 2004, the administration borrowed money to finance a ten-year, $42.7 million energy services agreement with Johnson Controls, Inc., which conducted an energy assessment of facilities and recommended a range of energy conservation measures that were guaranteed to save the campus an average of almost $6.3 million annually.

A presentation conducted on Nov. 20 by Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance Joyce Hatch, Physical Plant Director Pat Daly, and Craig Ruberti of Environmental Health and Safety to the Faculty Senate conferred a number of campus efforts to promote sustainability and energy conservation.

A total of 53 projects were assembled, which included the installation of $2.6 million electrical generator at the Power Plant and a sewage filter to allow the campus to reuse wastewater. Some 117,000 light bulbs as well as lights/ballasts, toilets, and other plumbing fixtures were replaced throughout campus.

According to Pat Daly, the uses of aerial infrared scans were used to help locate leaking steam lines across the University's campus.

Due to the projects, the campus has reduced its consumption of steam by 24 percent, water by 43 percent and electricity by 9 percent since 2002 and, as a whole, the campus's carbon footprint has been reduced by about 23 percent, or about 38, 296 tons of greenhouse gases since 2004, said Hatch.

Projections predict that by next year, the campus carbon footprint reduction should reach 30 percent.

According to Daly, the improvements compiled by Johnson Controls were supposed to be completed in a year, but instead were completed in three years, which is why the guaranteed savings weren't noticed in the first three years of the program.

He said: "To their credit, Johnson stayed with the project."

Hatch said all campus buildings now have meters in order to measure its consumption levels and several revenue-based campus departments, such as Auxiliary Services, Dining Services and Housing and Residential Life, are being offered rebates if they can reduce their utility costs. Auxiliary Services has already cut usage by ten percent, said Daly.

Other utility improvements are still being researched, said Daly, which includes the installation of a 2-megawatt turbine and the possible use of a biomass boiler at the Central Heating Plant. Feasibility studies suggest the boiler, which has the ability to burn waste wood and could pay for itself in fewer than five years. Occupancy sensors, additional steam line replacements, maximizing temperature controls and the development of a biodiesel plant are also under consideration, said Daly.

Due to its conservation efforts, many of the new building projects across campus are close to meeting the silver level of the Leadership in Energy and Environmental Design standards set by the U.S. Green Building Council. The new proposed police station is expected to be the first campus construction to earn the silver level status.

"Eco-Representatives" mentfirst-year student residence halls are being used to promote student awareness of green activities on campus, Ruberti said. The Environmental Performance Advisory Committee is also planning to reach out to faculty and staff and work with the College of Natural Resources and the Environment and the College of Engineering to develop model incentive programs to promote conservation and sustainability.

Future uncertain for students with GM link

BY ANDY KROLL
UWIRE

Amanda Emery, a junior at the University of Michigan-Flint, was born and raised in a General Motors family.

Her parents both logged more than 30 years on the job for the automotive giant – her mother, Cathy, as a skilled welder in a Flint truck plant and her father, Gary, as a company electrician and supervisor.

Her uncle worked on the assembly line in a GM plant in Flint, and a cousin works on the assembly line at the same Flint factory.

Now retired from GM, Emery's parents live off their company retirement packages, which include thousands of dollars in monthly income and health insurance for them and their children, among other benefits.

"Basically, you're talking about people that are assured that they're getting their retirement money," she said. "They've worked for it for 30 years; they're thinking their money is safe."

But with GM burning through its cash reserves and teetering on the edge of bankruptcy, the Emery family is facing the possibility that GM veterans Cathy and Gary could soon lose most of their income.

That would leave 29-year-old Amanda, a journalism and photography double major at the University of Michigan, with the responsibility of helping support her family, assisting her mother to make payments for not only her own house but Amanda's grandfather's home in Kentucky and providing some form of health care for Amanda's aging parents. Her father would be able to pick up work somewhere, but her mother would not.

"Somebody would have to pick up the slack, and I'd have to figure something out," she said. "I would have to drop down from [studying] full-time to part-time because I'd have to work more – for sure."

With executives from the Big Three automakers rebuffed in their attempt to obtain critical rescue loans from the federal government, the crisis engulfing the American auto industry has deepened, and its effects can be felt throughout Michigan as more plants shut down and workers lose their jobs.

But hardly mentioned so far has been the impact on students. For them, the future looks increasingly uncertain with parents subject to layoffs, tuition assistance and scholarship programs getting cut and an already weakened workforce set to lose even more jobs should the auto industry falter even more.

More than a half-dozen students whose parents work for one of the Big Three said they feared for their parents' jobs as automakers continue to trim jobs to stay afloat.

For Dmitry Vodopyanov, 21, a senior at the University of Michigan-Ann Arbor, each week means another chance his father, a Chrysler engineer, could lose his job without any warning.

And what makes the situation even more uncertain, Vodopyanov added, is that his father relies almost entirely on the media to hear of the latest updates on Chrysler's future.

"He's always worried about it," Vodopyanov said. "And if he's stressed, then I'm stressed."

Looking to cut costs, the Big Three have thrown numerous company benefits on the chopping block this year. Among them are tuition assistance programs, which provide employees with money for continuing education classes and degrees.

At the end of October, Chrysler suspended its Tuition Assistance Program for active and laid-off unionized employees. General Motors announced around the same time that it was cancelling a similar program for salaried workers as of Jan. 1. And in June, Ford Motor Company announced that it was suspending its own tuition assistance program for salaried workers.

Each of the Big Three has also said it will suspended dependent scholarship programs, in which dependents of employees received scholarships to help pay tuition costs.

Jerry Glasco, the director of financial service and budget at UM-Flint, said just over 200 students at the university currently use GM scholarships to pay tuition and fees costs.

But with the GM suspending the program at the first of the year, Glasco said those students who rely on the scholarships to cover most, if not all, of their college expenses, could have trouble staying in school because they can't pay their tuition.

"If that program goes away it's certainly more difficult for those students to pursue their degrees."

And for students finishing up their degrees and aiming for a career in auto industry, they must contend with a drastically reduced workforce that could suffer further losses should any or all of the Big Three file for bankruptcy.

According to a recent report from the Center for Automotive Research in Ann Arbor, Mich., nearly three million auto industry-related jobs could be lost in a single year if the Big Three companies stopped all operations.

Jake Obradovich, 21, a senior at Kettering University in Flint, a science and technology school where students alternate between taking classes and working full-time jobs related to their degree, said that about a year ago, he was still considering the Big Three companies when he thinking about finding a job after graduation.

"Obviously, with the way things have gone in the past six to eight months, my desire to get a job with one of the Big Three has now really decreased," he said.

Ultimately, it's the day-to-day uncertainty, the mounting stress, that seems to weigh most on students – and especially those like Amanda Emery, who come from families with lifelong connections to the American auto industry.

Her cousin recently purchased a house, Emery said. But now, with the threat that he could lose his job for good, Emery said she's concerned for him having to make payments on the new house.

"It hits me directly with, you know, my mom and my dad and my family," she said. "I worry about the future. But even then, it's still, 'What am I going to change?'"

Mumbai terrorism reaches Harvard U.

BY LAURA G. MIRVISS
THE HARVARD CRIMSON

When the parents of Alisha Mashruwala '11 calmly called her from their Mumbai home to tell her that their city was under terrorist attack, Mashruwala could hear grenade fire in the background.

She turned on the news immediately, and what she heard she said was unreal.

"When I was talking to my mom, I could hear grenade bombs on the phone, and I just didn't know what to say," she said. "The first thing I did was hope that everyone in my family was safe."

As she later found out, her family and friends had several close calls. One family friend was at the Taj Mahal Hotel during the attack but managed to escape at 3 a.m., six hours after the attacks had begun. A family friend at the Oberoi Hotel pretended to be dead until she was told to escape from a back door.

"I cannot think what they were thinking while they were in there," she said.

Mashruwala's whole family lives in Mumbai, her home through the tenth grade. The bombed locations were places she and her family and friends visited on a daily basis, such as a local movie theater.

The attacks in Mumbai have claimed over 180 lives and left Harvard students and faculty with ties to the Indian commercial center searching for information on family members and grappling with the implications for their homeland.

A NEAR MISS

Ria S. Tobaccowala's grandfather was at the Oberoi Trident Hotel having drinks with friends at 7:30 p.m. on Wednesday, just hours before the terrorists came in.

"My family is from Mumbai, and my grandfather lives next door to the Oberoi hotel," Tobaccowala, '10, said. "So this has literally hit home for us."

She said her grandfather is fine but was shaken by the fact that he could have been caught in the carnage.

These attacks are particularly striking because of the targeting of westerners and higher Indian society, Tobaccowala said. "It's an interesting situation because the Taj and the Oberoi are where most of the foreigners go when they visit Mumbai," she said. "They are the best hotels, they show India at its finest. They are two of the places where Indian society goes to play."

Her parents had their wedding reception in the Taj Mahal Hotel.

"This is where my family is from, this is our home," she said. "For my mom and dad, their childhood memories are being blasted away."

CLOSE TO HOME

Mashruwala's parents ate dinner at the Taj Mahal Hotel the night before the attacks. They live just fifteen minutes from the Taj Mahal and Oberoi hotels, two of more than a dozen locations in Mumbai that came under fire last Wednesday.

"My parents were going to go to the movie theatre that got blown up that day and decided to stay home," she said. When she first heard about the locations of the bombings, Mashruwala said one of her first thoughts was, "Oh my god, these are places so many people I know could be there at that particular hour."

Though her parents did not witness any firings first hand, several of her friends were close enough to see the shootings.

Mashruwala said she called as many people as she could, but it was difficult to get in touch because phones were off or there was no service. She said she called her parents every half hour to make sure that they and everyone around them were fine.

The attacks lasted 60 hours, and, for the first two days, Mashruwala said, everyone was to stay inside. She said that even after the curfew was lifted and people were allowed to leave their homes, residents remained cautious – a contrast to previously indifferent attitudes to smaller-scale bombings.

"Bombay is a city where whatever happens, you get back on your feet, ready to go," she said, using the British name for the city. "Everyone was too scared to go anywhere."

Tobaccowala said she was saddened as well as frustrated by the attacks.

"What do these people want? What do they want from us and what do they want from the world?" she asked. "They wanted our attention, and they got it. Now what do they want?"

Tobaccowala, who is president of the South Asian Association, said that the group is in the process of discussing about what kind of response they will have. She said they will plan a vigil for this week on the steps of Memorial Church, and hope to co-sponsor the event with other groups like Harvard Hillel and the Interfaith Council.

She said that SAA has plans to connect the attacks in Mumbai with preexisting plans for passport to South Asia week, starting Dec. 6.

NEED TO COME TOGETHER

Professor Sugata Bose, a historian of South Asia, found out about the attacks while in his office on Wednesday and watched it unfold on television, but he said he learned more about what was going on from people in India. He said the American media coverage was superficial.

"There was much more depth in commentary from Indian channels and I wish I was able to hear more of that," he said.

Though he hails from Calcutta, Bose said he knows Mumbai quite well and last stayed at the Taj Mahal Hotel in July while doing work for Harvard.

Bose said his native country must face the challenge of responding to the attacks in a mature manner.

"While going after these groups responsible for this kind of awful, inhuman attack, we cannot get out of control. We have to deal with it peacefully," he said. "Innocent civilians in both India and Pakistan have been victims of this kind of terrorism. It is a common fate for ordinary people," he said. "We need to come together to fight this."

Bose said the university faces its own challenges in light of the events.

"I think that what Harvard should do as a premier university is to redouble its efforts to understand South Asia," he said. "We need to understand the roots of this crisis."

AEPi helps in project

Pope said it was a complete team effort.

Dworsky coordinated the supply and order of materials via Sherwin-Williams and borrowed from a relative a commercial pressure washer. Pope said Dworsky brought the device to the work site and spent several hours washing the buildings clapboards after AEPi had chemically treated and scraped off the paint.

Valentine delivered products to the site from her Northampton Sherwin-Williams store. She also assessed the condition of the commercial paint sprayer donated by another community member and consulted on the reconditioning of that unit prior to its use.

Murray approved the Sherwin-Williams corporate donation of primers, paints and supplies and also came to the site to assess the building's structural condition.

Alimonos and Ronca took care of the workers' food needs. Alimonos, of Athena's Pizza, provided the brothers with large pizzas, and Ronca, of Subway of Amherst, provided the workers with sandwiches.

Murphy, a friend of Pope's, borrowed a commercial grade air-less sprayer from his wife's relative, Rathbun, when AEPi was in dire need of one and the cost of a rental was too high.

Faulkingham loaned the project a ladder that the workers used to reach the highest points of the buildings. Pope, who said it is expensive to rent a ladder, said it helped workers in scraping, priming and painting in the spots that would have been impossible to reach otherwise.

Bruursema is a homeless man who Pope said would often work for donations by playing his flute on a bench in the gardens adjacent to the Strong House. One day, he walked over to the AEPi brothers and offered advice on the job.

Bruursema told Pope he was a woodworker by trade and had been employed in the Netherlands as a repairer of private and commercial boats. He also said that, most recently, he built handicap access ramps at Stavros, a grassroots organization that advocates for independent living. He said he is currently out of work because of several cracked ribs.

He loaned AEPi full use of his tools, which Pope estimated to be worth about $4,000.

With the help he received, Pope saved $37,000 on the project he expected to cost between $47,000 and $50,000.

The project came along so well that several Amherst residents walked into the building to see the progress and signed checks in donation. The Amherst Historical Society & Amherst History Museum, founded in 1744, runs entirely on donations.

"If it had not been for the very kind and exceptional support and dedication of our varied sponsors from amongst our community then this project would not have been able to start, much less finish," Pope said in his statement.

But Pope says he is especially thankful to the brothers of AEPi, who, he said, are now seen in a much better light.

"Folks are really, really liking AEPi," he said.

Smith College works toward green, carbon neutrality

SHALINI JAYARAMA
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Northampton — Smith College goes green after significantly cutting its carbon footprint in recent months.

The greener campus is not only due to on-campus student groups that have raised awareness and consciousness about environmental conservation but also to the work of the Environmental Sustainability Committee.

Dano Weisbord, the director of the Sustainability Committee, said the school began the process of reducing its carbon footprint by assessing the sources of its carbon emissions. Weisbord said the committee used an emissions calculator designed specifically for college campuses provided by Clean Air Cool Planet, an organization devoted to curbing global warming. The calculator used a series of Microsoft Excel spreadsheets into which data regarding heat, electricity and transportation expenditures were entered, and a final reading was determined.

Some five percent of the college's emissions come through the campus-wide transportation services, while the rest of the emissions are largely consequences of the campus's heating and cooling systems.

Smith's new co-generation plant contributed a great deal to the improvement of the college's carbon footprint. Before, heat and electricity were generated using separate sources of fuel. With the co-generation plant, the college uses energy resources to provide electricity and heat simultaneously. The co-generation plant has led to an emissions reduction between 20 and 30 percent.

"That's a huge, huge additional efficiency," said Weisbord. He added that the University of Massachusetts also has a co-generation plant coming.

Smith's goal is to reach carbon neutrality in the future. Carol T. Christ, Smith's president, has added Smith College to the American College and University Presidents Climate Commitment signatory list of 600 colleges, all of which have committed to reaching carbon neutrality.

The college does not yet have a date set for reaching the goal. Future endeavors include the completion of an inventory of green gases, which will be submitted to the Climate Commitment in January 2009. According to Weisbord, a climate action plan will discuss in detail how to go about working toward carbon neutrality, and deadlines for it. The plan is expected to be out next year.

"The really important thing is to start reducing now," said Weisbord. "[That will make] more difference now than if we do it all at once right before the deadline [to achieve carbon neutrality.]"

Obama and Mumbai

Brad DeFlumeri

By now, we have all seen the images of carnage and horror from Mumbai, India. At last count, close to 200 people laid dead, two luxury hotels sat partly in ruins, a Jewish Chabad House was the scene of a calculated massacre, and Mumbai, the nucleus of the nation's financial industry, chaotically attempted to pick up the pieces in the aftermath of the most recent terrorist attacks by Islamic extremists. Multiple reports indicated that the perpetrators' mission wasn't nearly as successful as they would have liked; 5,000 victims was the goal.

The immediate consequences of last week's bloodthirsty abomination, widely believed to have been perpetrated by Lashkar-e-Taiba, an Islamic terror group originating in Pakistan, are distressing and potentially calamitous. Principally among them: mounting tensions between the nuclear-armed nations of India and Pakistan; heightened fears over the inability of Pakistan's government to provide the U.S. with a reliable ally in fighting extremism on its western border with Afghanistan; and concerns that the attacks could destabilize significantly an Indian government, one month away from elections, whose lack of anti-terrorism preparedness was made absolutely and torturously clear.

After the resignation of India's home minister, who accepted "moral responsibility" for having not prevented the atrocities, The New York Times reported "The new home minister, Palaniappan Chidambaram, the former finance chief, briefly addressed reporters on Monday, promising to respond vigorously to the terrorist threat."

This is the threat to the very idea of India, the very soul of India, the India that we know, the India that we love – namely a secular, plural, tolerant and open society," he said. "I have no doubt in my mind that ultimately the idea of India will triumph." One can only hope.

The same malignant Islamic ideological forces that struck at the heart of our country on 9/11 declared war on India last week.

Peel away the immediate outrage, condemnations, and condolences and the events in India clearly herald an opportunity for President-elect Obama to take leadership on an issue – terrorism – that many felt was one of his weakest throughout the campaign season. Regardless of one's allegiance or lack thereof to the now president, what we have just witnessed allegedly from the Lashkar-e-Taiba must remind every American of a similar organized attack on our nation's soil seven years ago. The same malignant Islamic ideological forces that struck at the heart of our country on 9/11 declared war on India last week.

Unfamiliar with the group alleged to be responsible? The organization subscribes to Wahhabism, a form of Sunnism many attribute (now) linked to Osama bin-Laden. More disturbingly as Jonah Goldberg columnist William Kristol noted in Monday's New York Times: "The political arm of [Lashkar-e-Taiba] has conveniently published a pamphlet, "Why Are We Waging Jihad?," that lays out all kinds of reasons why the United States, Israel and India are 'existential enemies of Islam.' This isn't the fear-mongering opinion of a war-crazy neoconservative. Kristol was quoting from an article in the April 2005 issue of Current Trends in Islamist Ideology, written by Husain Haqqani, a respected journalist and the current Pakistani ambassador to the United States."

In order for the United States and its democratic allies across the world to emerge victorious in a fight against a barbaric enemy, patriotic citizens in these countries must rise up and firmly reject Islamic jihadist ideology and governments who are politically sympathetic to Islamic Jihad, and remain as diligent, resolute and vigilant as ever in an enduring fight against an enemy whose stated aim is the annihilation of the West and the terrorizing of non-Muslims across the world. The United States must do everything within its power to ensure its support for legitimate national governments that seek assistance in fighting terrorism.

Perhaps as importantly, peace-loving Muslims in nations as unstable as Sudan and as prosperous as India, home to roughly 150 million, must forcefully condemn the attacks in Mumbai.

The triumph of freedom and liberty over nihilistic terror masquerading as a political agenda is anything but assured. It is a battle that pits decency against depravity and the victorious side will be the one whose conviction of the rightness of its cause is most uncompromising. Our nation's resolve is stretched thin by a three-front war against fanaticism in the Middle East and demoralizing – perhaps even worsening – economic times. But our enemies – India's enemies – do not much care for our troubles. Given that the Dow Jones Industrial Index took historic losses in that the unemployment index crept steadily toward 10 percent only makes us more vulnerable, not more sympathetic, to the elemental forces that last week brought terror to southwest Asia.

Finding and killing terrorists, as well as drying up the swamps of political instability and religiously brainwashed fanaticism in which they breed, ought to be as important to the next administration as it was to the last.

President-elect Obama, vociferous in his criticism of the Bush administration's handling of a war against Islamic extremism, will soon have his chance to lead the civilized world's efforts in a fight that has largely shaped and will continue to shape the twenty-first century. Mumbai's massacre, a well-organized attack on one of our most strategically important democratic allies, reminded us once again what losing looks like.

Students in recession

Parisa Saranj

I imagine, if a real depression like the one America experienced in the 1920s happens, what good my journalism and women's studies degrees would be for me.

If I am working for a TV station or a newspaper, will people be able to afford any them? Or, if I am utilizing my studies of women, will anyone be interested in knowing how 'depression' is affecting women or the question of gender?

I have even heard my professor jokingly question the value of education and I tried to picture myself as a retail business woman. But soon, the realities of numbers showing the rates of the stock market will wake me up from day dreaming.

Oh, what scary thoughts. At the same time, many who do admit the high expense of food, housing and tuition for students, wonder if these students are bothered with the economy and the current financial crisis at all. For some who witness the students finishing their grant money during the few beginning weeks of each semester, or going through more than half of their meal swipes in a month, the lack of concern among undergrads is concerning.

A recent survey commissioned by recruitment agency Reed reveals that over half of graduates are "concerned" with finding a job. This is while job security has become a major concern. One in four graduates says he or she would be willing to sacrifice up to 5 percent of their income in exchange for job security for three years. Hence, the experts come up with all sorts of advices for students.

At the same time, many ... wonder if students are bothered with the economy and the current financial crisis at all.

Reed's marketing head, Mark Rhodes, advises that university studies must be taken seriously by the students. "It's important that incoming university students have an eye on their future," he said.

Rhodes especially warns students not to postpone their job-hunting for the later years of their undergraduate schooling.

He then adds: "If you are trying to get on to a graduate program for the year you graduate, you may have to start looking at these at the start of your third year to avoid missing the deadlines."

At the same time, one thing that I have felt the lack of at the University of Massachusetts is a connection between students and university counselors. I have personally witnessed classmates and friends who struggle to pick classes or make decisions for their after graduation years simply for not having an academic adviser.

Also, a recently graduated student, quoted in an article by Michael Simpson from the Guardian, advises students to get some relevant work experience. For some like him, being able to demonstrate how he has experience in his field of study is a nightmare. To prove his point, just take a look at the current state of many UMass graduates. Then, try to look up the companies and organizations they once worked or interned for. I am fearful to say that I have met many seniors who are celebrating their departure, but have not done an internship.

A survey conducted by the National Union of Students concludes that many students are unaware of even the basic costs of living, and don't have the information and guidance they need to manage their own finances. This would turn into an ugly scene if we students keep take out loans and not acknowledge our money problems while being at school. My advice, which is coming from a person who is very bad with money, is to consult those who have been here and done this before.

Finally, an interesting piece of advice which sounds somewhat naïve, but very true – and I wish all the smokers would listen, too – is simply about quitting.

According to Forbes.com – which searched the price of cigarettes and frequency of smoking for the 50 states and the District of Columbia – in most states, quitting smoking would save more than $300 per year just on the cost of cigarettes. The Web site adds that those savings don't include the myriad other costs nonsmokers are spared: steep dry-cleaning bills, big health care costs and higher life insurance premiums among them. Though this advice may not be too effective, the reason the Web site suggest it is more about the taxation.

"State cigarette taxes could be on the rise," writes Francesca Levy for Forbes.com, adding that history has shown how the state governments often turn to these tax hikes when economic times are tough."

Now that we are all fed up with advices and the scary looking future of economy in our society is shaking us, I must end with a quick note which I hope sums up all that have been said: don't forget that opportunities are still out there. If you really want to succeed, find those opportunities and really demonstrate how you are the best candidate for them.

Once again, the same old intolerance

Steven Hoeschele

Fifty years ago, Virginia police kicked down the door of a newlywed couple while they lay in bed together. The panicked husband, Richard Loving, pointed to their marriage certificate displayed on the wall. That was evidence enough to try them as felons under the state's law against interracial marriage. Richard and his wife, Mildred, had been married in Washington, DC, where it was legal.

The Lovings pleaded guilty.

The trial judge, Leon Bazile, told the Lovings he would lock them up for one year unless the they left the state and did not return to Virginia as a couple for 25 years.

He wrote in his opinion, "Almighty God created the races white, black, yellow, malay and red, and he placed them on separate continents. And, but for the interference with his arrangement, there would be no cause for such marriage. The fact that he separated the races shows that he did not intend for the races to mix."

This mentality will shock most readers now as exceptionally irrational, both for its complete inanity toward race, as well as this activist judge's mixing of religion and jurisprudence. It is the same irrationality toward biology and reliance on religious arguments that pervade the debate around gay marriage today.

But look: there's an acceptable way to have a discourse around this issue, and it's not with hate or loaded terms or exploiting people's otherwise good religious intentions.

I stress this extremely important point because the way we talk about key issues often informs the actions we take on them. Some commentators might mockingly invert the intent of Proposition 8 commercials about homes broken into, Gestapo-style. But we cannot forget that sometimes doors really are kicked in, just like the Lovings' – and just like the arrests that led to the repeal of Texas' anti-sodomy laws.

Some people think it prudent to kill, rape, maim or set on fire other people, simply for their sexual preferences, and these perpetrators are enabled by rhetorical cheerleaders of fear and hate.

The words we use have power. And unfortunately, religious scripture has provided the greatest source of anti-gay rhetoric. This is not to say that the Bible dedicates large swaths of text to shooting down homosexuality. However, many ministers and laity have taken a few phrases out of context and emphasized them out of gross proportion to the other messages in the Bible.

It is the same irrationality toward biology and reliance on religious arguments that pervade the debate around gay marriage today.

Just as activists misinterpreted the Bible to prop up slavery and later to keep the races separate, it is being employed today against marriage equality. Each of those eras, they've come out on the losing side of the law and made their religions look even worse in the court of public opinion.

But our matter at hand is one of lawmaking, not ecclesiastical doctrine. And banning certain segments of the population from anything, especially in the case of marriage bans like Proposition 8 and the actions we take on them. Men and women are equal before the law, just as all citizens are equal, regardless of color. As such, any person may be married to any other. It's as simple as that. So it's perplexing that Constitutional scholars like President-elect Obama can't recognize the Constitution's simplicity on this issue. It was clear enough to the Warren Court in their 9-0 decision that overturned interracial marriage bans in 1967.

This important part of our founding document is why the trajectory set for marriage equality will eventually place gay rights activists on the winning side of history. Because the Constitution is so clear on this issue, the anti- side would have to strip the fourteenth amendment (and all the racial protections that come with it), admitting that opposing gay marriage is opposing civil rights.

And if the anti-gay crowd thinks that civil rights are worth making light of, they should consider the prospects of cops kicking down their own door while engaging in premarital, heterosexual sex – not long ago punishable under law. No certificate on your wall could save you, just as theirs didn't save the Lovings. (And how sad that Mildred and Richard felt they needed to display their proof of marriage so prominently, for fear of the authorities?)

Still, the marriage debate will rage for the rest of this generation. The debate is as alive and tangible as these sheets of newsprint, to be saved in perpetuity. And just like Judge Bazile, our names and words will remain on record as either for or against marriage.

So in 50 years, as most of us are retiring and the nation's youth skeptically view us as obsolete, they will point to some of the hateful rhetoric surrounding the great civil rights debate of this era.

I expect that much of what they read will shock readers as exceptionally irrational.

An American holiday season

Matt Kushi

Now that Thanksgiving is over, we are officially in the holiday season. The holiday season has a special meaning. It means more than receiving gifts. It means more than giving gifts. It means more than merely showing someone that you care. It is about giving thanks to those that support you and it opens our eyes to what we can do to enrich the lives of others. The holiday season is the one time of year where we self-consciously see that we are a country of moralists in the fact that we are so thankful of others.

While it is sad that for some people this epiphany occurs to some people only once a year, it occurs to many people throughout the whole year. The whole idea behind the moral of this season is the act of valuing life; for appreciating people for being there. Likewise, in the total of the acts that we do, we show that we care about others as well.

The concept of valuing someone else's life is a noble act that nearly all of us engage in from day to day. Caring about yourself and caring about others is one of the greatest things that you can do with your life. When you think about it, that is what the holiday season is really all about. What it comes down to is how much we care for fellow human beings.

We see these great deeds in motion everyday, whether it be one person complimenting another or whether it be a person lending a stranger a helping hand.

The holiday season is the one time of year where we self-consciously see that we are a country of moralists.

While we have the chance to, we should also be thanking the soldiers who are fighting overseas. While we tend to think of war in a broad spectrum, some of the individual acts of courage that these brave men and women display to save each other and their country cannot be described in words.

We should be thanking members of our infrastructure as well. That unknown firefighter who risked his life to save another from a burning home encompasses the spirit of caring for others.

We should be thanking our friends and family for being there for us. We should be thanking teachers and mentors that have helped to shape our lives into what it is now. We should be thankful for growing up in a free Nation that was based on dreamers and moralists.

The thing that makes the United States of America a special place is that we are idealists. We are the "land of the free and the home of the brave." Furthermore, we are a country of moralists. Many of the great leaders, from presidents to members of Congress, in the United States have been moralists. It is our Declaration of Independence that states that "all men are created equal."

If one looks back at history, they will find that many of the great leaders in the world have been moralists. To quote Senator Edward Kennedy eulogizing his assassinated brother, Presidential candidate Senator Robert F. Kennedy, in 1968, he "saw wrong and tried to right it, saw suffering and tried to heal it, saw war and tried to stop it."

This quote can be applied to many great leaders in this world. These are the ideals that they stood for. These are the ideals and morals that we stand for as well. Not just our leaders but each one of us.

There is a saying that goes: "I would rather die for something than to live for nothing." If you follow your heart in life and fight for what you believe in, you will have lived by this code. Do not be afraid to fight for what you believe is right. Don't be afraid to tackle the unknown. Don't be afraid to stand up and say, "I am."

You see, in the end it does not matter what is popular. What matters is what is right. Standing up and being a decent human being may not always be the popular thing but it is guaranteed to be the right thing, no matter how small the deed.

This fight for human morals is always an ongoing cause. As Nelson Mandela once said, "After climbing a great hill, one only finds that there are many more hills to climb."

So while we celebrate the joys of the holiday season, remember that this idea of giving thanks to those that mean something to you is not a once a year thing. It is something that our country was based on and something that we should do all of the time. While many people already do this, there is always more room available on those hills that Nelson Mandela speaks of.

Gaming industry hits all right buttons

Videogame world sees opportunity in otherwise troubled economy

By Victor Godinez
The Dallas Morning News

DALLAS – Bailouts, bankruptcies, liquidations and layoffs have been the business buzzwords over the last few months, but the videogame industry remains stubbornly resistant to the gloom enveloping the rest of the economy.

While game industry executives and analysts aren't ignoring the broader economic trends, all the evidence seems to point to a robust holiday season for game makers and sellers and continued prosperity next year.

Part of the explanation for videogames' continuing popularity, game insiders say, is the "nesting" effect, in which rash-strapped consumers stop going out and look for ways to entertain themselves at home.

"Clearly, interactive entertainment is a great value in a down economy," said Dan DeMatteo, chief executive at Grapevine, Texas-based GameStop Corp., the largest standalone game retailer in the world.

The numbers seem to bear that out.

In October, videogame sales jumped 18 percent, according to market research firm NPD Group.

November has been solid, too, as GameStop said in its quarterly earnings conference call this month that initial signs for the fourth quarter are positive.

There are other signs that games remain as popular and lucrative as ever.

Blizzard Entertainment Inc. said that Wrath of the Lich King, the latest expansion for its popular World of Warcraft online game, sold more than 2.8 million copies in the first 24 hours after it was released on Nov. 13.

Blizzard said the sales avalanche made Lich King the fastest-selling PC game of all time.

Microsoft Corp. has also done blockbuster business in the last few weeks.

The shooting game Gears of War 2 for Microsoft's Xbox 360 console went on sale on Friday, Nov. 7, and sold more than 2 million copies over the weekend.

Generally, any game that sells more than 1 million copies is considered a big success.

And almost anything sold by Nintendo Co. remains a hot commodity, especially the new Wii Fit exercise game for the Wii console, with GameStop and other retailers reporting essentially instant sellouts as copies hit shelves.

That's not to say the game industry is ignoring the trends in other industries.

"We have some concerns about the short term," DeMatteo said, noting that GameStop has frozen hiring at its corporate offices. "We're watching expenses as anybody would prudently do."

Arvind Bhatia, a game industry analyst in Dallas with Sterne Agee, said it's unrealistic to assume that games will be completely unscathed by the broader economy.

"I think we're going to see relative outperformance (compared with the rest of the economy), but I don't think the industry is immune," he said. "To think there will be zero impact is not right, in my opinion."

GameStop did lower slightly its projected earnings for the fourth quarter when it released the third quarter numbers and said it will open fewer stores next year, after opening more than 600 in 2008.

Electronic Arts Inc., one of the largest game publishers, reported a second-quarter loss of $110 million last month, much worse than the $195 million loss in the same period a year earlier.

Even so, EA did increase its sales to $894 million in the quarter from $640 million.

GameStop's DeMatteo said industry sales are forecast to grow 10 percent to 15 percent next year.

That's a best case scenario, he conceded.

But if people continue nesting next year, "we could have a best-case scenario," he said.

Some analysts think GameStop is much too conservative in its official outlook.

"The company's total sales growth guidance is pessimistic to the point of being ridiculous," Wedbush Morgan analyst Michael Pachter wrote in a report Nov. 21.

Pachter said he expects holiday software sales to be "robust" and said GameStop probably is equally confident internally.

"We believe that management is intent upon setting expectations that it can easily beat, and expect GameStop to do so."

Regardless of the specific numbers, DeMatteo is clearly bullish on the business.

"I think we're being prudently cautious given the environment we're in," he said. "But strategically, long range, do we believe videogames are a robust, growing industry? Absolutely. How could you come to any different conclusion?"

While most industries are seeing a downsize in sales due to a slow economy, the gaming market is having a steady increase in its sales.

CDs raise holiday cheer

By Jim Abbott
The Orlando Sentinel

It's time for turkey leftovers and a look at holiday CDs.

The dough is overkneaded in 2008, so let's see if any of the new stuff packs enough quirky charm to match my reigning all-time favorite, the classic Mambo Santa Mambo. As is the custom, releases will be awarded candy canes or lumps of coal.

Before we go silly, let's start with something beautiful. "This Christmas," by Aretha Franklin, showcases the Queen of Soul on an assortment of classics and pop-oriented stuff. Hymns such as "Angels We Have Heard on High" and "Hark! the Herald Angels Sing," benefit from Franklin's gospel treatment. Three candy canes.

In the quirky department, we have duets with dead Elvis! "Elvis Presley Christmas Duets" takes otherwise nostalgic tunes such as "Blue Christmas" and melds duet partners ranging from Martina McBride to members of Little Big Town. Ickiness factor? Off the scale. Three lumps of coal.

There's nothing like Elvis duets from the grave to make one appreciate Faith Hill's new holiday album "Joy to the World" is full of lushly arranged carols and traditional favorites such as "Holly Jolly Christmas." There are no surprises, which is good after the Elvis experience. Two candy canes.

Did someone say big? Genre-bending diva Sarah Brightman is typically super-sized on her first holiday album, "A Winter Symphony." Although there are enough strings on "Silent Night" to wake up the neighbors, these 12 songs are as lovely as they are large. Two candy canes.

When it comes to big production, the Jonas Brothers take a back seat to no one on "Joyful Kings," the group's medley of "Joy to the World" and "We Three Kings." It's the opening track on "All Wrapped Up," a teen-oriented disc, available exclusively at Target stores. There's plenty of pep, whether it's Miley Cyrus doing "Santa Claus is Comin' to Town" or the Plain White T's' "Christmas Won't be the Same Without You." Very likable. Two candy canes.

For an old guy, Tony Bennett still has pep. Maybe that's what happens when you're singing in front of the Count Basie Orchestra, still one of the most reliable swing units on the planet. On "A Swingin' Christmas," Bennett and the band live up to the title on "I'll Be Home for Christmas," "Silver Bells" and others. Enough to give that Mambo album a run for its money. Four candy canes.

It takes some moxie to inject original songs into the holiday mix, but R&B singer Ledisi does it with style on "It's Christmas." Her "Be There for Christmas" shimmies with the percolating beat of an old Motown hit. Even when she reinvents the traditional ("Children Go Where I Send Thee"), Ledisi has sass. Three candy canes.

Some reinvention is better left on the drawing board. So it is with "We Wish You a Metal Xmas and a Headbanging New Year," a 12-song collection featuring members of Queensryche, Dio, Dokken and other metal bands. On "Run Rudolph Run," even the usually cool Dave Grohl sounds ridiculous. Two lumps of coal.

For a more subtle blend of personalities, there's "Songs of Joy & Peace," by Yo-Yo Ma & Friends. The friends range from Diana Krall to James Taylor, who goes outside the holiday realm with his delicate take on "Here Comes the Sun." With intimate strings behind it, the song still sounds like a hymn. Three candy canes.

And, finally, what's more reliable than Ray Charles? His slinky version of "Rudolph, the Red-Nosed Reindeer" is among the 10 tracks on "A Jazz & Blues Christmas," a new compilation from Putumayo. There's also good stuff from B.B. King ("Christmas Celebration"), Charles Brown ("Santa's Blues") and others. There's lots of talk about the blues, but it doesn't stand a chance against this good stuff. Three candy canes.

Aretha Franklin's renditions of "Angels We Have Heard on High" and "Hark the Herald Angels Sing" showcase her authentic gospel roots.

NASA finds cluster of health hazards in outer space

By Faye Flam
The Philadelphia Inquirer

PHILADELPHIA – Space shuttle commander Christopher Ferguson and his crew took a small but crucial step for space travel in the past two weeks: enlarging the International Space Station so it can house six astronauts instead of three.

But a bigger leap is needed for humans to survive weightlessness, exotic forms of space radiation, and the loss of the earthly rhythms of light and dark, new scientists say.

In orbit about 200 miles from the ground, the space station pushes mankind just a baby step into the cosmos. Even going that far can put astronauts at an elevated risk of cataracts, bone loss and possibly heart problems.

A Mars mission would take at least six months each way, during which the crews would face unknown dangers – cancer, depression, dementia, cardiovascular disease, accidents associated with sleep deprivation and possibly premature aging.

The crew of the space shuttle Endeavour just completed its challenging 16-day mission, delivering what Ferguson called "the most jam-packed logistics module we have ever carried up there."

They added two bedrooms, a new refrigerator, a toilet, a water-recycling system and an exercise apparatus. Once the station starts housing more astronauts, as soon as mid-2009, NASA will finally have the manpower to begin doing controlled medical experiments.

In the meantime, the Bush administration's 2004 directive for manned moon and Mars missions has channeled money to ground-based scientists to better understand the risks of space travel. "The uncertainty is the real problem," said Frank Cucinotta, chief scientist for NASA's Space Radiation Program.

The International Space Station now houses six astronauts.

Astronauts may be willing to face, say, a 3 percent risk of fatal cancer, but would they accept a 50 percent risk?

It first became clear that NASA had a problem back in the 1970s, when astronauts started spending weeks at a time aboard the space station known as Skylab. Upon return, many suffered atrophied muscles, thinned bones and weakened hearts.

Less well-understood is the danger of space radiation. The space shuttle and International Space Station are still somewhat protected by Earth's magnetic field. Farther out, astronauts are bombarded with particles from the sun and deep space.

Scientists believe this radiation explains why astronauts suffer a disproportionate number of cataracts – more than they would have expected from the radiation doses these astronauts were exposed to.

Jonathan Clark, a former flight surgeon for NASA, said that three astronauts in the U.S. program needed lens implants.

The radiation that comes from the sun can lash out dramatically during solar flares, making the risks to astronauts difficult to predict. To better understand the problem, NASA awarded a $10 million grant to the University of Pennsylvania in October.

Radiation biology professor Ann Kennedy said she and her team would expose cells and mice to radiation from several facilities, including a proton source at Penn.

Astronauts going beyond the Earth's magnetic field are also steadily pelted with more exotic radiation from deep space – nuclei of iron and other heavy elements that pass through walls and space suits and tear up DNA.

"These (particles) are the bigger problem because they're the most different from anything we experience on Earth," said NASA's Cucinotta. The solar flares can be compared to atomic-bomb exposures, but the deep-space radiation has no such precedent.

So Cucinotta and other scientists are taking advantage of a particle accelerator at Long Island's Brookhaven National Laboratory.

Using heavy nuclei created there, Cucinotta has discovered that this type of radiation can damage microscopic structures called telomeres. These cap the ends of the chromosomes, keeping them from fraying, similar to the end pieces on shoelaces.

Telomeres appear to shorten as animals grow older, and the speed of that shortening has been linked to maladies of aging. So it's possible that long stays on the moon or Mars will make astronauts get old before their time.

Cucinotta said some researchers were investigating drugs that would stave off this process by encouraging radiation-damaged cells to die off rather than propagate.

NASA doctors and biologists say the biggest hazard, next to radiation, is sleep deprivation. Some astronauts sleep well in space, but many get significantly less than their normal amount, said George Brainard, a professor in Thomas Jefferson University's neurology department.

In space, astronauts can suffer an extreme version of jet lag. Those on the International Space Station see a new day every 90 minutes. On the moon, they'd see 14 days of light followed by 14 days of darkness.

"That would provide a profound change in the normal stimulation of the circadian system," Brainard said. Chronic sleep deprivation can hurt an astronaut's hand-eye coordination, cognitive abilities and judgment.

And a little-known fact: Nearly half of all the medications astronauts take to space are sleep aids, said Brainard, and they carry a litany of possible side effects.

A few years ago, Brainard and his colleagues at Jefferson got NASA's attention by discovering that the eye contains not only rods and cones but also a third type of light-sensitive cell, located in a different part of the retina.

These cells don't help us see, said Brainard, but use light to regulate the hormone melatonin, which in turn regulates our sleep-wake cycles.

In his laboratory at Jefferson, Brainard has found that the shorter wavelengths of visible light – those near the blue-end of the spectrum – are more effective at stimulating these sleep-related receptors and regulating melatonin. So perhaps tweaking the wavelength of light could help astronauts adjust.

While not all astronauts have sleep problems, they all lose bone and muscle given enough time in weightlessness. That could put astronauts arriving on Mars at risk of breaking bones or suffering other serious injuries.

Muscles atrophy and bones thin in space because they need a certain amount of stress to regenerate. Exercise seems to help mitigate the damage some.

In one study just getting under way, volunteers will lie in bed for 90 days at a time to simulate the wasting effects of a long flight, some of them using exercise to try to regain their losses.

Experience on the Russian and International space stations has shown that without any artificial gravity, astronauts need to exercise several hours a day to keep from deteriorating. Experts say that when cosmonaut and physician Valeriy Polyakov made his record-breaking 437 day stay on MIR, he devised his own grueling regimen.

Flight surgeon and researcher Yvonne Cagle of the Johnson Space Flight Center said that the Russians use an even more rigorous exercise program than the Americans, and that astronaut Shannon Lucid adopted the Russian regimen when, at 53, she lived on MIR for 183 days. After her mission, she managed to regain all the bone she had lost, said Cagle.

Ronson opens closet to JCPenney

High fashion designer Charlotte Ronson will release a low-budget clothing line for JCPenney department stores named I "Heart" Ronson, which is set to debut in February 2009. Ronson gives shoppers fashionable and affordable pieces, ranging from $15 from to $65.

By Julie Holbrook
Collegian Correspondent

Want that designer brand look without making a huge dent in your bank account? You're in luck! High end fashion designer Charlotte Ronson is releasing a line called I "Heart" Ronson for JC Penney, set to debut in February 2009.

The London-born designer made her first mark on the fashion scene in 2000 when she released her first collection, entitled "C.Ronson."

Her work has been described as laid-back with a rocker edge, including tees reminiscent of the 70s, her own style of wedge heels, and novelty lingerie pieces which she called "tooshies." She slowly became known for her trend-setting style and aesthetic.

Ronson received even more recognition when she opened her own boutique in New York's trendy NoLita neighborhood. Her store allowed her to gain a specific audience and clientele.

Three years later, Ronson teamed up with popular Japanese clothing company Sanei International. With the help of Sanei, Ronson opened fourteen boutiques around Japan. This merger transformed her into a favorite of the fashion world.

Slowly, she began to expand globally to Europe and the U.S. With this expansion, Ronson also gave her style a more sophisticated look – going from casual tees, to more elegant sportswear.

With a change in style came a change in the name and "C. Ronson" merged into the more mature "Charlotte Ronson." In her line, Ronson takes the style of today's modern women, and throws in a vintage flair.

Ronson's designs can be found in high-end department stores, such as Bloomingdales, Nordstrom, Neiman Marcus and Saks Fifth Avenue. These places aren't usually in the budget for most people, so Ronson has decided to design a line specifically for JCPenney stores.

I "Heart" Ronson is set to debut just in time for the Spring 2009 season.

The line is targeted to women ages 21 to 39 – a sportswear collection that includes everything a girl could need including chic blouses, tees, jeans, jackets, skirts, dresses and knits. All of her pieces bear her signature feminine and vintage edge. Best of all, it will be much more affordable, with prices ranging from $15 tees to $65 jackets.

This line is perfect for everyday women to add a certain look to their signature style, and gaining wide acclaim for being fun and flirty, with Ronson's signature vintage twang.

Early photos of certain looks see loud prints such as stripes and florals, dressed with various bold colors.

Ronson uses a lot of purples, blues, pinks and blacks. She also shows an affinity for layers, dressing almost everything with a chic jacket – including shrunken and oversized blazers.

There are also great accessories – particularly belts with all of her looks. Overall, everything looks to have a casual yet chic and classy look.

I "Heart" Ronson is being used as a means for both Ronson and JC Penney to expand their audience. When the line is finally released, it will be showcased in closet form, giving shoppers the chance to go inside Charlotte Ronson's "wardrobe." This will be the first of many new types of displays for JCPenney.

When asked about her new line, Ronson responded: "I am delighted to create a new collection, I "Heart" Ronson for JC Penney. I see this as a great opportunity to open up my sense of fashion and style to a much wider audience. This is a tremendous opportunity to create a brand with appeal to a diverse customer base that I might not have been able to reach until now. I look forward to our launch with great anticipation."

Shoppers will be waiting with equal anticipation as collection's release date approaches.

Steals and deals: designer duds for less

Loehmann's sells bags such as this satchel for a fraction of the designer cost. It can be purchased for $39.99, compared to the high-end price of $175.

By Rebecca Babin
Collegian Staff

Let's face it. Between the economic crisis that most of us are trying to will away via blissful ignorance and the general leanness of the college budget, we cannot afford to traipse around campus in a $1400 Burberry Trench Coat or $500 Michael Kors boots.

As much as we would enjoy doing so, we have learned to accept it as a fact of life and envy those who can reach this fashion Mecca.

Well, no longer shall we sit at the wayside watching the more-fortunate enjoy the spoils of their designer shopping sprees.

In this instance our frugality can be beneficial. Why pay top dollar for designer duds when, with just a little more effort, you can scout out the deals?

To make it even easier for you comes a compilation unveiling some of the best online discount retailers the World Wide Web has to offer, not to mention some thrifty designer department stores.

The tools are here – now all you have to do is shop!

Designer Discount Department Stores

Loehmann's: This off-price department store is known for selling not only clothes but shoes, fragrances, and intimates for 30 to 60 percent less then normal department and specialty stores. With 67 locations, there is sure to be one close by where you can find designers like Donna Karen, Gucci, Dolce & Gabbana, and Calvin Klein, just to name a few. Fifty Loehmann's stores also have a men's department. Search for a store near you at www.loehmann's.com.

Century 21: Discount designer heaven gives the fashion-conscious the chance to shop luxury label clothes, shoes, handbags, accessories, and home fashions for unbeatable prices. With labels 40 to 70 percent off, you can only imagine the swarms of fashionistas that inhabit the department stores six locations in the tri-state area. Despite the chaos that often occurs on Saturday afternoons, the prices are worth the fight. "The Zagat Guide" rated Century 21 as the number one department store in New York, so whether you live five blocks away or you're down for a road trip, check out Century 21 and their store locations at www.c21stores.com.

Online Finds

Gilt.com: This online shopping "community" is much like a fortress that is nearly impossible to break into unless you know someone who is already a member. While this may seem discouraging, there is a way around their elitist "invite only" mentality. You can sneak your way in during special promotions, which are advertised in fashion magazines such as "InStyle," "Elle," and "Vogue." # The world wide web of DIY

By Ellie Rulon-Miller
Collegian Correspondent

The world of DIY, though often hard to connect with in the real world, is easily accessible on the internet in a number of different places.

Sharing ideas and projects with other like-minded people has never been easier, especially with new forums and communities popping up around every virtual corner.

It doesn't matter what type of DIY you're into, be it fashion, food, beauty – really anything at all.

On a personal level, it is difficult to come across people who are equally passionate about DIY fashion. You need, however, look no further than message boards. It is not uncommon to find posts from fellow bloggers, depicting interests similar to your own.

You may begin contributing to the thread yourself and exchange advice and tips with one another.

A few DIY sites really pave the way and solidify the interest of many DIY-seekers. There are places for sewers and crafters of all levels of skill and experience, and a few stand out above the rest as the undeniable superiors of the on-line DIY fashion revolution.

Threadbanger
www.threadbanger.com
Featured on the Rachael Ray show, this website is a haven for all things DIY, with a focus on fashion and beauty. Hosts Rob and Corinne release a new video every week with a feature of some sort, usually an interview with a designer or footage from a recent DIY-related trip they took, as well as a new tutorial. Each episode also has input from viewers and often features the work of a forum member. The forums are constantly buzzing with new tips, tricks, tutorials and photos of users' finished projects.

Etsy
www.etsy.com
Etsy is gaining popularity and credibility in the world of buying and selling handmade items. The site has tons of categories to choose from when shopping so it's easy to find exactly what you're looking for, from clothes and jewelry to art and furniture to books and music. What's even better are the prices, all of which are reasonable and some of which may shock you.

Instructables
www.instructables.com
Instructables is an amazing source for obscure DIY projects (such as the Apple computer-turned-backpack). It's full of tutorials with in-depth instructions and photos for every step in every project. The people from Threadbanger have an account here as well, where they post all of their tutorials again in non-video format. There are instructions for craft projects as well as hairstyles, costumes, and all-natural beauty products.

Craftster
www.craftster.com
This is one of the best craft forums out there. They cover fashion, beauty, cooking, needlework, paper crafts, and so many more it's not even funny. Like other forums, these consist of tutorials, tips, and finished projects, all from users.

T-Shirt Surgery
community.livejournal.com/t_shirt_surgery
This is a community within Livejournal where users post photos of their altered t-shirts. You'd be amazed at what these people can do with one or two simple t-shirts. A few regular posters never fail to impress with their unique designs and innovative take on a shirt. Some of these users even sell their items on Etsy and eBay.

This year for the holidays, several of these sites encourage you to take the Handmade Pledge. By signing up with your name and e-mail address, you pledge to give only handmade items as gifts during the holiday season. If you want to take the pledge and spread some homemade holiday cheer in the process, head on over to www.handmadepledge.org.

In spite of technology, live recordings flourish

U2's eight-song EP, "Under a Red Blood Sky," released in 1983, paved the way for some of the band's strongest live performances to date.

By Greg Kot
Chicago Tribune

It has served as a star-making vehicle for everyone from James Brown to Peter Frampton. It went through an unplugged phase that allowed listeners to glimpse their pop heroes in a more informal setting. It functioned as a souvenir for famous tours. It expediently finished off contracts with record labels.

Even now, in the era of instant YouTube videos and concert DVDs, the live album endures. The best of them serve not just the marketplace or artists' most committed I'll-buy-anything-they-put-out fan base, but pop history. The listener becomes a privileged voyeur, hearing (and, if there's an accompanying DVD, seeing) key artists at a critical time in their careers. Such is the case with Neil Young's "Sugar Mountain – Live at Canterbury House 1968" (Reprise), the Clash's "Live at Shea Stadium" (Sony BMG), U2's "Under a Blood Red Sky" (Island/Interscope), Mavis Staples' "Live: Hope at the Hideout" (Anti) and Cheap Trick's "Budokan!" (Epic Legacy).

"Budokan" is a throwback to the 1970s golden age of the live album, an era when artists such as Frampton, Bob Seger, Kiss, Bob Marley, the Allman Brothers Band, AC/DC, Earth Wind & Fire, Lynyrd Skynyrd and Lou Reed used live albums to showcase their best songs and break through to a bigger audience.

"Budokan" has been repackaged numerous times, more lavishly than ever as a boxed set containing three CDs and a DVD documenting the Rockford, Ill., quartet's career-changing 1978 performances at the Nippon Budokan in Tokyo. The saturation treatment is largely worth it – capturing a hungry band with great songs in peak form. The band members were already stars in Japan but virtually unknown in their home country. "Budokan" changed that, with definitive versions of the best songs from their first three studio albums.

Initially, the band's label had not intended to release the album in America, but the import began selling at adventurous FM rock-radio programmers played tracks from it, and it was finally released domestically in 1978. It wielded the group's first top-10 hit, "I Want You To Want Me." Comparing the live version of the track with its studio incarnation, from the 1977 "In Utero" album illustrates why Rick Nielsen's heavy guitar and Bun E. Carlos' drums pound the song's insults, vaudevillian exterior senseless, and Robin Zander's pleading vocal doesn't sound so lighthearted and carefree. Curiosity seekers intrigued by the single found a band that laced pop melodies with darkly shimmering lyrics and dive-bomber guitars, epitomized by the formidable "Surrender" and earth-shaking covers of Ray Davies' "California Man" and Fats Domino's "Ain't That a Shame."

Unlike many of the live albums from the era, "Budokan" was not heavily doctored in the studio afterward. Its modest intentions, right down to a $30,000 recording budget, ensured that it would preserve a moment in time, and what a moment it still is.

The same is true of Young's "Sugar Mountain – Live," among the singer-songwriter's first solo performances soon after he departed the band Buffalo Springfield. Young took his new songs out for an acoustic test run at two underpublicized shows in November 1968 at a folk club in Ann Arbor, Mich.

Most of Young's discursive stage patter isn't worth hearing more than once. But the "raps" are conveniently spliced out from the songs to allow for quick editing. The performances are revelatory: stripped-down versions of his Buffalo Springfield masterpieces "Expecting To Fly" and "Mr. Soul" and soon-to-be landmarks "The Loner," "The Old Laughing Lady" and the title song (which, remarkably, didn't surface on an album for nearly a decade).

As a glimpse of Young's art (and state of mind) at a pivotal moment in his development as an artist, "Sugar Mountain – Live" is invaluable.

In contrast, "At Shea Stadium" captures the Clash on the opposite end of its career. The band opened for the Who at a baseball stadium in 1982, its biggest gig. For most bands, that would represent a pinnacle achievement. But for members of the Clash, avatars of punk, it was a sign that they were about to become the bloated rock stars they once despised.

Indeed, the group plays with stolid competence, not the seething intensity of its best gigs. Joe Strummer alternately baits and jokes with the crowd ("We take 72,000 guinea pigs and put them in Shea Stadium") as the quartet cycles through a hits-heavy set. Topper Headon was recently ousted from the band, so original Clash drummer Terry Chimes takes his place, and he doesn't push the band nearly as hard as Headon once did.

Nor does the recording sound particularly "live." My dim-sounding bootlegs of this performance are a good deal rawer, which suggests that some post-production surgery was performed to spiff up the official release.

Within a few months, singer-guitarist Mick Jones would leave the group, and the Clash would muddle through one more studio album before breaking up for good. It wasn't a pretty ending, and "Shea Stadium" captures the moment when the descent began.

About the same time that Jones was exiting the Clash, U2 was busy conquering North America. When it was initially released as an eight-song EP, "Under a Blood Red Sky" was just a teaser between studio albums, but it had a major impact – capturing a great live band at a crucial time. The 1983 concert at the rain-soaked Red Rocks Amphitheatre outside Denver showcased the band's charisma and power, without some of the messianic excesses that would mar later arena shows. The reissue joins the original EP with its accompanying film, the better not only to see how badly Bono's hairstyle has aged, but to observe a young band that still had something to prove.

Mavis Staples has nothing left to prove. She's one of the great singers of the last half-century. Her 2007 studio album, "We'll Never Turn Back," updated her civil rights-era conviction. Then she hit the road with a terrific new band that brought a spooky grassity to her latest songs. That band is documented on "Hope at the Hideout," and Staples rides the groove and improvises over it. When all the instruments drop out save for a trebly guitar, and the singer pours out "Waiting for My Child" like an unanswered prayer, involuntary shivers run along the listener's spine.

Like all live albums, "Hope" is a snapshot of an artist at work.

And like the best live albums, it transcends its moment with a performance that demands to be heard again and again.

How to say 'I do' on a budget

By Jean Patteson
The Orlando Sentinel

Couples have been saying "I do" to lavish weddings since the turn of the millennium. But when the economy started losing its luster, they started backing away from the excesses of big-budget nuptials.

"It's definitely a national trend," says Sally Kilbridge, deputy editor at Brides magazine in New York. "People getting married don't live in bubbles. Everyone is going to be tightening their belts."

But less lavish doesn't have to mean less special, Kilbridge says.

"Instead of a caviar bar, which seems a little excessive now, a couple may have a mac-and-cheese bar, which is young and fun and saves a lot of money."

Or they may eliminate a course from a seated meal, saving on food, rentals and service. Or skip the fancy menu cards or favors.

The scaling-back started last spring, she says. "It's tied to the housing crisis and other rumblings of hard times ahead. People stopped saying, 'It's a once-in-a-lifetime event, let's go for it.' They stopped stretching their budgets beyond their comfort level."

Fortunately, she adds, because most weddings are planned many months in advance, "There's a lot of time to do the trimming, so it needn't be too painful."

Orlando-area wedding consultants also detect a move away from extravagant, celebrity-inspired weddings.

The financial crash "has changed the way people look at weddings," says Heather Stuteley of Weddings Unique in Winter Park. "They're retooling and rebudgeting."

For the most part, she says, "It's the parents who are devastated. They want to provide a wonderful day for their daughter. The couples are understanding. They care about their parents' retirement."

Even families who don't have financial woes are thinking carefully about how they are spending their money, says Susan Southerland of Just Marry! in Windermere, Fla. "But you can still have a dream wedding. You just need a reality check."

Her advice: "Start by trimming the guest list." Beyond that, "choosing priorities is key," she says.

Few brides can replicate extravagant celebrity weddings seen on TV and in style magazines, says Donnie Brown, a wedding planner featured on Style Network's "Whose Wedding Is It Anyway?" But the judicious use of LED lighting, inexpensive draperies and clusters of small flower arrangements can go a long way toward creating a fairytale-wedding atmosphere on a tight budget, he says.

Couples are finding other creative ways to cut costs but keep the magic. Snively offers a bride and groom who opted to hold their ceremony and reception in the same location, and swap a sit-down dinner for cocktails and dessert. Susie Weiss of Wonderful Weddings Orlando tells of a bride who organized an "assembly line" of family members over Thanksgiving to hand-craft elaborate menu cards for her upcoming nuptials.

In a similar vein, Sterling and Rachel Platts of Orlando threw an "assembling-the-invitations party" before their wedding last May.

"We had a ton of friends get together, and we ordered pizza, and it was so much fun," Rachel says.

The couple also scaled back on elaborate table decorations, served appetizers instead of a multicourse meal and skipped hiring a videographer. Still, "it was the best day ever," Rachel says.

So perhaps there is a silver lining to a less-lavish wedding, suggests Brides magazine's Kilbridge.

"It makes us remember why we're all here together. It's about the bride and groom. It's about love. It's not about stuff."

Find a Deal on a Dream Dress

The bride's dress is often the centerpiece of the wedding.

A confection of beaded silk, lace and tulle, the dress can cost thousands – but need not. Here are some money-saving suggestions:

Consider sales. Bridal manufacturers stock sample gowns, which brides try on before ordering their choice from the manufacturer. At the end of each season, the sample gowns are discounted, often by as much as 50 percent.

If always have samples for sale. I have about 300 styles right now. Most look as good as new," says Millie Harris, owner of The Collection, a Winter Park, Fla., bridal boutique.

Consignment stores: Wedding dresses can be found at some consignment stores. At Classic Consignment in Altamonte Springs, Fla., gowns are available in sizes ranging from 2 to 2X, priced from $99 to $599.

"They have to be in perfect condition and recent styles before we'll take them. Some have never been worn – the bride changed her mind or the wedding fell through," says owner Cheryl Wood, whose store has a separate bridal department with a large fitting area and full-length mirrors.

Outlets: Shop the outlet malls for bargain-priced wedding dresses or white evening gowns.

Extra embellishments: Choose a plain, inexpensive wedding dress from a store such as Target, J.Crew or Nicole Miller, and have a seamstress add lace or beading.

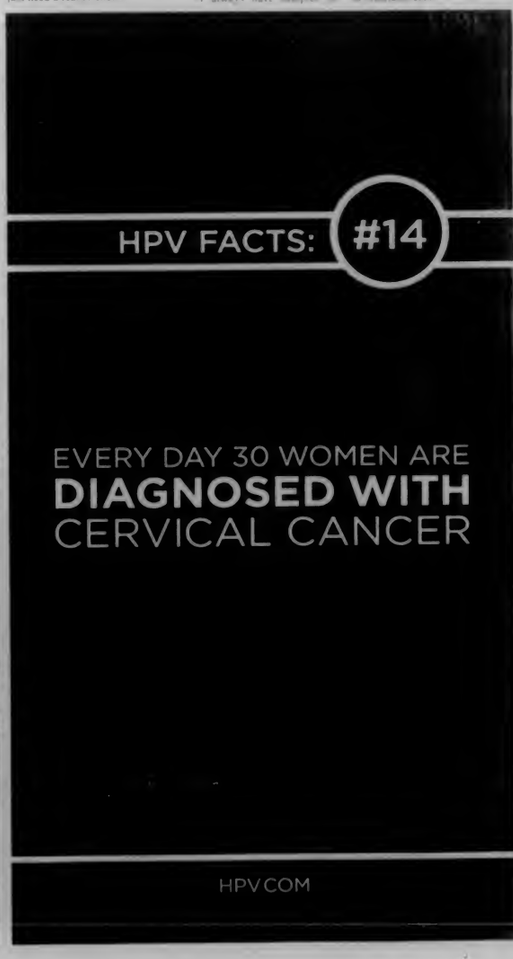
Simple dress, elaborate veil: Save money, but make a big impression, by teaming a simple, less-expensive gown with a fabulous veil and headpiece.

Always a bridesmaid: Find a bridesmaid's dress you love, then order it in white.

Picking a Planner

Enlisting a wedding planner will add to the cost of a wedding. But a good planner can help couples save money – and emotional stress.

"A wedding planner is the best expense ever," says Wanda Decker of Winter Springs, Fla., whose daughter, Jennifer Bennett, is getting married in April.



"Within 30 days of the engagement, I was totally stressed out. The day we signed our planner, it was like a weight went off our shoulders," she says.

The cost of a planner could range from $500 to $10,000 or more, depending on the size and complexity of the wedding. Some charge a percentage of the total wedding budget; others prefer an hourly rate or package rate.

However most offer a free initial consultation to help couples decide whether they need the planner's service.

To find a wedding planner, ask for referrals from friends or wedding vendors, or check with the Association of Bridal Consultants at bridalassn.com.

Thakoon for Target

BY EMMA LIFVERGREN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Despite the exhaustive shopping, the crowds and the freezing cold, there are always slew of things to look forward to every holiday season – gifts under the tree, spending time with family, and the first drifts of snow to name a few.

This year, there is something entirely different to anticipate: a collaboration between designer Thakoon Panichgul and Target for GO International, the chain's line of capsule collections for emerging designers.

Joining the ranks of Luella Bartley, Jonathan Saunders, Erin Fetherston and Proenza Schouler, Thakoon will be the fourteenth designer to create an affordable and limited edition line for GO International, slated to debut on December 28.

Nylonmag.com was one of the first Web sites to offer a sample glance at the upcoming collection last November, previewing eight looks.

Ranging in price from $16.99 to $44.99, the collection has a distinct resort feel, so don't expect to break out the line's tiny bikinis or mini skirts any time soon (although throwing on a pair of tights underneath a skirt or shorts would work nicely in the winter.)

An orange, lavender and black dress with a gathered spaghetti strap neckline is perfect as a beach or pool cover up, while a green, white, and navy dress with a graphic diagonal print and breezy silhouette is appropriate for a night out on the town.

The bathing suits are standard triangle tops and teeny bottoms, and the patterns and colors are reminiscent of Thakoon's spring 2008 collection, although there is a 90s feel to the entire line due to its clashing patterns and grunge-ish silhouettes.

A short, belted dress has an interesting white and blue geometric pattern, and a similar look shows up on a black and white tunic.

There are also striped tops and a button-down shirt, as well as a short, graphic printed canvas coat.

With its light fabrics in a bright color palette of yellows, greens, grays and florals, Thakoon's affordable line embraces the fun of summer and Target's cost efficient M.O. while maintaining the young designer's flair for bold patterns and textures.

"This collection for Target evokes a sense of bold confidence. I think, for these young girls, and I think it's about being adventurous and trying different sort of prints mixed together," said Panichgul in a statement about the new line.

A frock from Thakoon's line for Target.

Thakoon burst onto the fashion scene at the conclusion of this year's Democratic National Convention, when future first lady Michelle Obama sported a red and black "reverse kimono" dress from the label's pre-spring 2009 collection.

Born in Thailand and raised in Omaha, the 33-year-old designer released his first womenswear collection in 2004. His feminine shapes, striking patterns and no-fear attitude toward mixing them has made Thakoon a must-have for celebrities like Demi Moore and Sarah Jessica Parker.

In addition to Thakoon, Panichgul recently signed on to design a unique fall collection for Hogan. After a 2006 Council of Fashion Designers of America nomination, clothing distribution at Barney's, Harvey Nichols and thakoon.com, Panichgul can now add "mass market designer" to his list of achievements.

"Thakoon Panichgul is an extraordinary design talent with a keen eye whose brilliantly priced collection is sure to please our guests," said Target senior vice president Trish Adams in Target's statement.

Thakoon's collection for Target GO International will be available online and in stores through the month of January, so brave the cold and get it while it's hot!

Busted: what to do if you're sporting the wrong bra size

By Heidi Stevens
CHICAGO TRIBUNE

So let's just say, for argument's sake, you usually purchase your bras at a place that also sells cat litter and granola bars. And let's just say, that $12.99 usually strikes you as pretty fair for something with, let's face it, so little material. And let's just say you tend to wear those inexpensive somethings from that big-box discounter for, oh, eight or nine years before replacing them with pretty much the same model, same size, same color that you always wear.

Then one day, you have an epiphany. A "So This Is What All the Fuss Is About" moment. Maybe you finally get an actual fitting at an actual bra store and find out your actual size. And you spend $192 and walk out of the store with a bag so small your lunch would barely fit in it. And maybe you don't feel the least bit guilty about it.

Our staff fanned out across Chicago in search of the best bra-fitting experience. Turns out, it's worth spending a few extra minutes getting that fitting done. We learned a lot (check out our checklist), and while we may not be ready to swear off our discount-hunting ways, we do know what size to reach for next time we walk by the clearance rack.

If it doesn't fit, you must get fitted. Four staff members put their chests to the test at local lingerie stores. No one, it turned out, was wearing the right size.

INTIMACY OF CHICAGO

The tester: A 36C creature of habit who has been wearing the same, tired (wrong-size!) bras for close to a decade.

The staff: Very friendly and upbeat.

Also very busy. Our fitter was helping multiple customers at once, which made for some long, chilly waits in the dressing room.

The process: The store offers a "holistic" approach, so there's no actual measuring involved. You strip naked from the waist up, your fitter sizes you up visually and brings you a bunch of bras to test. She helps you put them on, adjust the straps, adjust your girls and then judge for yourself whether you like the look and the fit.

Price: Our fitter brought bras ranging from $34 to $98. Not a lot of pressure to make a purchase, but we defy you to walk away empty-handed after seeing yourself in some of these numbers (and then looking at the pathetic thing you wore into the store).

Oops: Went in wearing a 36C and left wearing a 32C or 34C, depending on the brand.

How long: 40 minutes, from check-in to register.

Appointment: Recommended. Can be made at myintimacy.com or by calling nearest location.

ISABELLA FINE LINGERIE

The tester: A 34B with a dresser drawer full of great-looking bras that never feel quite comfortable.

The staff: Very friendly and eager to assist.

The process: The store's roomy fitting rooms are thoughtfully positioned for privacy, up a few stairs in the back of the shop. Overhead heat lamps kept me cozy during the mostly topless process. The fitter asked what size I usually wear, looked at my current bra and asked immediately if the straps tend to slip down. Yes! Common problem with wearing a too-loose bra. She showed me how snugly the band should fit and how the cups should feel, and left me to try on about a dozen bras.

Price: The bras I tried ranged from $60-$90. No pressure at all to buy, but everything looked so luscious, especially under the warm lights. And the matching panties were a must.

Oops: Went in wearing a 34B or 36A and left wearing a 32B or 32C, depending on the style and brand.

How long: About 30 minutes.

Appointment: Walk-ins welcome.

NORDSTROM

The tester: A 34B who prefers sport bras.

The staff: Outgoing and fast. Every time I tried to check my BlackBerry in the fitting room she popped back in with more bras.

The process: The fitter wrapped a tape measure around my bare chest at the biggest point - 29 - and added two for 31. Since bras don't come in 31, she brought me a 32. I stood facing the mirror; she held up the bra so I could put my arms through the straps and fastened it from behind.

Price: The fitter brought bras ranging from $34 to $42. I wanted a bra without an underwire and bought two. She also persuaded me to buy one with an underwire.

Oops: Went in wearing a 34B and left wearing a 32C. I ended up returning two of the three bras – including the one with the wire – because they were uncomfortable.

How long: 20 minutes, from check-in to register.

Appointment: None required.

VICTORIA'S SECRET

The tester: A 38A who relies on a few boring and identical (except color) bras.

The staff: Friendly and helpful. My fitter remembered what I wanted, tried hard to find it and didn't push other items.

The process: The fitter measured me right on the sales floor, which, even with my clothes on, was a bit disconcerting. Then I was handed two boxes holding multiple bras (B-cups and A-cups, only because I insisted I was an A) to try on by myself – in the fitting room this time! If I had a question, I summoned her via a handy button on the wall. Though I'd been skeptical of the clothes-on measurement, she turned out to be right. Once we settled on the size, she concentrated on finding the style I wanted.

Price: Ranged from $20 to $48. I went home happy with a bra and matching thong for $50.

Oops: Bigger breasts in just one hour! My 38A is now a 36B – much easier to shop for.

How long: About 50 minutes from fitting to checkout. But you don't have to try on every bra in the box.

Appointment: Not needed. See victoriassecret.com for store locations.

SIZE ISN'T EVERYTHING

We learned a lot more than our true bra sizes during this process. Here are some tips from experts in the unmentionables field.

The bra band should fit snugly around your rib cage and provide most of your support. A properly fitting band will keep your straps from falling down and support your breast tissue.

Every time you go up a band size, the cup gets one size larger, so a 36B and a 34C are the exact same cup size.

"Back fat" issues are actually caused by a band that is too loose, allowing the bra to float to the flesher part of the back where it doesn't belong. If a bra feels too tight, try going up a cup size first.

If you must wash them in the machine, make sure your bras are clasped shut and enclosed in a netted bag to prevent stretched elastic and twisted underwires.

Never toss your bras in the dryer – the heat breaks down the elastic.

Rotate your bra selection to allow one day of rest for every day of wear. Wearing a bra too many times in a row will cause it to stretch and lose form, just like a pair of shoes.

Chris Lowe goes up for a layup against Syracuse in a NIT game last year. Lowe is one of the main contributors on the Minutemen posting 13.8 points per game and leads the team with 22 assists but has 29 turnovers.

Lack of size poses problem

M. BASKETBALL from page 14

Gaffney has played at least 32 minutes in every game this season, more than he has ever played in his career. This is partially due to the Minutemen's lack of size in the frontcourt, but also a reflection of the dramatic improvement he has shown since last year when he averaged 3.2 points and 4.8 rebounds per game.

Although he has played well, he would like his numbers to come in Minutemen victories.

"Stats are nice but if your team isn't winning and the results aren't there, it doesn't mean a whole lot," Gaffney said.

Shooting guard Ricky Harris will be on to provide the bulk of the scoring. He leads the Minutemen with 19.8 points per game and had a game-high 27 points in UMass' loss to Green Bay.

His three point shooting has been very impressive this season, knocking down 46.2 percent of his shots from beyond the arc. He is 18-39 on the season so far. His shooting is not surprising to fans of the Minutemen. Harris tied a school record last year with 102 three point baskets in a single season.

Senior point guard Chris Lowe is the third player averaging double figures for the Minutemen. He has 12.6 points per game to go with 4.4 assists per game.

However, against Green Bay, UMass guard Anthony Gurley was the only player besides Harris to score in double figures.

On the defensive side of the ball, the Minutemen will have to focus on stopping Rockets guard Tyrone Kent who averages 18.2 points per game, third in the Mid-American Conference. He recently exploded for career high 37 points against No. 14 Xavier. It will be up to either point guard Chris Lowe or Harris to prevent Kent from getting penetration in the lane and lighting up UMass.

Toledo guard Jonathan Amos is the only other player on Toledo averaging double figures with 10.2 points per game.

Recently turnovers have been an issue for the Minutemen, causing Kellogg a lot of stress. Ball security will be a point of emphasis for the Minutemen tonight; Kellogg knows it's nearly impossible to win a game while turning the ball over more than 20 times, especially when they are silly errors.

One interesting subplot will be which team manages to control the boards. UMass outrebounds its opponents 39.6-36.6, but Toledo has gotten at least two more rebounds than its opponent in its last four games.

After facing Toledo, the Minutemen will return home to host Boston College Saturday.

Not a laughing matter

By Shannon J. Owens
The Orlando Sentinel

Maybe the joke about the NFL star who accidentally shot himself at a nightclub would be funny another weekend.

But Plaxico Burress picked the wrong time to be the butt of barroom stories.

"He called me laughing and grinning," Burress' New York Giants teammate Brandon Jacobs told reporters after their 23-7 victory against Washington Sunday.

"He is doing fine. He is feeling good. I called him and made a few jokes about the situation and he laughed, which is what I wanted to hear."

Comedy is all about timing.

And this joke could not have come during a more inappropriate moment.

Plaxico shot himself just a day after the one-year anniversary of Sean Taylor's death. The bullet hit him inches away from the same spot his right thigh that killed Sean.

By a strange twist of fate, it happened on the same weekend the Giants and Washington Redskins were set to play. Of course, neither Sean nor Plaxico were on the field Sunday. But for very different reasons.

Taylor died protecting his family from a home invasion.

Burress, who was already sidelined for the game by injury, shot himself jamming to Lil' Wayne songs at a club. I realize Burress probably wasn't thinking about the deeper meaning of this weekend when the bullet struck. But if he had any compassion, it would have crossed his mind at some point. It's more than inappropriate to laugh about such matters. It's disrespectful to all the victims, unlike Burress, who did not get second chances.

Taylor's daughter will never know her father. Rosalind Williams, mother of slain Denver Broncos cornerback Darrent Williams, lost a son. Richard Collier, also the victim of a shooting, lost a leg, and will never play football again.

Home invasions, stabbings and shootings are sadly becoming commonplace stories in today's archetype of the tragic sports hero. We live in an increasingly violent world with inexplicable tragedies.

So the violence brought on oneself because of ignorant choices is offensive. Not laughable. Judging by Burress' behavior in the past 10 months, he was bound to end up in handcuffs.

He repeatedly rejected authority by ignoring team and league rules. He has paid fines amounting to the price of a suburban home. His wife had filed for two restraining orders against him that were dismissed by a state court.

I personally don't have an issue with athletes going to clubs. But if that particular environment calls for you to bring an AK-47, a bodyguard and a militia, then I recommend a quiet night at home.

There is no reason to lose your life or cause harm to someone else over an apple martini and a couple dance tracks.

There are few industries that allow a person to generate enough wealth for two generations in a matter of a few years. Why would you not do everything to protect your future?

Burress' days of being an NFL star are certainly numbered. But he has another chance to be a better man. And if pending success or failure in life isn't motivation enough, then think about Sean.

Think about Darrent.

Think about Richard.

Think about all the chances they never got and the one you so fortunately have.

Plaxico Burress shot himself in a nightclub earlier last week. The star wide receiver has recently joined back with his team, the New York Giants, but the incident is under investigation.

Be your own chairlift.

Learning time for new style

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

Say goodbye to traditional basketball in the Atlantic 10 Conference as you know it. No longer do teams abide by the 1-5 position system, instead, matchups are created based on a particular team's best players that fit its style of play.

The Massachusetts women's basketball team uses this lineup strategy as well. While competing in the A-10, a conference that is very strong in women's basketball, the Minutewomen (3-3) face at least five other teams in the conference who utilize alternate lineup strategies, most often, a three-guard set.

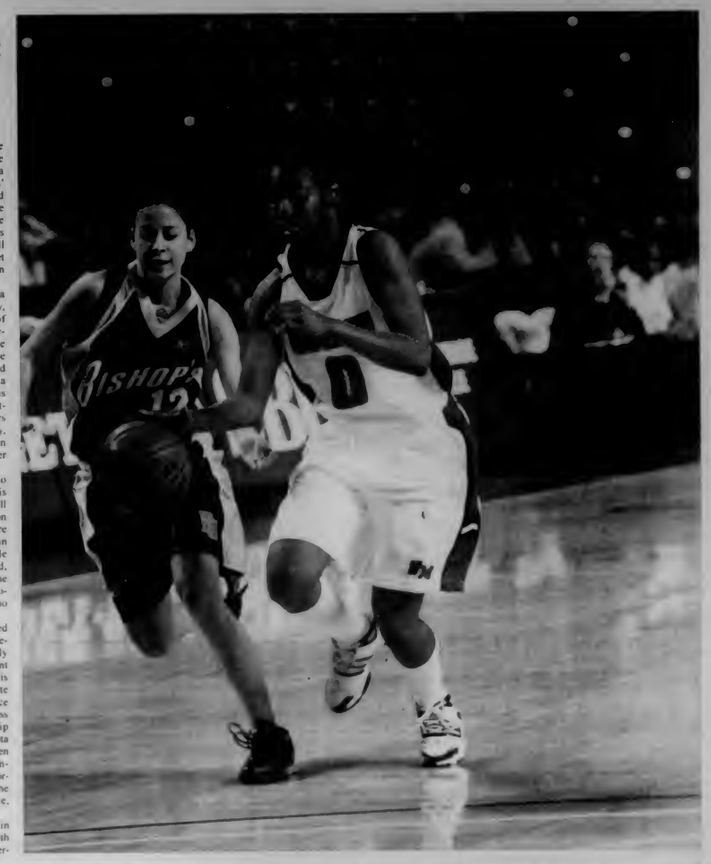
In the A-10 specifically, there are five teams without a true center. Two of said teams have a forward that is listed as a center as an alternate position. The other three teams don't even so much as have center position listed on their roster.

All positions are getting bigger and, because of this, players are being called upon to adapt to newer styles of play in which they have untraditional duties. While redshirt sophomore Diatiema Hill is listed as a five-foot, eight-inch guard, she has 17 defensive rebounds and 26 total rebounds. Dacko uses Hill as a defensive stopper and her 10 steals is third-most on the team but she has 22 assists to her credit as well.

With Hill (guard), Wright (forward), Stefanie Gerardot (guard), Mosgrove (guard) and Kim Benton (guard) in the starting lineup, the question arises as to the whereabouts of another forward and the center. Gerardot is a five-foot, 10-inch shooting guard who leads the team in scoring (101 points), steals (12) and is second behind Wright's 46 rebounds with 31.

Gerardot shoots like a shooting guard, steals like a point guard and rebounds like a power forward. What the Minutewomen lack in the defensive prowess of a large center, they receive in the hybrid playing style of a Gerardot and a Mosgrove.

However, there are three young players waiting for their chance to have a more prominent role on the team. Freshmen Christina Daniella and Nicole Jones – UMass' only true center – will be behind sophomore forward Valerie Avebe in terms of playing time. While all three players still have things to learn, their size alone – all three players are at least six-feet tall – gives them an advantage in today's style of basketball.



Gaudy statistics are often a staple in the basketball of today, as opposed to the team ethic of effective passing, defense and scoring. There are key players who are scouted by opposing teams because of their individual abilities and many times, this can cripple a team. Opposing teams can do this more readily by loading their starting-five with either speedy scorers or bulky defenders. Either way, compensation has to be made in order for one team to play better than the other.

The position that is starting to be phased out in today's game is the Center. More often you will see power forwards in the position or even hybrid guards. Sophomore guard Cerie Mosgrove is an example of such a player. While Mosgrove is listed as a guard, her size is invaluable when she switches down-low to help sophomore forward Teya Wright, who typically plays as the center.

While Mosgrove can be used as a body in the post, her three-point shooting makes her equally as dangerous outside of the paint as in. Mosgrove was named this week's UMass/Dinn Bros. Athlete of the Week for her performance in the Coors Classic, where UMass advanced to the championship game before losing to Minnesota (6-1). She went three-for-seven from three-point range in the championship game and went five-for-nine from beyond the arc in the Minutewomen's previous game, against host Colorado (2-3).

Mosgrove leads the A-10 in three-point field goals-made, with 19 and averages 3.17 of them per game.

Freshman Aleshia Howard dribbles alongside a Bishop defender earlier this year. The Minutewomen are 3-3 so far this season and will look to improve their record tonight against Providence at the Mullins Center.

Offensive problems

effecting the implementation of UMass' new offense. With so many turnovers, the Minutemen have had trouble at times running their offense and finding out what works and what does not.

The dribble-drive offense is something that takes time to install, on both the offensive and defensive side of the ball.

For UMass, the turnovers have slowed down the development of the offense and caused them to fall behind.

"It takes time to put a lot of things in, whether it is the defense, whether it is the offense," assistant coach Vance Walberg said before the team's home opener against Jacksonville State. "Right now we're so far behind on both sides of the ball. We're trying to get [the players] caught up to as much as we can."

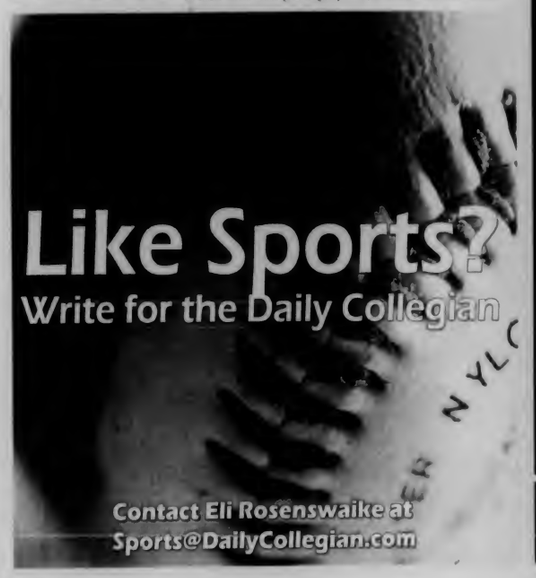
As the season has gone on, the Minutemen have had more and more troubles handling the ball.

On Saturday against Green Bay, UMass had 29 turnovers which resulted in 35 points for the Phoenix.

Back on Nov. 17, in the 80-58 loss to No. 18 Memphis, the Minutemen committed 24 turnovers and scored 28 points off of them. Lastly against Southern Illinois, UMass gave the ball to the Salukis 20 times, good for 26 points.

Toledo's (1-5) numbers are similar to those of UMass in the turnover department. The Rockets have averaged slightly more turnovers per game with 19.5, but have forced 13.8 turnovers per game compared to UMass' 13.4.

The Rockets also have a poor turnover to assist ratio, averaging just 49 assists per turnover, 17 lower than UMass' 66 assists per turnovers.



The Minutemen are going through their second new offense in as many years just this season it is not going as well.

Last season under Travis Ford and the up-tempo offense, UMass went 25-11, the fifth-most wins in school history, and started the season 5-1.

With the Minutemen's struggles handling the ball, they have had trouble getting a handle on the new offense under new coach Derek Kellogg.

The Minutemen point leader James Marcou skates into the St. Lawrence zone in UMass' game last Friday. Marcou, a pivotal part of the Mass Attack offense, will look to increase his point total in UMass' game against UConn on Friday. The sophomore leads the Minutemen in points (19), goals (7) and assists (10).

Searching for answers

Meyers, a bright spot on troubled team

By Ryan Fleming
COLLEGIAN STAFF

At this point of the season the exact state of the Massachusetts hockey team is still not perfectly clear. They continue to out play and defeat high-ranked opponents like then No. 4 Boston College, then No. 1 Boston University and then No. 4 North Dakota, yet somehow manage to lose to far inferior foes like UMass-Lowell, Merrimack and, most recently, St. Lawrence.

At moments they boast one of the nation's best offenses and spectacular goaltending, other times, slapping attacking forwards and applying all-important pressure seems nearly impossible.

Every game is vitally important and losing to teams like St. Lawrence is just unacceptable.

UMass Hockey

A SCORING DILEMMA

During the first few games of the season the Minutemen (6-6-1, 3-3-1 Hockey East) found ways to score and create scoring opportunities. In their first six games, UMass scored goals of three, six, nine and five. In their six losses, the Minutemen have only scored seven goals, being shutout twice.

UMass used to sport one of the nation's top lines in Alex Berry, Cory Quirk and James Marcou. The trio showed their flexibility in playing styles along with a certain chemistry that makes lines so successful.

In the last five games, the Minutemen are 1-4 including two back-to-back shutout losses to UMass-Lowell and then No. 4 Boston College. After separating the team's top line, the Minutemen have found themselves on the scoreboard but still haven't exactly located what was evident earlier in the season.

BAD TIMING

When you think of the third period you think of the last chance for the opposing team to take the lead, or the final period to stage a comeback. But when you're on a penalty kill you can't harness the same quality scoring chances as when you're playing 5-on-5 hockey.

In the game against St. Lawrence, the Minutemen were penalized three times, giving the Saints six minutes of basically free play and another opportunity to extend their lead. The same happened to UMass in their shutout loss to Boston College on Nov. 21. The Minutemen handed the Eagles 12 minutes of man advantage play in the game's final period, being hit for four penalties (one was a double-minor).

With the penalties coming at the worst of times, the Minutemen are forced to sit back, defend their net, and try to deter any offensive scoring chance that is conjured up, instead of being the team that applies the pressure.

By committing these foolish penalties, the Minutemen greatly reduce their chances of earning a tying score.

MAINLY MEYERS?

Coming into the season Dan Meyers was the starting net minder for the Minutemen, only to be pulled from UMass' 9-4 win against Providence on Halloween night. Before that game Meyers posted a 2-1-1 record.

For the next few games Paul Dainton took over as the main backstop earning a 4-3 record. Dainton's last start against St. Lawrence definitely wasn't his finest letting in four goals on 21 shots.

"[Practice] wasn't fun [Monday]. We got some skating in, which is good," Dainton said. "We can't just let a loss like [Saint Lawrence] go and start working on the power play or something again."

Meyers, though, has run into a bit of tough luck as of late. The junior goaltender took the 3-2 overtime loss against then No. 13 Vermont on Nov. 25 and a 2-0 loss against then No. 4 Boston College on Nov. 21. Meyers stopped 36 and 28 shots respectively. Despite getting the loss for both games, Meyers has played sharp, giving his team a chance to win and giving coach Don Cahoon an interesting dilemma at goaltender position.

Kansas toughs out win

By Case Keefer
University Daily Kansan

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Kansas freshman forward Marcus Morris tried to explain Kansas' 87-60 victory against Kent State.

Marcus Morris, who finished with 14 points and 10 rebounds, attempted to make a sense of a game where 46 fouls were called on the two teams combined. The words weren't coming to him.

He wanted to tell everyone exactly what happened in the scrum under the basket four minutes into the second half that resulted in a flagrant foul and ejection of his twin brother, Markieff. But he didn't have a clear view of the altercation while it happened.

On this night, the scratch above Marcus' right eye told the story of the game better than he — or anyone else — could.

"I got scratched," Marcus said. "They were playing very physical, and I think we were playing very physical, too."

It proved to be a friendly home for them. Kansas shot 32-for-36 from the charity stripe. Marcus, who went 8-for-12 on free throws, was the only Jayhawk who missed any.

He said he felt bad that he kept Kansas four away from a perfect percentage. Kansas coach Bill Self, on the other hand, wasn't disappointed at all. He said it was the perfect victory for the Jayhawks.

The game lost its rhythm right after Markieff was ejected. Markieff retaliated when a Golden Flash player hit him while fighting for a lose ball after a rebound.

Junior guard Sherron Collins said a Kent State player punched Markieff, which prompted his response. Marcus thought Markieff might have caught an elbow, not a fist. Either way, Collins thought Markieff should have shrugged it off.

"He's got to do a better job of keeping his head out there," Collins said. "He's young. It happens."

Although the incident changed the nature of the game, the outcome was never in doubt. Kansas led 43-31 at the time and never let Kent State closer than that for the rest of the game. With six minutes remaining, the Golden Flashes once again cut their deficit to 12 with the score 67-55.

But Collins pulled the Jayhawks away. Collins started slow, scoring only three points in the first half. He saved all his energy for the end. The rest of the players on the court looked like they were in slow motion as Collins flew up and down the court at the end of the game.

He stole the ball from the Golden Flashes. He made a jump shot. He spun into the lane and finished by laying it in. Self said he was impressed by Collins' late-game antics.

"Down the stretch," Self said, "he showed why he's one of the best guards around."

Although the game was still close in the first half, the Jayhawks used a 16-2 run to pull away from the Golden Flashes.

Freshman guard Tyshawn Taylor, who finished with 12 points and three steals, contained MAC Preseason Player of the Year Al Fisher to five points. Sophomore guard Brady Morningstar, who finished with nine points and four steals, scored seven points during the run.

Offense key to UMass win

W. BASKETBALL from page 14

a 14-point lead. Kate Mills had 21 points for the Minutewomen, with 15 of them coming in the second half, but they could not hold on to a two-point lead with a little over two minutes left in regulation.

The Providence victory halted a streak of three-straight Minutewomen victories over the home team Friars.

Despite the heartbreaking loss last season, Dacko knows that her team must come out and put points up on the board if they want to win.

"We managed to lose the game there on their floor last year," Dacko said. "We didn't play good defense, so I think we owe them."

Offensively the Friars revolve around guard/forward Mi-Khida Hawkins, who leads the team with 14.2 points per game.

The Baltimore native had 15 points against the Hawkeyes on Nov. 23 and earned All-Tournament honors.

"Hawkins is a good penetrator, very athletic," Dacko said.

"Overall they are very athletic teams that have two kids that shoot the three extremely well, and they run a lot of different sets against the man."

Front court mate Chelsea Marandola is second on the team averaging 12 points a game, while Darrian leads the Friars with 6.8 rebounds per game and has the highest free throws percentage on the team (.824).

Along with being the teams leading scorer, Hawkins has a tendency to lose her handle, recording 26 turnovers so far this season.

The Minutewomen are averaging more points per game (64.8), steals (8.3) and turnovers (20.5), but are not blocking as many shots or recording as many assists as the Friars.

"I think our biggest focus on what we take away from being on the road against Minnesota is that we have to box out and rebound, because they are just as athletic as we are," Dacko said.

This is the first Big East team that UMass will face this season, and will host Seton Hall on Dec. 29.

Getting their act together

Kellogg, team settling in

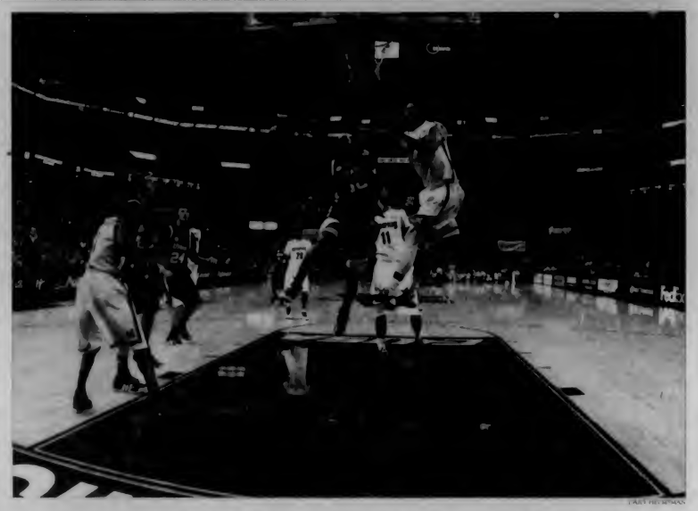
BY SCOTT FELDMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Rookie head coaches never have it easy. The players aren't used to their schemes, the spotlight constantly follows them and the responsibility is far greater than ever.

Just ask Derek Kellogg or Gene Cross what it's like for a first year coach.



Tonight's matchup between the Massachusetts men's basketball team (1-4) and Toledo (1-5) pits two teams with first-year coaches looking to break out of an early season slump. UMass (under Kellogg) has dropped its last four games, most recently 84-67 against Green Bay. The Rockets (Cross) lost five out of their first six games with their only win coming against West Georgia.

The Minutemen will face a serious challenge tonight; Not only will they have to ignore their recent slump, they will also have to contend with an excited Toledo crowd, which will be inaugurating the newly renovated John Savage Arena against UMass. Toledo played its previous six games on the road.

The Minutemen are travel weary, having played four out of five games on the road this season prior to tonight's contest. UMass has never won in Toledo, although the team hasn't played there since 1979.

UMass has had one bright spot this season; the outstanding play of Tony Gaffney. Gaffney has averaged 13.2 rebounds per game this season good for third in the nation. In addition, to averaging 5.0 blocks per game, good for fourth in the country. The figure includes his games against Memphis (Nov. 17) where he pulled down a career-high 19 boards and chipped in 16 points and against Jacksonville State (Nov. 24) where he scored 20 points, grabbed 19 rebounds and blocked a career-best eight shots.

Redshirt sophomore Anthony Gurley goes up for a layup in UMass' game against Memphis earlier this year. Gurley is fourth on the team, averaging 11.8 per game; he has also added 21 rebounds and seven assists.

Ricky Harris defends against a LaSalle player in a game last year. Harris leads the Minutemen with 19.8 points per game and is second on the team playing 33 minutes a game.

Turnovers a problem for Minutemen

Ball protection key to success

The Massachusetts men's basketball team must hold onto the ball before they can get a hold of their new offense.

While learning a new offense has contributed to the large number of turnovers for UMass (1-4), the turnovers has also hindered the learning process. The Minutemen have stumbled in their last four games, dropping all four despite holding leads at half time in three of them.

UMass will need to reduce their turnovers dramatically tonight at Toledo if it wants to end its four-game losing streak.

Through the Minutemen's first five games, they have averaged 19.4 turnovers per game. The entire team has been at fault, with not one player having more assists than turnovers. Point guard Chris Lowe leads the team with 29 turnovers, 5.8 per game, and had 10 turnovers in the 80-73 loss to Southern Illinois. The senior has 22 assists on the season.

Redshirt sophomore Anthony Gurley (15) is second on the team in turnovers followed by Ricky Harris (14), Tony Gaffney (13), and Gary Correia (8).

"We've all been playing basketball for awhile now," Harris said after the loss to Green Bay. "We know how to dribble and we know how to not travel with the basketball so a lot of our turnovers were careless mistakes."

The team's turnovers have had a negative effect on the Minutemen in more than one way in the early part of the season. The first is the opposition ability to capitalize on the Minutemen's mistakes. UMass has turned the ball over 97 times, and those turnovers have been converted into 116 points by the opposition. The Minutemen's opposition has averaged 1.2 points off of each UMass turnover, and an average of 23.2 points per game off of them.

The same cannot be said for UMass. The Minutemen have caused 67 turnovers and has not converted them at the same rate. They have scored 59 points off of their oppositions mistakes, .88 points per turnover.

The turnovers are also

After an impressive showing at the Coors Classic last week in which they advanced to the Championship game, the Massachusetts women's basketball team looks to improve its out of conference record when it takes on Providence College tonight at the Mullins Center at 7 p.m.

The Minutewomen (3-3) held an eight point lead at half time Saturday night, but were not able to defeat Minnesota in the final contest of the tournament held in Denver.

"We have a lot to build on and you use that as ammunition to help your team and have them grove because we would like to be like Minnesota," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said.

Sophomore guard Cerie Mosgrove led the Maroon and White with seventeen points, averaging 13 points per game over the two-day tournament while being named to the Coors Classic All-Tournament Team. Against the Golden Gophers, Mosgrove was 5-for-9 from three-point range, while senior guards Stefanie Gerardot and Sakera Young added 15 points and 10 points respectively.

"Cerie is shooting the ball extremely well, her defense is picking up and teams are having a hard time staying in man defense against us," Dacko said.

Tonight's game will end the Friar's (2-4) six-game road stretch that began on Nov. 18 against Hartford.

The Hawks dealt PC its first loss of the season, after the Friars opened its season with an easy 62-39 victory over in-state foe Brown.

The Friars have not been successful on the road, going 1-4 in its previous five games.

Like UMass, the Friars were impressive in tournament play, reaching the championship game of the Hawkeye Classic after defeating Portland in overtime on Nov. 22.

They were routed by the host of the tournament, Iowa, 64-46, as the Friars had to play catch up throughout the game, but came up short.

Both teams have met 15 times, with the Friars holding a slim lead, 8-7, in the all-time series. UMass is 2-2 at home against visiting PC, who is making its first trip to Amherst since the 1994 season.

Last season, the Minutewomen traveled to Providence and were defeated 59-56 on New Years Eve.

Senior forward Shantee Darrian nailed a three pointer with sixteen seconds left to spoil a second half comeback which featured UMass erasing

One of the Minutewomen's most versatile players, Cerie Mosgrove, looks to pass the ball. The sophomore is third on the team in points (64), third on the team with 16 rebounds and brings an all-important defensive presence for UMass.

Merry Maple returns to Amherst center

The Minuteman Marching Band will play at the annual Merry Maple festival again this year in downtown Amherst on Dec. 5.

Marching Band to play lighting

BY DOMENIC POLI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Amherst Area Chamber of Commerce announced in a statement before Thanksgiving that its Annual Merry Maple celebration will be held Friday, Dec. 5 at 4 p.m.

The Merry Maple celebration begins a weekend-long festivity that includes music, shopping and eating since its start 30 years ago.

This year's event is planned to start at Kendrick Park, across from the Bertucci's restaurant on North Pleasant Street, with its first-ever children's parade, followed by Christmas carols, sung on the steps of Town Hall by the Amherst Regional Middle School Chorus at 4:30 p.m.

The University of Massachusetts Minuteman Marching Band, led by George Parks, will lead all attendees to the Town Common for the lighting of the Merry Maple and a sing-along, set to start at 5 p.m.

The celebration is scheduled to end with a chance for people to meet Santa Clause and have hot cocoa at the Amherst History Museum on Amity Street at around 6.

"[The Merry Maple] has been Amherst's little version of holiday spirit and community spirit and rather than having a Christmas tree, at this non-denominational family festival we use our town's maple in the Common," said Tony Maroulis, executive director of the Amherst Area Chamber of Commerce.

"It's an inclusive event. I mean, yes, there's Christmas caroling, but it's a communitywide event and we recognize that there are a number of different religious traditions in town and so that's what this is all about," he said in a telephone interview.

The event kicks off the annual Greeting Card Shopping Day, an annual promotion in which downtown businesses and restaurants offer one item in their respective establishments for 20 percent off. It will be held Dec. 6.

According to Maroulis, who has held his position since September, the Merry Maple celebration is co-sponsored by Promoting Downtown Amherst (PDA) and Family Outreach in Amherst.

Maroulis said the PDA is a group of downtown banks, retailers and restaurateurs that deal with promoting the commercial interests of the area.

"They're involved in pretty much everything ... from Halloween Fest to the Taste of Amherst [held every June]," he said. "Their resources go to promoting the town, downtown specifically But, of course, the downtown is at the center of this 27-square-mile wonderful town that we live in."

He said Family Outreach in Amherst is a social service organization dedicated to caring for Amherst's families in need by providing them with food and clothing.

The organization will use the Merry Maple celebration as a toy drive donation location, where people can bring new and unwrapped toys, books and games to be given to children in need in Amherst.

According to the statement, the Amherst Area Chamber of Commerce's mission is to create, maintain and promote a thriving business environment in the Amherst area and to support the civic, educational, recreational and economic well-being on the town.

Western Mass. dairy farmers face mounting challenges

BY ROSIE WALUNAS
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

"Our Family Farms" is a cooperative of small dairy farms in Western Massachusetts. Recently, the farms in the co-op have been facing the difficulties of rising costs and a faltering economy.

Western Massachusetts is a hotspot for locally grown food, but dairy farms that sell locally and commercially are continuing to struggle.

In 1997, eight Massachusetts farmers got together to make a little more money for their effort. They started "Our Family Farms" a cooperative of small family-run dairy farms, located in Greenfield.

"I think the local food movement has caught on," said Angie Facey farmer and owner of Bree-Z-Knoll Farm, an Our Family Farms member.

Bree-Z-Knoll Farm, located in Leyden, is run by Facey, her husband Randy and his father, Warren. Like the other members of Our Family Farms, Angie Facey said Bree-Z-Knoll Farm milks their own cows and grows their own feed; milk is processed locally and distributed locally.

Facey said the difference is that the money goes back to the farmers rather than to commercial distributors.

The problem is that "people who have to watch their pennies aren't going to buy from us," said Facey.

With the economy in a slump, it's hard to say if buyers are willing to pay an extra 30 cents for a gallon of milk. Our Family Farms currently sells a gallon of milk for $4.79 to $5.00.

"Our sales haven't dropped, but they haven't increased," said Facey.

According to the Massachusetts Association of Dairy Farmers, the dairy industry in Massachusetts is facing a crisis. Its Web site reports that in 1980 there were 829 dairy farms in Massachusetts. In 2007 there were 189.

Today there are 184 dairy farms in Massachusetts that are licensed to sell milk said Carrie Sears, an educator for the Crops, Dairy, Livestock University of Massachusetts Extension Team.

Sears said most dairies ship to commercial distributors because of the high cost to produce and distribute milk locally.

"There have been some farms that jump out of [processing milk locally] because of labor," she said.

"It's true when you compare other commodities like fruits and vegetables they can go to the consumer without any packaging. But dairy has to be processed, packaged and is a commodity that has to be refrigerated," said John Kokoski, owner of Mapleline Farm in Hadley.

Mapleline Farm was started in 1904 by John's great-grandfather, Stanley Kokoski. With his two sons, Henry Sr. and Thomas, the Kokoskis grew vegetables. Henry Jr. took over the farm and produced dairy, but later sold the cows.

His son John Kokoski took the farm over in 1986, and reintroduced dairy. Kokoski began bottling and selling the milk. Mapleline Farm bottles their milk in glass and plastic bottles, which they sell in their store, to local grocers, as well as deliver to customer's doorsteps. Kokoski said these are big incentives for big customers.

But a lack of access to land, high taxes and high energy costs make dairy farming difficult according to Kokoski.

What's worse, Kokoski reasons, is that its the government that sets the price of milk, not farmers.

When the cost of production falls below the milk price, farmers lose money and potentially go out of business, according to Masoud Hashemi.

Hashemi, also an educator for the UMass Extension Team, said that high fuel costs, urban development and the lack of attractiveness to the industry contribute to farms going out of business.

Hashemi said students who visit dairy farms are interested in farming but don't want to farm for a living because it's so expensive.

"That's always been a concern," said Kokoski. Farmers encourage their children to get an education and want them to have a "better life," he said.

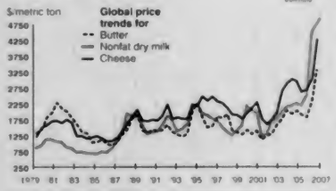
"Most people are in business because of inheritance," said Hashemi. "No one can afford land or cows. It's just not worth it to invest $3,000. It doesn't make any sense."

"We are dairy farmers. We do what we do because we choose to do it," said Beth Cook, the third of five generations of Cook Farms farmers.

Started in 1969, the Hadley-based farm sells a majority of their milk to Garelick Farms and some to Mapleline Farm. Although it produces raw milk on site, the farm doesn't have the facilities to process it, and sells bottled Mapleline Farm milk in their Flavors Restaurant and ice cream shop, which opened in 1998.

Cook said part of the struggle is reflected in the price of fuel, which is needed to ship farm equipment from community to farm's farmland in the West, and to transport crops and feed between plots of land from different areas. Cook Farm utilizes two primary locations consisting of 98 acres and 50 acres and rents other plots, said Cook.

Developers who offer not-price farmers, twice that green acreage said Hashemi.



"They sell the land because they get good offers," he said. "Dairy farmers are responsible for all the green areas. The pastures and fields, those areas will be developed."

'Arte y Cultura' receives grant

FAC expands Latin diversity

BY ALYSSA CREAMER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Recently, the University of Massachusetts Fine Arts Center received a $12,000 grant from the Bank of America Foundation for its Arte y Cultura Initiative.

The Initiative is now in its second year of creating visual and performing arts programs designed to inspire dialogue around issues of diversity and build on the creative economy, particularly within the Latin communities within the Pioneer Valley.

Arte y Cultura is an initiative to "bring together Latino artists, students, faculty and local community leaders," said Fine Arts Center marketing director Shawn Farley.

"They felt that their culture was not very well-represented on campus," said Farley. "So [the directors of the Fine Arts Center] decided we had to change and provide more arts events where Latinos feel they are welcomed."

The FAC is receiving a new grant from the Bank of America Foundation for the 'Arte y Cultura Initiative' to improve Latin programming.

The directors are not limiting these events to the Latino community, but the focus for the initiative is on holding events about Latino and Caribbean culture.

The FAC is collaborating with the Office of Programs and Services for ALANA Students, the Bilingual Collegiate Program, Student Bridges, Native Student Services and the Women of Color Leadership Network to discover new ways in which Latino culture can be spread.

"The Fine Arts Center will be the project leader for bridging the community events with the campus events," Farley said.

Within the community, the FAC works with and exchanges ideas with La Familia de Hispana, CENA, the Puerto Rican Cultural Center, the Spanish American Union, Salsarengue and ESLACE.

According to the U.S. 2006 census, Hispanics comprise the largest growing market in the country, increasing 53 percent in the last 10 years, five times the rate of non-Hispanics.

Arte y Cultura's grant will be spent on a number of different outreach efforts such as developing partnerships with existing community-based organizations in Holyoke and Springfield and generating more funding for the program.

Specifically, the Bank of America grant will provide up to 50 tickets to each sponsored event for Hispanic students and families, and also, allow the FAC to offer discounted tickets.

The FAC's directors plan to create a social network for on-campus Latino students through the FAC's Web site. The Web site now offers Spanish translation for its content.

Additionally, the Arte y Cultura Initiative aims to assist local Latino artists by encouraging many of them to perform on campus and also by giving the artists management and marketing advice.

This past summer, the Fine Arts Center was involved with several Latino community festivals.

From Sept. 25 until Oct. 25, the FAC displayed an educational-historical exhibit called "Nuestras Abuelas: Su Esperanza, Nuestra Fortaleza/Our Grandmothers: Their Hope, Our Strength," that "celebrated the legacy of powerful female figures in the lives of contemporary women leaders in the Puerto Rican and Latino communities in Western Mass." The grant subsidized the cost of displaying this exhibit.

Prior to that event, a Latin Fest featuring India the Salsa Princess, a popular performer within the Latin community, was held in the Center's Concert Hall on Sept. 20.

Single motherhood researched

By Marissa Lang
The Diamondback (U. Maryland)

COLLEGE PARK, Md. — In a self-described "first step" toward leveling the playing field for single mothers, University of Maryland researchers released a study debunking the social stigmas surrounding being a single mom.

Despite high rates of divorce and an increase in non-marital childbearing, the study is the first of its kind to chalk up the difference in child care to a lack of available resources rather than personal deficiencies and to also provide a detailed look at the amount of time and level of interaction single mothers are able to devote to their children.

By using American Time Use Survey data — an annual federal survey that asks participants to fill out a detailed account of how they spend 24 hours — and surveying more than 1,800 single mothers and more than 4,300 married mothers with young children, researchers derived that regardless of marital status, there is not a big difference in the number of hours mothers spend caring for their children. These findings, they said, were surprising.

"We thought they would be really busy, but it turned out that they still spent up to 90 percent of the time with their children that married women do," principal researcher and sociology doctoral student Sarah Kendig said. "That's a lot of time."

Despite the numerous challenges single mothers face, those single mothers surveyed, on average, spent only three to five fewer hours per week on child care than married mothers. The differences are statistically significant, researchers said, but can be explained almost entirely by a gap in available resources.

"Single moms have more constraints," department chair and co-author Suzanne Bianchi said. "We start under the assumption that mothers want to do well by their children, but these mothers — particularly the never-married mothers — have very low percentages that have much education beyond high school [...] that implies what kind of jobs they can get and how many hours they would have to work to support a family."

When compared to married mothers of the same socio-economic demographic, however, the differences in the amount of time devoted to child care disappeared, researchers said.

"We were surprised that the differences, given how different [single mothers'] situations are from married mothers' – even though single moms spend a little less time with their kids – the differences aren't huge," Bianchi said. "We were able to show that if were to compare single moms to married moms who were similar in terms of education and work hours, they turn out to be very similar."

Students from single-mother households said this study is common sense and should not be necessary to prove to the world that single parents are competent parents, too.

"I was always around my mother when I was little," said sophomore sociology and family science major Khrysta Evans, who was raised by her single mom. "I think, a lot of times, single parents are kind of better than married parents, because they don't have anyone else to depend on, so they know that they have to do everything if it's going to get done at all, whereas a married parent, to some extent, can push [responsibilities] off on their husband or wife. My mom was from a single-parent household, too, and she made sure she was there for me."

But, researchers say single mothers typically get a bad reputation and those behind the study hope it will be seen as a step toward improving the image of single mothers.

"There's this stereotype that revolves around single mothers," Kendig said. "And it's always bothered me how they get this bad rap. They're not worse mothers. They do spend less time with their children, but it's not because they care less. We can explain all the difference in the time by education, employment and opportunity, and that means that people don't have to believe all these other reasons like how much they care about their children to explain anything. We need to break down these stereotypes."

Nationwide dairy troubles hit home

Department of Agricultural Resources Web site, there were 518, 570 acres of farmland in Massachusetts, and every farm averaged 85 acres.

Up until the last economic disaster, people wanted to live in the country said Kokoski.

Massachusetts State Senator Stanley Rosenberg said if land is lost to development, Massachusetts would lose farms and its rural character.

"If we don't act aggressively, there will be no dairy industry," said Rosenberg, who served as one of six legislators on the Dairy Farm Revitalization Task Force. "These farms help support other farms. If we let it go we're going to compromise agriculture in western Massachusetts and the state."

Rosenberg said he focused on creating a finance mechanism for farmers when the cost of milk drops below production, urging retailers to offer coupons for milk, and providing low interest loans for farmers.

Facey said dairy farms in Massachusetts aren't doing great, but Our Family Farms is doing well in comparison.

"The more milk local consumers buy, the better we can drive down prices," he said. He said the only way Massachusetts can have local milk is to save it.

But Hashemi said consumers are most willing to buy local when the economy is doing well.

"When it's good, people will buy local because they think it's better quality and nutritious," Hashemi said.

But he said that means spending a little bit more.

"You never see local products on sale," he said.

Hashemi said milk from commercial companies is all people can afford when the economy is in a slump.

Rosenberg said that if consumers can't afford local milk, they give up knowing the freshness of their product and where it came from, which is an incentive to consumers.

These days, many people want to buy locally, but in a time of economic hardship, it's tempting to go commercial and save.

"More and more I see people coming to buy local food," said Steve Ozzelik, manager and owner of Maple Farm Foods grocery in Hadley. "But we can't help the situation about commercial dairy."

Maple Farm Foods carries 85 to 90 percent local products in the summer, and sells Mapleline Farm bottled milk year-round, he said.

"Mapleline goes as far as they can go," he said. He said the milk is "good and fresh."

Kokoski said he hasn't noticed his customers going to buy commercial milk because "they know what they're paying for."

"In our case a lot of people like the glass bottles," he said. "People like the home delivery. They're willing to pay a little more."

But given the uncertainty of the economy, even an increased demand for local milk won't help local dairies.

"The price of milk is dropping like a rock," and the cost of production is higher, according to Facey.

"There will probably be another 20 dairy farms that go out of business," she said.

Hashemi also said he anticipates a "number of local farms will go out of business."

Rosenberg said Massachusetts imports the majority of its milk from other New England states and a few in the Midwest. But, in the future, there's no guarantee that milk will be cheaper.

Hashemi said if Massachusetts no longer produced dairy it would not be a problem to import all of its milk, but it wouldn't be right.

"We would be totally reliant on those sources," said Rosenberg, who said dairy is also about freshness and preserving the land.

But Kokoski said there's not much dairies can do but keep producing.

"Every business' generation comes with challenges. You have to run a farm like any other business. Try hard," he said.

Facey said it might help if more people knew what went into producing the carton of milk in their refrigerator.

"The struggle is local milk is a little more expensive, but if only consumers knew a little more about where it's gone and where it's going," she said.

EDITORIAL OPINION

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 4, 2008

"Free speech is the whole thing, the whole ball game. Free speech is life itself."
- Sir Salman Rushdie

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

A state of economic turmoil

John Glaser

On the eve of Bush's departure from office, barely anybody is unfamiliar with the ever deepening hole of debt this administration has conferred upon this country. In defending the invasion of Iraq and simultaneously cutting taxes, vice president Dick Cheney blithely reminded us a few years ago that "deficits don't matter."

Obama has, in recent weeks, candidly assured us he will hold the same view in applying his agenda: uninhibited spending of money we don't have for hopeless political schemes superficially meant to save us from anything that the powerful deem villainous, be it Saddam or Wall Street.

Concern for deficit spending and indebtedness (now in record territory) takes a back seat, he says, to his expensive but enlightened deeds of control.

At the forefront of this promotion of profligacy are economists of the Keynesian ilk. Paul Krugman has been pressuring for "a very large fiscal expansion to keep the economy from going into free fall," as if federal squandering of capital has a negative correlation with a poor economy.

Excessive government borrowing and inflation discourages private investment and drives up interest rates; never a recipe for economic recovery.

Even if we accept Krugman's and Obama's propositions as plausible, we still have no reason, historical, logical or otherwise, to believe that this fiscal expansion will be of a responsible and effective nature. The chairwoman of the oversight panel for these bailouts said just this week that the government has no coherent strategy for easing the financial crisis.

They are clueless, but wrongheaded too because with more spending prerogative, the government has more power. With more power comes more trillion-dollar wars, more harmful social constructions and less accountability.

> Running up deficits implies that Washington need not pay for its schemes with an increase in taxation, but that the government spends beyond its income.

All this scrambling to preempt economic hardship stems from the American belief in the permanence of economic growth, which, journalist Robert Samuelson says, is exactly what has undone economic growth.

"Initially triggered by falling inflation and interest rates," he says shooting stock prices and then home values "induced speculative dizziness" and led to "bubbles that burst in 2000 (for stocks) and 2007 (for homes)."

It was, in part, this assuredness that home prices would always be worth more tomorrow than today – and that economic growth is a given along any timeline which led to our current downturn.

This same attitude in government explains the rampant scuffling to bail out banks and investment firms and manufacture a "New New Deal" with this fiscal expansion.

We might be wise to accept the economic consequences of living beyond our means, but instead we devalue the currency, bailout financial giants and lobby for government to overspend.

Running up deficits implies that Washington need not pay for its schemes with an increase in taxation, but that the government spends beyond its income. They do this by borrowing as much as possible and by inflating the money supply, which makes us all poorer.

When the Federal Reserve increases the money supply, they do it by buying U.S. Treasury securities from banks with money that hadn't previously existed. This has various negative impacts on the economy, but for all his vouching for blue collar workers and the middle class, Obama seems not to care about the worst of inflation's affects: the redistribution of wealth to the already wealthy.

Those who receive new money from the Fed first – government contractors, big banks and financial institutions – benefit from the increase in money before it has had its affects on prices in the broader economy. That is, before it hurts us.

So here is Obama, warrior of the modest and plighted, supporting massive bailouts to corporate America and advocating a social policy to be implemented via inflation which naturally pushes wealth upward. Behold, America's post-partisan savior.

The federal government has spent about $1.4 trillion (of money they don't have) so far on the financial system. And already, Obama and his team are talking about another stimulus package costing upwards of $500 billion.

These are absurd sums, historically unheard of and which dwarf most other significant government expenditures of this century combined. Yet, we have people encouraging this recklessness.

Heartening the government to spend and splurge and care not for fiscal restraint is treacherously irresponsible. America is the most indebted nation in the world at over $10 trillion and counting.

At a time when our institutions are subject to less and less accountability – a trend significantly sped up by Bush's time in office – government profligacy, control and dependency will not be our salvation. It will be our downfall.

Sex education a must

Stephanie Luke

Members of VOX: Students for Choice do not seek to change others' personal opinions. Instead, we aim to educate about issues involving abortion, reproductive rights and sexual education.

Students have asked us about sexual education and its effectiveness in comparison to abstinence-only education.

Abstinence-only sexual education has received millions and millions of dollars from the federal government since the welfare reform of 1996. The federally funded abstinence-only programs are expected to follow a certain curriculum.

A federally funded program is expected to have "as its exclusive purpose, teaching the social, psychological, and health gains to be realized by abstaining from sexual activity" (Title V, Section (§) 510 of the Social Security Act).

That makes sense. Other requirements, however, seem to be aimed at bashing sex outside of marriage. An abstinence-only program must "teach that sexual activity outside the context of marriage is likely to have harmful psychological and physical effects; [and] teach that bearing children out-of-wedlock is likely to have harmful consequences for the child, the child's parents, and society."

This is an offensive assumption that all children born out of wedlock are unplanned or even unwanted. Marriage and partnership are concepts that evolve with our society over time. Today the nuclear family is no longer a realistic picture of many American families.

The daughter of Sarah Palin, an advocate of abstinence-only education, became pregnant by accident. Was that the result of education about contraception? I highly doubt it.

Are people more likely to contract sexually transmitted infections if they are educated about the dangers and preventative measures, or if they are not? If people are not taught how to use contraceptives, they are not going to know how to use them properly, which could result in unplanned pregnancies or the contraction of STIs. Sexual education makes sense.

Programs such as the "Silver Ring Thing" encourage teenagers to buy promise rings with the intention of remaining virginal until marriage. The "Silver Ring Thing" also teaches that condoms do not work at all.

Minister Denny Pattyn, creator of this particular program, has said that he tells his own teenage daughter not to use condoms if she breaks her pledge of abstinence. "I don't think it'll protect her. It won't protect her heart," said Pattyn in an interview with "60 Minutes" correspondent Ed Bradley.

The National Longitudinal Study of Adolescent Health was a nationwide study of adolescent sexuality. This federally funded $54 million study investigated thousands of teenagers who had taken a purity pledge.

On the up side, taking the pledge delayed sex for these teens for around 18 months. On the down side, when these teenagers became sexually active, they were one-third less likely to use a condom. Why? It's because they hadn't been educated about condoms.

These teenagers were just as likely, the study found, to contract STIs as the teenagers who had sexual education in their history. Not only this, but the pledges were more likely to engage in risky behavior, such as anal and oral sex, because they associated virginity with vaginal sex. And because of their public pledge to remain abstinent, these teenagers were much less likely to get tested for STIs.

Peter Bearman, the designer of the study, said that 88 percent of the abstainers broke their pledge before marriage. This is a huge number of people, and it should force people to look at the reality of teenage sexuality.

The Bush administration advocates the concept that abstinence is the number one contraceptive. While this is true, it avoids reality. Teenage sex happens no matter the preventative measures a community takes, and these teenagers have to be educated about the dangers and how to avoid them. Education about contraceptives is useful even for the people who do fulfill their pledges and get married as virgins. Just think about it.

A national survey done by the University of Washington in 2002, published by the Journal of Adolescent Health, discovered that 25 percent of teens received abstinence-only education.

It was discovered that nine percent receive no education at all, and the rest received comprehensive sexual education. The 66 percent that received sexual education were found to be half as likely to experience unplanned pregnancy as the teens with abstinence-only education.

> Sweeping sexuality under the rug does nothing to decrease its existence.

Neither sexual education nor abstinence-only education seemed to reduce the contraction of STIs. Pamela Kohler, the study's lead author, said that "There was no evidence to suggest that abstinence-only education decreased the likelihood of ever having sex or getting pregnant."

The promise ring is a potentially-positive moral concept, but it should not replace sexual education. Sweeping sexuality under the rug does nothing to decrease its existence.

It is stupid to assume that sexual education, educating people how to avoid unplanned pregnancy, would cause unplanned pregnancy. VOX: Students for Choice agrees with the idea that sex is pleasurable and fun, but we also are focused on public health and educating the public on the safe ways to practice this un-casual act.

VOX: Students for Choice advocates comprehensive sexual education because information gives people the power to make their own, informed decisions.

Culture or race?

Jon Peterson

The history of race and racism in America is so intertwined with its national identity that whenever demographical differences between races exist and come into question, whether in income, intelligence, loan approval rates or crime statistics, race and racism can always be used as a firm position on which to argue for the causes.

There tends to be two historically significant reasons for why race has been seen as an important factor in such things; particularly discrimination and natural inferiority.

The former idea, that minorities did not have the ability to perform at the same level as whites by nature, was predominant in the beginning of the 20th century. It was during the latter part of the century that outright discrimination of minorities by whites became a more accepted principle.

To even scratch the surface of the claims that race plays the predominant role in such matters as genetics is to show some of the fatal flaws in it. European immigrants to the United States in the early 20th century tended to score lowly on the IQ tests during the time of the First World War, on the same levels as white mountaineer children.

In the oncoming decades and generations, it was the case that the descendants of Jewish immigrants tended to show dramatically different test results, along with greater increases in net worth and education, during a time when they also had very little intermarriage.

The Jews have started out at relatively similar levels to the other immigrant groups, but progressed more quickly than others. Such a difference cannot be described as because of race, and as such it is at least equally as hard to see it as a result of racism.

If racism were to have stopped merely according to the country the people were born in, then there shouldn't have been such differences between the groups. The differences between the people then would most likely be based on culture, while the skills, practices and behaviors of those groups, with race playing little, if any role.

What is well known today about blacks in the United States is that those people who migrated from Africa or the West Indies after the civil war tend to do better in terms of income, occupation and whatnot.

What isn't generally known, however, are the differences that existed between Northern and Southern whites before their ancestors had even set foot on American soil.

The cultural trademarks of the North Britons and Scotch-Irish were remarkably different from the Pennsylvania Dutch, Germans and Southern English and Spanish who migrated to the American North and West Indies in greater proportions.

While Southern whites comprised about a third of the country's population, they comprised the majority of the country's illiterate. The North had several times more schools while the South had a much greater period for yielding crops so Northern children generally spent twice the time in school as Southern children. These differences cannot be attributed to race or racism, so the case for culture being the predominant factor becomes more reasonable.

The "Redneck" culture, as described in economist Thomas Sowell's book "White Liberals and Black Rednecks," is defined by those who had lower standards of achievement and intellect, along side greater levels of promiscuity and violence. During the time when only a third of Americans lived in the south amongst this culture, 90 percent of blacks in America did. Southern raised politicians and black preachers now have great similarities in their oratory styles, these being some of the characteristics passed between the cultures.

> And while the cultures changed over time, it did so at different rates amongst the different groups in which it had become predominant.

And while the cultures changed over time, it did so at different rates amongst the different groups in which it had become predominant. The black Redneck culture in this respect did not have the opportunity to change as quickly as others, and could not have been expected to do so.

Most would not have had rich uncles or inheritances to benefit from, and thus couldn't pay for schooling or whatever means they would have had to make their lives better.

But even in past years, banks have been accused of racism for differences in loan making practices. While blacks have been turned down for loans at a higher rate than whites, there is the call to racism. What doesn't come into reports often has been that blacks tend to have lower net worth's than whites, and lenders often want to know these sort of things when loans are being applied for.

But where there is the call of racism, there are flocks of politicians who try to appease it, and in this case did, by authorizing the Community Re-Investment Act in 1995.

The Act, and Attorney General Janet Reno, imposed legal restrictions on banks that refused to give loans to high risk borrowers, while also giving great power to the companies Freddie Mac and Fannie Mae. The consequence of the government equalizing has been apparent enough in the past few months.

The politicians who took these measures in the first place thought they were helping change these people's behaviors for the better by changing their environment. Their own fatal flaw was in their "kindness" however, because when kindness leads to such assumptions that what comes across the oceans with people will and should stay for its own sake, there is a culture achieving far less than it could if it had only not been so quick to judge race as being more important than culture in the first place.

Ra Ra Riot rebounds

Syracuse natives Ra Ra Riot will perform at the Iron Horse Music Hall in Northampton on Friday night. The band released its debut full length album, "The Rhumb Line" in August.

By Brian Wood
Collegian Staff

A lot can change in a year. Just ask Ra Ra Riot.

When the Syracuse, N.Y. sextet last performed at Northampton's Iron Horse Music Hall in February, they did so with the heaviest of hearts and a cloud of uncertainty surrounding them. In just two short years, the band that begin innocently enough as friends at Syracuse University has dealt with more critical expectations and tragic occurrences than most bands – no matter how experienced – could handle.

2007 proved to be a profoundly transitional year for the band. Following the widespread release of their first album, a six-song EP, and supporting tours with Tokyo Police Club and Art Brut, the band was rocked by the sudden and tragic death of drummer and founding member John Pike.

Following a July performance in Providence, Pike disappeared from a house party in Fairhaven. The next day Pike's body was discovered in nearby Buzzard's Bay.

As quickly as the band had arrived, their once promising future came to a crashing halt. After taking time off to recover in the wake of tragedy, the band announced they would continue on as a band, ending constant speculation about their future.

When they recruited Cameron Wesch to join the band on drums, the band played a few benefits for the newly formed and dedicated John Ryan Pike Memorial Foundation and embarked on their first headlining tour of 2008. This tour included the aforementioned stop at the Iron Horse in February.

Now, some 10 months later, the band is returning charged with the momentum of a newly released album, a slew of well-received festival performances and an appearance on the Late Show with David Letterman.

No longer is the band's survival without Pike in question. The only question that remains is how far Ra Ra Riot will go in their present state.

If initial impressions count for anything, the band has a promising future.

Ra Ra Riot's debut full length, "The Rhumb Line," shows marked progression. The album is comprised of a handful of older selections from their EP, a number of new ones and a cover of Kate Bush's "Suspended in Gaffa."

The production on the album allows the old favorites to transcend the restrained sound that dampened the band's self-titled debut LP while the new songs fit in seamlessly alongside. The band is currently touring in support of the album.

The band is a sight to behold when performing live. Guitarist Milo Bonacci and bassist Mathieu Santos are busy interacting with each other while energetically exploring the confines of the stage. Their interplay is at the heart of the band's lively stage presence.

Vocalist Wesley Morris spends his time on stage acting as a stabilizing presence. With a whirlwind of sound and motion around him, his movements are subtle and simple. He prefers to attach himself to the microphone stand instead of relying on flamboyant gestures. He only removes the mic for the most intense moments of the set.

The true stars of the show, both live and often recorded, are the band's string section. Alexandra Lawn and Rebecca Zeller. By implementing cello and violin to their upbeat numbers, Ra Ra Riot manage to separate themselves from their contemporaries while adding a dimension to their live show that few bands can match.

Their successful use of stringed instrumentation has led to countless comparisons to other bands with a similar penchant for sweeping melodies, namely The Arcade Fire. While the comparison is not without some merit, Ra Ra Riot hardly tread on the themes of melancholy or experiment with dark chamber-inspired sounds The Arcade Fire are so fond of.

"The Rumb Line" is a nautical term in sailing navigation that refers to a path of constant bearing. With the worst behind them, Ra Ra Riot appears to be on course for great things. Friday night is just one of many stops along the way.

Ra Ra Riot will perform with opening act So Many Dynamos at the Iron Horse Music Hall in Northampton Friday night. December 5. Tickets are $13 in advance and $15 at the door. Doors open at 10 p.m.

Guess who's back? Slim Shady's back

By Ezra Prior
Collegian Correspondent

A flighty-sounding flute and punchy drums set the background for Eminem's new freestyle track leaked onto YouTube. Its title: "I'm Having a Relapse" is a clever remark on his up-and-coming re-emergence back into the record industry.

The release date for his new E.P. "King Mathers" has yet to be announced, but judging from the style of the offered preview, Eminem is coming up with new ways to reinvent himself as an artist, despite his recent lack of meaningful publicity or production.

Filled with complicated turns of phrase and intricate arrangement, the sample freestyle is dark and humorous. It is as if he has remembered what he was meant to do: produce quality songs about his own life, instead of D-12 club singles marketed for mainstream consumption.

The reason why Eminem and his music was such a hot top issue was that he addressed socio-political concerns without "sugar-coating" them, as he did in 2002 when he released "The Eminem Show."

Although hurtful language detracted from the CD's moral integrity, its lyrics were packed with envenomed and insightful tirades against the government's attempt at censorship. Knowledgeable of the response he would receive, Eminem fought against it and directly criticized the use of rap artists as scapegoats for social blame.

Lyrically provoking the very societal restraints that "held him back" he created in his songs a self-sustaining tension. The response he received, if not fully welcoming, was enough to reshape a generation's opinion of itself by giving it the voice to express its raw concerns: racial tension, sexuality, drug abuse and violence.

Sure it might not be the best music for toddlers to overhear, but doesn't anyone appreciate the bad boy anymore? Is the rawness of Eminem's expressionism simply crude? Or is there something about his inability to hold his tongue that reveals what makes us human?

By rapping stories that overreach moral boundaries and creating choruses that point to him being merely an artist, he creates a dilemma of representation.

His verses often remark upon why innocent white kids think that rap is cool, forcing the listener to question his or her position when enjoying his verses, just as Shakespeare pulled his audience into a feeling of complicit guilt when hinting at their enjoyment of the atrocities being acted upon the stage.

As a presence, Eminem reminds his audience of the little devil which the freedom of speech affords. He can't and won't be silenced.

After spending a few years out of the limelight, Eminem is set to return with a new EP.

Byrne still dazzles

By Ian Nelson
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — "You're a genius," an audience member appreciatively yelled to the man in white, to which he humbly said nothing. He needn't reply, not even a receptive "thank you," instead rolling right into another song.

The man in white was David Byrne, who flawlessly played the Calvin Theatre Tuesday night as part of his "Songs of David Byrne and Brian Eno Tour."

It doesn't seem as though Byrne has lost a beat, be it in his voice, his movement, or his odd, undying sense of visual artistry. Those who were born too late to see Byrne's Talking Heads in their prime, or at all, were unimaginably treated to the band's numbers, which still sound as urgent and relevant as they must have back in the late '70s and early '80s.

Byrne was of course not reunited with his original band, but with an apt cast of 10 backup singers/musicians/dancers, also in all-white, who upped the energy, filled out all the songs as they were originally supposed to feel and brought a youthfulness to Byrne's being which was not necessarily expected.

Byrne obligatorily started the night with some of his new material, which certainly sounded better than on the record. He sounded vibrant, backed by the huge sound of his band, producing a brilliant version of "My Big Nurse," among others.

Before diving too heavily into Talking Heads material, Byrne experimented with some of his work with Brian Eno, going all the way back to 1981 to perform songs from their record "My Life in the Bush of Ghosts" to strange effect.

The songs on record are riddled with samples, or what Byrne called "field recordings" from various sources including radio voices, mountain singers and other found sounds. Byrne substituted those vocal parts with fresh vocals of his own, reviving those songs from 1981 and turning them into something completely different nearly 30 years later.

The whole crew onstage glowed radioactively in various washes of orange, green and blue, an impressive light show to match an equally impressive performance.

Byrne wowed with Talking Heads jam "Houses in Motion" from 1980's "Remain in Light," the dancers interpretively prancing around him while he summoned otherworldly sounds from his guitar. The back-up singers crafted gigantic harmonies which beefed up Byrne's vocal unintelligibly, making him sound like a preaching loudspeaker.

Byrne continued on with a song from his 1981 score to the ballet "The Catherine Wheel" and the slower "Heaven" from the Talking Heads record "Fear of Music" before getting on with some of his real timeless, classic material.

One of these timeless songs played was "Crosseyed and Painless," also from "Remain in Light," a funky excursion into jubilant oblivion. He continued with a joyous version of "Once in a Lifetime," which saw the three dancers imitate floating around Byrne in a fake body of water.

The end of the set saw another landmark hit "Life During Wartime," also from "Fear of Music," which featured an extended individual dance solo as well as Byrne's patented running in place to the song, as featured in their live mega-concert "Stop Making Sense" (1984).

Byrne apparently did not please the audience entirely with just one set of songs, appearing for an encore to uproarious applause. He jumped right into "Take Me to the River," the Al Green song famously covered on the Talking Heads' "More Songs About Buildings and Food" (1978), with the back-up vocal trio heading to the front of the stage to directly accompany Byrne in the bright white spotlight.

Next was "The Great Curve," one of the most euphoric, frantic Talking Heads songs and a welcome 2008 revival. The song was flawless, and again carried them offstage.

Again, Byrne and company returned to the stage, responding honorably to the audience's immense sound. The bunch played "Air" from "Fear of Music" before completely devastating the audience with "Burning Down the House," which isn't even a Brian Eno-collaborative song, but no one was complaining.

This officially brought down the house, but Byrne was not done. He returned to the stage for a third encore to perform "Everything that Happens," the namesake of his new record with Eno, an uplifting gospel-tinged piece suitable for both a final number and the end of a truly transcendent experience. Only if the Calvin Theatre was decked out in stained glass could it have been more of a religious experience.

Ian Nelson can be reached at inelson@student.umass.edu

David Byrne performed a wide range of new and older material during his stop at the Calvin Theatre.

Bleak is chic: how low will Hollywood go?

By Dan Zak
The Washington Post

The first big film of the year was about a monster who tramples a group of friends as they stagger through New York, which is on fire. Skyscrapers explode. The monster unleashes spawn that scamper through the subway, infecting survivors with an Ebola-like illness.

"Cloverfield" is 85 minutes of efficient grimness. Morgan Freeman does not offer comforting narration, as he did at the end of "War of the Worlds" three years ago. "For neither do men live nor die in vain," Freeman soothes in that Steven Spielberg remake. Amid the ashes: Affirmation!

Not this year. The message from Hollywood increasingly seems to be — to glibify it to a tag line — bleak is chic. Hopeless is hot.

In "Cloverfield," no reason is given for the monster's massacre. Death, randomness, mercilessness. These things just happen. Here today, gone tomorrow.

Boom.

"Cloverfield" had the biggest-ever January opening at the box office, eclipsing the 1997 rerelease of "Star Wars."

In February, the Oscar for Best Picture went to "No Country for Old Men," a highbrow slasher movie, the bleakest contender to take the top prize.

Further cementing the notion that bleak movies get made in order to strike gold, three out of four acting Oscars were given to people who played villains: Daniel Day-Lewis as the monstrous oil-man in the nihilistic "There Will Be Blood"; Tilda Swinton as the sniveling attorney in "Michael Clayton," a movie in which every person has mortgaged his soul; and Javier Bardem as the dead-eyed killer Anton Chigurh, who cattle-gunned the cast of "No Country" save for Tommy Lee Jones, whose character ended the movie on a note of despair, not death.

This year, that might count as a happy ending.

Big movies have tent-poled 2008 with a tarp of cruelty. No resolution, no absolution. Just the raw misery of the human condition. Buh-leak. We expect this of fringe foreign films, the confounding subgenre of torture porn, and many documentaries, but not the biggest hits and highest-praised movies of the year.

What does it mean that Pixar set its latest family-friendly movie, "WALL-E," on a dead planet Earth, trashed and abandoned by the human race?

The Batman franchise, which started as a kitschy carnival, morphed this summer into a dystopian nightmare in "The Dark Knight." The Joker's metier is large-scale terror and chaos. The movie is a series of agonizing moral dilemmas, capped by the conclusion that, for order to be maintained, people must view the hero as a villain. "The Dark Knight" is the highest-grossing movie of the year, and one of the best-reviewed.

Even James Bond has a case of the bleaks. In "Quantum of Solace," he has hardened into a morose assassin "blinded by inconsolable rage." Bond's jesterlike tech guru Q does not make an appearance. He is no doubt busy designing a smile for 007.

What's causing this spike in bleakness, and why are we eating it up? Is it just a reflection of the real world and its Big Problems (global warming, war, an economy gone mad, blah blah)? Or is it that

Newest crop of 'Spirit Award' noms announced

By Susan King
Los Angeles Times

HOLLYWOOD — "Ballast," an austere drama about a grieving man who forms a bond with a woman and her young son; "Frozen River," a somber tale about the relationship between two poverty-stricken women; and "Rachel Getting Married," an intimate drama about a young woman confronting her demons at her sister's nuptials, dominated the nominations for the 2009 Film Independent's Spirit Awards on Tuesday, earning six each.

In addition to receiving a nomination for best film, "Ballast," which was also a Sundance award winner, garnered nominations for best first screenplay and best director for Lance Hammer, best female lead for Tarra Riggs, best supporting male for JimMyron Ross and best cinematography for Lol Crawley.

"Rachel Getting Married" earned nominations for best feature, best director for Jonathan Demme, best first screenplay for Jenny Lumet, best female lead for Anne Hathaway and best supporting females for Rosemarie DeWitt and Debra Winger.

"Frozen River" also earned a best feature nomination along with nods for best first screenplay and best director for Courtney Hunt, best female lead for Melissa Leo, best supporting female for Misty Upham and best supporting male for Charlie McDermott.

Rounding out the best picture nominees were "Wendy and Lucy," a road drama about a young woman traveling with her dog, and "The Wrestler," a drama about an aging wrestler trying to make a comeback. Those two films open this month.

Joining Demme, Hammer and Hunt in the best director category were Ramin Bahrani for "Chop Shop" and Tom McCarthy for "The Visitor."

Nominees for best screenplay were Woody Allen for "Vicky Cristina Barcelona," Anna Boden and Ryan Fleck for "Sugar," Charlie Kaufman for "Synecdoche, New York," Howard A. Rodman for "Savage Grace" and Christopher Zalla for "Sangre de Mi Sangre."

In the best female lead category, Summer Bishil ("Towelhead") and Michelle Williams ("Wendy and Lucy") received nominations, as did Hathaway, Leo and Riggs.

Best male lead nominations went to Javier Bardem for "Vicky Cristina Barcelona," Richard Jenkins for "The Visitor," Sean Penn for "Milk," Jeremy Renner for "The Hurt Locker" and Mickey Rourke for "The Wrestler."

Penelope Cruz for "Vicky Cristina Barcelona" and Rosie Perez for "The Take" rounded out the best supporting female group. James Franco for "Milk," Anthony Mackie for "The Hurt Locker" and Haaz Sleiman for "The Visitor" also earned best supporting male nominations.

Best documentary nominations went to "The Betrayal," "Encounters at the End of the World," "Man on Wire," "The Order of Myths" and "Up the Yangtze." "The Class," "Gomorrah," "Hunger," "Secret of the Grain" and "Silent Light" earned nominations for best foreign film.

Chaos fuels 'Slumdog'

By Shayna Murphy
Collegian Staff

Some films aren't about to let viewers off the hook easily – some films want you to work for a happy ending. "Slumdog Millionaire" is that kind of film. There's a happy ending skulking around in the shadows of this underdog tale. In order to reach it, you have to travel through the thick and crime-infested slums of Mumbai, India.

For company, we have Jamal Malik (Dev Patel), an 18-year-old who's been experiencing a stretch of good fortune lately on the Indian version of "Who Wants to Be a Millionaire?"

Jamal carves out a living serving tea at a local call center, but tonight, he's one question away from walking out a millionaire.

As the country gears up to hear Jamal's final answer, some onlookers have grown suspicious. Jamal is a slumdog, after all – a kid from the Mumbai ghetto. How could he, with no formal education to speak of, be one question away from winning the grand prize?

The show's host (played to smug perfection by Anil Kapoor) certainly isn't buying it. He's convinced that Jamal has figured out a way to cheat the system. And at his behest, the police have decided to do something about it.

It's a rare film that can open with scenes of torture and still maintain its feel-good destination, but "Slumdog" stays on course. Jamal won't confess to anything under torture – mostly because he's been beaten into unconsciousness – so the police lieutenant (Irrfan Khan) sent to investigate tries a different approach.

With a video recording of the show before them, he demands that Jamal account for each response. What the lieutenant ends up with is more than just an explanation. He gets Jamal's life story.

Directed by Kristi Jacobson.

'Dark Knight' begs for more Ledger

By Jen Chaney
The Washington Post

"The Dark Knight" may technically be a Batman movie. But everyone knows that this comic-inspired sequel belongs to Heath Ledger, the Australian actor who portrays the Joker with such memorable, maniacal relish that he may very well earn his second Academy Award nomination for the role.

Most also are aware that, sadly, Ledger died last January, which put Warner Bros. in the awkward position of attempting to posthumously promote his work in the film without appearing to exploit the deceased.

The studio undoubtedly struggled with that same delicate dance while putting together the DVD ($29 single disc; $35 special edition) and Blu-ray ($36) releases of "The Dark Knight," arriving in stores Tuesday.

Perhaps as a result, the discs' extras focus largely on the technical wizardry and special effects behind the box office smash and decline to comment on Ledger's passing or the impact it had on cast and crew.

Call me morbidly curious, but given all the speculation about the alleged toll that playing the Joker took on Ledger's psyche, I had hoped to see more behind-the-scenes footage of the star at work, or perhaps even a few on-set interviews.

The absence of any extensive insight into his performance -- or even a brief tribute to his career -- leaves a gaping, undeniable hole at the center of these "Dark Knight" releases, one that I found hard to overlook.

Still, there are some solid reasons to recommend "The Dark Knight," including the quality of the movie itself.

As the first feature film ever shot in part with Imax cameras, its sleek, slick vision of Gotham transfers especially stunningly to Blu-ray. (The six Imax action sequences also appear on the second disc of the DVD special edition.)

Frankly, getting to watch the knock-out, opening bank robbery sequence over and over again, in any format, is worth the cost of at least a rental, if not a purchase.

The strongest special features appear on Blu-ray in the two one-hour-plus "Gotham Uncovered" featurettes, which explain how the movie's wide array of explosions, Batmobile mash-ups and 18-wheeler flips were created for the big screen. All of the segments can be viewed individually or in tandem with the film itself, a particularly nice touch. (Only two of the featurettes show up on the DVD special edition.)

The rest of the Blu-ray extras include six episodes of "Gotham Tonight," the faux cable news show featured in the movie (these segments will be most enticing to fans of Anthony Michael Hall, who plays anchorman Mike Engel); photo galleries; a 46-minute, intermittently engaging documentary about the history behind Batman's gadgets; and a second 46-minute documentary about the psychology that motivates "The Dark Knight's" characters. (Allow me to summarize: The Joker is totally nuts. The end.)

The Blu-ray also promises a set of BD-Live features – accessible via the player's Internet connection – that, among other things, allow viewers to create their own commentary tracks. Cool, right? Well, it would have been if they weren't such a hassle to access.

For some reason, Warner wants users to register on their Web site before they can dive into the bulk of the material, a process that wouldn't work when I tried.

When I sent an e-mail to the studio's BD-Live support desk, it bounced back. (A Warner representative was looking into the issue but did not respond before deadline.)

Given how eager the studios are to encourage Blu-ray use, the folks at Warner Bros. should have made this process as easy and engaging as possible for consumers, especially on what may be their most anticipated release of the holiday season.

Bonus Most Likely to Induce Vertigo: Several of the "Gotham Uncovered" featurettes deliver major adrenaline rushes, particularly "Hong Kong Jump," which shows stuntman Buster Reeves swan diving from the top of an enormous building in downtown Chicago while attached, via bungee cord, to a helicopter.

The Chicago leap was merely a rehearsal for what would have been a jump during the Hong Kong shoot, one that ultimately got scrapped for reasons director Christopher Nolan describes as "bureaucratic." (Oh, and if you're wondering, Christian Bale really did stand on the precipice of that skyscraper in China. So don't ever say Batman lacks courage.).

Bleakness dominates

Monster-flick "Cloverfield" is one in a long line of Hollywood films that have scored acclaim and box-office success despite very depressing subject matter.

Hollywood sees bleak and apocalyptic movies as easy to market?

We could, perhaps, blame Cormac McCarthy, who has become the muse of A-list directors and producers. McCarthy is the celebrated novelist whose scalpel-sharp prose carves out any hope from his somber yarns, which usually end with some kind of violent judgment day.

He was at the Oscars in February, applauding as the film adaptation of his book won Best Picture. He may be doing that again in the next couple of years. Two more McCarthy adaptations are in development. A third, "The Road," is being prepped for a 2009 release. The plot?

The end of the world. A father and son hack their way through a post-apocalyptic wasteland.

Apocalypse now? Yep.

"Talk about reality," marvels director John Hillcoat "People are living the apocalypse. The homeless, in every city in the world now. The underclass. And that, to me, is in Cormac's book."

This was in August, before he had to lay down his baby at the altar of the Test Audience, America's oracle for divining a movie's marketability. Test audiences make Hillcoat jittery. Talking with him, you can imagine a worst-case scenario:

How would you describe the movie to your friends?

"Uh. Bleak."

Would you recommend it to them?

"Only if they want to watch, for two hours, a father and son encounter every horror on the road to hell."

Allow us to be presumptuous. The book is repetitively bleak. Ash, cold, starvation, repeat. The story "IS" bleak, but it's actually about what makes us human in the most bleak situation," says Hillcoat. "So it actually amplifies humanity because it's a love story between a father and son. ... It's set in this extreme world, but all that does is amplify that basic human drama."

Maybe that's why we're weirdly attracted to bleakness. It gives us a strong hit of humanity. It strips away the banal. It raises our pedestrian struggles to grandiose heights. At least that's what directors might have us believe.

The films rolling out through the end of the year continue the pessimism. In "Synecdoche, New York," writer-director Charlie Kaufman seems to conclude that we are in control of nothing. "Defiance" and "The Reader" are about the unstoppable machinery of the Holocaust. In "Doubt," a nun leads a crusade against a priest whom she suspects of pedophilia and arrives not at a verdict but a moral abyss. Then there's the remake of "The Day the Earth Stood Still," updating Cold War paranoia to ecological paranoia; the trailer shows Manhattan going dark and infrastructure being vaporized by an ominous cloud.

Add "ominous cloud" to the list of things that make on-screen New York — and us — miserable.

Rumor has it that "Blood Meridian" and "Cities of the Plain," two more Cormac McCarthy adaptations, are being developed by directors Todd Field (of the grief-riddled "In the Bedroom") and Andrew Dominik (of the saga of dread "The Assassination of Jesse James by the Coward Robert Ford"). Graham King, producer of "The Departed," is on location with "Edge of Darkness," about a detective investigating the murder of his daughter. Scott Rudin, producer of "No Country," is behind this season's "Doubt" and "The Reader" and is working on "Blood Meridian" and "Goat," based on a memoir about the savagery of fraternity hazing.

These movies will not be billed as "The Most Depressing Movie You Will Ever See." We don't go to the movies to be depressed. We do go to movies that have A-list casts, are an "official selection of the Cannes Film Festival," or ask us, cutely, "Why So Serious?" ("The Dark Knight" teaser poster.)

How long will we be stuck in this malaise-saturated market?

"It seems it's no coincidence that this trend is hitting in films now," says the Oscar guru Tom O'Neil, a blogger for TheEnvelope.com, a Los Angeles Times awards site, who thinks we're seeing a delayed rush of films inspired by the mood of the Bush years. "Right now, the money is on 'Benjamin Button' winning Best Picture. If that happens, we're seeing a return to the traditional Oscar formula. But if we see 'The Dark Knight' win, that's going to tell us this thing is going to last longer."

"The Curious Case of Benjamin Button," while harrowing in parts, is a lush, emotional epic starring Brad Pitt and Cate Blanchett. Another bright contender is "Slumdog Millionaire." Director Danny Boyle, who made "28 Days Later" (infection kills humanity) and "Sunshine" (solar burnout threatens Earth), brings a film with this message: Love is destiny. Because of its sheer joy, everyone expects it to succeed.

The mainstreaming of bleakness has caused a bit of retaliation from Mike Leigh, the rogue British director whose first film, in 1971, was titled "Bleak Moments," and whose movies since have been stark set pieces of life's little brutalities. He has just released a relentlessly upbeat film "Happy-Go-Lucky" is about a woman who skips like a cheery pebble over the murk of the world.

"I wanted to make what I've come to call an anti-miserablist movie," Leigh told an audience at the Telluride Film Festival in September. "We're in tough times. We're destroying the planet and each other, and there's a great deal to lament. But there are people out there who are getting on with it and being positive."

Miserablism. That's the word. It's artful. It's attractive. And perhaps that's the key to the chic of bleak. Why else do we click through photo galleries of shell-shocked stock traders, and California wildfires, and the latest unrests from abroad? Why else do studios cheerlead Oscar campaigns for titles as darkly blunt as "Doubt"?

There's something majestic about watching the suffering of people (especially when portrayed by great actors). And there's something self-satisfying about sitting through a movie, however bleak, and enduring it, and declaring it beautiful and important.

Clichés hamper film

pulls away for an aerial view of the city's many tin-roofed shacks.

Jamal and Salim know their surroundings well, which turns crucial later, when anti-Muslim riots erupt across the city. They escape, but several are killed in the riots, including their mother (Sanchita Choudary).

Orphaned and destitute, the boys take to scraping by on the streets. But Mumbai, as it turns out, isn't a great place to be an orphan. While hiding out they cross paths with Latika (Rubina Ali), a young girl also left abandoned by the riots. They band together for survival, but the perils of the city prove too potent to escape entirely.

When a local gangster (Ankue Vikal) finds the kids in a garbage heap, "Slumdog" splits into something more harrowing.

He fishes them out with ice cold bottles of soda and quickly transports them to his orphan farm, where a gruesome fate awaits the boy with the best singing ability.

Director Danny Boyle has hit pay dirt with gritty material like this before. His 1996 cult classic "Trainspotting" followed a group of Edinburgh-based junkies down the rabbit hole of addiction, led by then-newcomer Ewan McGregor.

With "28 Days Later" (2004), Boyle traced a highly contagious virus as it laid siege to the English countryside, turning every day folks into ravenous flesh-eaters.

"Trainspotting" and "28 Days Later" center on the living dead, both literally and figuratively. While "Slumdog" shares in some of the same motifs, the film is alive with a sense of optimism and good cheer.

This is best evidenced later, once the boys reach adulthood. As an adult, Jamal has sunk easily into the life of an average Joe, but Salim (Madhur Mittal) has taken a different path. He's traded in his soul for success as a gangster. Winning would afford Jamal the chance to reconnect not only with his brother, but also with Latika (Freida Pinto), now his love interest.

None of this should cause you to mistake "Slumdog" for something it isn't. The film is a familiar one, struggling to assert itself over a script leaden with clichés. What helps set the film apart is its exotic location. On more familiar terrain, "Slumdog" wouldn't pack the same wallop. The film also draws strength from its cast of unknowns, many of whom are Bollywood regulars.

"Slumdog" is structured strongly through flashbacks, spurred on by the questions Jamal receives on the show. As luck would have it, each question happens to coincide, in chronological order, with a childhood trauma.

Is this mere coincidence or a massive script cop-out? Screenwriter Simon Beaufoy ("The Full Monty") is guilty of taking the easy way out. Although the flashbacks are hardly dull, the plot grows limp around them.

"Slumdog" never fully catches its stride until the end, when the film is forced to live in the present.

Since the release of "Slumdog," Mumbai has been stage to a different kind of drama, this one of greater consequence. The dangerous, chaotic visions of Mumbai offered up in Boyle's film is not so far removed from the way the city is depicted at present in the media.

But Boyle snares up something else in his film – something seen in the shack houses and busy streets visited throughout. Chaos may lie at the heart of the city, but its chaos that fuels the city's charm.

Indie films receive annual nods

to Kaufman's "Synecdoche, New York."

Film Independent's Spirit Awards is a "celebration honoring films made by filmmakers who embody independence and who dare to challenge the status quo." All eligible films must be at least 70 minutes, and the cost of the completed film – including post-production – must be less than $20 million. The film must have been shown in a commercial theater for at least one week this year or been screened at one of several film festivals, including Film Independent's Los Angeles Film Festival, Sundance and Toronto.

"We are proud again to spotlight so many outstanding films from such a diverse group of filmmakers," said Dawn Hudson, executive director of Film Independent. "This is truly the year of original voices, among both veterans and new filmmakers."

Since its inception in 1985, the Spirit Awards have grown in significance as part of Hollywood's award season. Several past Spirit winners have gone on to earn Oscars, including "Juno" writer Diablo Cody and best actress winners Charlize Theron ("Monster"), Halle Berry ("Monster's Ball") and Hilary Swank ("Boys Don't Cry").

The 2009 Film Independent's Spirit Awards ceremony will be in a tent on the beach in Santa Monica on Feb. 21. It will not air live on commercial-free on the Independent Film Channel at 5 p.m. PT. A condensed version will air later that evening on AMC.

Mickey Rourke stars in "The Wrestler." The film has been nominated for multiple Spirit Awards.

into the second half on a jumper at the buzzer to bring the score to 31-30.

The Rockets retook the lead at 42-41 with 12:33 remaining in the second half on a basket by Kent.

Kent scored 13 points for UT and had seven rebounds, five assists and three steals. He shot 3-of-5 from beyond the arc.

The Rockets built a six-point lead before UMass fought back. Harris hit a 3-point basket to pull the Minutemen within one point. Gaffney then gave the Minutemen a 52-51 lead with 7:39 remaining with a dunk after a steal on the ensuing possession.

Amos scored 13 points with four rebounds and four assists.

Anyijong scored six points, had seven rebounds and took two key charges in the game.

The two teams tied with 28 rebounds each. UMass held a 12-6 advantage in offensive rebounds while the Rockets had a 22-16 advantage in defensive rebounds.

The Minutemen shot 9-of-10 from the free-throw line but made just 20-of-53 shots from the field. UT made 1-of-2 free throws and shot 26-of-48 from the field.

UMass hosts Boston College (6-2) at 8:30 p.m. on Saturday at the Mullins Center.

UMass' David Gibbs fights for a loose ball against Toledo's Ridley Johnson in the Minutemen's 57-56 loss last night. The freshman took just one shot in the loss as he saw just eight minutes off the bench.

Lawrence provides spark off bench, 12 points not enough

and White only grabbed five steals, while the Friars had 12.

"I just think we came out flat," starting guard Kim Benton said of UMass' play. "It starts at the top and I kind of blame myself as point guard because I didn't get the team together but we just couldn't get it going."

A bright spot for UMass was its efficient use of foul shots. The Minutewomen scored 18 points on 90 percent shooting at the charity stripe alone but once again, Providence was right behind them, scoring 16 points from free throws.

"It's being able to come out and get it done," Dacko remarked. "When you play in a game uniform, you've got to be a gamer, that's when it counts. It's something that we need to work on and [we need to] stay focused and come out tomorrow ready to go."

Sophomore forward Stephanie Lawrence had season-highs in both points (12) and rebounds (5). At 6-foot-1, Lawrence was another much-needed body in the post.

With Wright in early foul trouble, which ultimately led to fouling out, Lawrence played 26 minutes, her longest stretch of playing time this season.

UMass has little time to think about this defeat, as it travels to Providence, R.I., to participate in the Brown Classic. The Minutewomen will face Long Island (3-3) on Saturday and host Brown (1-6) on Sunday.

of offensive firepower. UConn's opponents have manufactured over 100 shots than the Huskies leading to 17 more goals and 29 more assists.

UConn, unlike most of the opponents the Minutemen have faced, don't swap time between their two net minders. Junior Beau Erickson has seen most of the playing time in net, starting 12 of the Huskies 14 games. Though Erickson has struggled while posting a .887 save percentage, a 3.74 goals against average and a 3-9 record.

But freshman goaltender Brad McInnis could see increased playing time if the Huskies' fortunes don't improve. McInnis has only started two games, but has posted far better numbers than his goaltending partner.

McInnis sports an impressive .945 save percentage and a 1.86 goals against average, but in only two games played.

The Huskies are both weak on the penalty kill and the power play. UConn has only a 13 percent success rate with the man advantage and owns an 82 percent penalty kill rate, which UMass should be able to capitalize on.

Meanwhile, UMass coach Don Cahoon hopes that his top line of Alex Berry, Cory Quirk and James Marcou can propel the team offensively.

"Our biggest focus is on execution and doing the things that we're capable of doing," Cahoon said. "It's one thing to know and it's another thing to do it – we need to start doing it."

Avebe, Jones ineffective as Providence shut down Wright

up in Wright's wake. Avebe played only six minutes and recorded one rebound and didn't take a shot. Jones, meanwhile, put up similar numbers as Wright; six rebounds and two points.

"We didn't have any post presence at all," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "We've got to keep our posts in the game, we can't afford to have them get into foul trouble, and that hurt us."

Against a team that had them beat in size, the Minutewomen utilized the dribble-drive offense to blow past their opponents and drive straight to the hoop. The problem was, once they got there, they couldn't make the shots.

In the first half, the Minutewomen took advantage of a Friar team that failed to catch up to its opponents' offense. Fortunately for Providence, they didn't have to as UMass shot 22 percent from the field in the first half with most of the shots coming in the paint.

Although the Minutewomen shot 34 percent for the game, with their offense improving as part of the second-half comeback, the majority of the team's misses came inside on easy shots.

"We've got to be able to finish, we're going right by people," Dacko said. "That's why I told the kids to take a deep breath in the huddle. The hard part's getting by, the easy part's finishing. And we got by everybody, but we just missed layup after layup."

While the Minutewomen failed to execute on their play in the paint, their outside shots didn't fare any better. UMass went 3-of-18 from behind the 3-point line, failing to take the pressure away from the post play when it was struggling.

The majority of UMass' struggles came in the first half when Providence quickly erased a 7-6 deficit to the tune of a 21-2 run. The run was not a product of a lack of offense. Rather, the Minutewomen were able to get many of the shots they wanted in the first half by driving on the Friars defense.

But, as was the story of the game, UMass failed to finish.

Nick O'Malley can be reached at nomalley@student.umass.edu.

UMass' Stephanie Lawrence drives against Providence's Shantee Darrian in the Minutewomen's 75-63 loss. The sophomore came off the bench and scored a season high 12 points as well as grabbing five rebounds.

UMass drops its fifth in a row, falls to UT

Last-second push fails, Toledo wins at buzzer

BY JASON MACK
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

TOLEDO, Ohio — The Massachusetts men's basketball team suffered another last-second defeat last night in a 57-56 loss to Toledo.

The Minutemen (1-5) took the lead with 18 seconds remaining, but UT (2-5) scored on a tip-in after a missed shot as time expired.

UT took a 55-54 lead on a reverse layup by senior Jonathan Amos coming out of a timeout with 3:24 remaining.

| UMass | 56 |

The teams battled without a basket for the next three minutes. The Rockets forced a jump ball with 29 seconds remaining and quickly turned the ball over.

Senior forward Tony Gaffney was fouled with 18 seconds remaining and hit both free throws to give UMass a 56-55 lead.

The Minutemen had a foul to give and used it on guard Tyrone Kent with nine seconds remaining.

Kent took the ball on the inbound pass and drove to the hoop. He missed a layup with one second remaining, and sophomore forward Justin Anyijong tipped it at the buzzer for the 57-56 win. The student section erupted onto the court following the buzzer beater.

Senior Chris Lowe had a game-high 15 points with four steals for the Minutemen, while junior guard Ricky Harris had 13 points. Gaffney scored 11 points with eight rebounds, and freshman center Tyrell Lynch added a game-high nine rebounds.

The Minutemen forced a total of 20 turnovers in the game but committed 18 of their own.

The game was the opening of UT's recently renovated Savage Arena. The crowd was into the game early as the Rockets jumped out to an 8-2 lead. Anthony Gurley cut into the lead with a three-pointer to make it 8-5.

The Minutemen took a 15-14 lead with 9 minutes, 40 seconds remaining on a 3-pointer from Gary Correia that bounced off the top of the backboard before falling in. The Rockets tied the game at 29-29 on a jumper from freshman Ian Salter and took a 31-30 lead with 12 seconds remaining in the half on a layup by senior guard Ridley Johnson.

But Lowe gave UMass the lead back heading

UM falls to Providence

Doing the little things right seems to be the biggest problem for the Massachusetts women's basketball team. The Minutewomen suffered their first home loss of the season, losing to Providence, 75-63.

|---|---|
| PC | 75 |
| UMass | 63 |

UMass (3-4) shot 34 percent from the field and was bothered by a larger Friar (3-4) team. However, the bulk of the Providence post players weren't even in the starting lineup.

Guard Lola Wells (5-foot-6) is one of the smallest Friars on the roster but she played bigger than her stature leads on. The freshman tallied nine points and a team-high four steals against the Minutewomen.

The discouraging thing for UMass coach Marnie Dacko is that Wells scored nine points against UMass, while she's shot just 18-percent on the season from the field.

"I'm very disappointed with the way that we came out of the gates," Dacko said of how the Minutewomen started the game. "We've got two seniors [Stefanie Gerardot and Sakera Young] out there leading in turnovers [six and five, respectively] and that just can't happen. They work hard everyday and they've got to come mentally prepared to play a game and not just 20 minutes."

UMass looked anemic when shooting the ball and seemed to take numerous ill-advised shots in an effort to stifle its larger opponents. Sophomore forward Teya Wright is averaging 11 points per game for the Minutewomen but was limited to just two points against Providence.

Wright went 1-for-9 from the field, missing easy shots. At 6-foot-1, she usually works her way into the post to power the ball in for a layup. But against the Friars, Wright was uncharacteristically overmatched in the paint, though just two of her eight missed field-goals were blocked.

However, Wright did cause the most turnovers for the Minutewomen, grabbing three steals by game's end.

Typically a pesky opponent for teams who are slow on the ball – 8.3 steals per game – the Maroon

Friars limit inside threat

Minutewomen's mental mistakes factor into loss

BY NICK O'MALLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

As an undersized unit, the Massachusetts women's basketball team employs a great deal of speed in its lineups. However, the team still relies on the few post players they have to carry the team inside.

And when that foundation fails, so do the Minutewomen.

In its 75-63 loss to Providence, UMass had its fair share of problems. However, much of the team's struggles came inside, where the Minutewomen's post play succumbed to that of a larger Friar team.

UMass, however, blamed their lack of success inside on its mental mistakes, not their physical stature.

"I don't think it was a matter of their size, I just think we weren't ready to play," said senior Stefanie Gerardot. "We played bigger and stronger in Colorado and Minnesota and we played – for the most part – pretty well against them. Size isn't the issue, it's our mentality, that's the issue."

Size was discounted as a disadvantage for the Minutewomen when it became apparent that all of Providence's players, regardless of size, were making contributions inside. The Friars' Chelsea Marandola, a 5-foot-8 guard, had a game-high 10 rebounds, eight of which came in the first half.

Sophomore Teya Wright, the team's main inside presence, was limited to two points and only one offensive rebound as she was a non-factor offensively. Wright was 1-of-9 from the field and did not attempt a free throw.

Meanwhile, the team's other inside threats, sophomore Valerie Avebe and freshman Nicole Jones, failed to step

UMass will host UConn Friday night at 7 p.m. at the Mullins Center, its third-of-five consecutive home games. The Minutemen are 3-3 this season when playing at the Mullins Center.

Minutemen look to rebound after loss to St. Lawrence

BY RYAN FLEMING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Coming into Friday's game against Connecticut, the Massachusetts hockey team is coming fresh off one of its worst performances of the season.

In UMass' 4-3 loss to St. Lawrence last Friday, the Minutemen (6-6-1, 4-4-1 Hockey East) seemed unable to generate offensive scoring chances, stop opposing attackers and made foolish penalties in the third period – to even further add to their sloppy play.

Because of the natural rivalry between the two schools, this game means much more than just simply a win and a loss.

"On their schedule, because we're a Hockey East team, it's one of the biggest games of the year," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "Our guys can't get bogged down on that and they certainly need to be ready for it."

The Minutemen look to improve their non-conference record as they face UConn at the Mullins Center Friday night.

The Huskies (4-10, 3-5 Atlantic Hockey) are coming off a disappointing loss of their own, losing to Sacred Heart after maintaining a third-period lead.

UConn's leading scorer, freshman Marcello Ranallo, is tied for the team lead in points (12). The top six point leaders on the Huskies are all underclassmen.

Forwards Jason Krispel, Andrew Olson, Chris Ochoa and Michael Coppola have a combined 39 points between them.

With their youth and inexperience comes the lack

Mass Attack playing down to competition

Finding success when skating against ranked opponents

BY MELISSA TURTINEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

There is no such thing as a guaranteed win, even if certain teams are heavily favored to win a match up.

For the Massachusetts hockey team (6-6-1, 4-4-1 Hockey East) being favored to win doesn't help them out, at all.

Three of the Minutemen's six losses have come from teams they were expected to beat, the other three came from higher-ranked teams in then-No. 12 Michigan State (Oct. 10), then-No. 4 Boston College (Nov. 21) and then-No. 13 Vermont (Nov. 25).

This Friday the Minutemen have a chance to redeem themselves when they host Connecticut (4-10-0, 3-5-0 Atlantic Hockey) at the Mullins Center at 7 p.m.

"Who are we as a program not to get up for anybody. That's nonsense, if these guys think they're something because they beat BC one time or they beat [Boston University] one time that is such a huge mistake," UMass coach Don Cahoon said after UMass' loss to St. Lawrence regarding the teams' current struggle against lesser opponents.

"We talk about that all the time. They're quote-on-quote Division I hockey players. There are Division I hockey players that become great teams and there are Division I hockey players that become so-so teams. I haven't seen the great team yet. I've seem some great performances, but I haven't seen the great team yet. I'm dying to see it."

Since the start of the season, UMass has struggled against opponents that are seen as easy wins, but in Hockey East play the Minutemen learned quickly that is not the case. On Oct. 31 they hosted Providence and sat back and watched the Friars score two quick goals in the first 10 minutes of the game – the Minutemen came back and won 9-4, but the Friars continued to challenge them throughout the game. The Minutemen learned their lesson from the first game of the weekend's set and beat the Friars the next night, 5-1.

That mentality didn't carry into the next weekend when UMass traveled to Merrimack and lost, 3-1. Merrimack, a team who tends to sit at the bottom of Hockey East rankings, didn't let up. The Minutemen didn't play to their level, that combined with being called for preventable penalties gave them no chance of coming out with a win.

On Nov. 15, UMass-Lowell outplayed the Minutemen for nearly the entire game. Although the River Hawks are a more formidable opponent than Providence and Merrimack, the UMass couldn't play up to their speed and lost, 2-0. The day after Thanksgiving (Nov. 28) the Minutemen lost, 4-3, to non-conference opponent St. Lawrence (ECAC).

The team deserves a little credit – they have a record of 3-3-1 against ranked opponents and 3-1-1 against opponents ranked in the top-5. Against top teams the Minutemen play their game, control play and if the team is better, they play up to their opponents' level. The challenge in ranked teams seems to spark UMass' play, but the Minutemen let their guard down when it comes to less challenging opponents.

This weekend brings another opponent that the Minutemen are expected to beat, but with the way the last two weeks have been going they need to go into the game like they did against then-No. 1 Boston University (Nov. 14, 5-1 win for UMass), not like they are playing non-conference Connecticut.

UM exec. office receives raise

Pres. Wilson among salary increases, according to MSP

By Nitina Heikkinen
Collegian Staff

Despite a weakening national economy threatening the budgets of colleges across the country, the salaries of public research university presidents have increased on average by 7.6 percent to $427,000, according to a recent report by The Chronicle of Higher Education.

University of Massachusetts President Jack Wilson's compensation was somewhat lower than the national average; his base salary for 2007-2008 was $360,000. However, Wilson also received additional compensation which included the use of a car, a $45,000 house, $25,000 in deferred compensation, and $43,200 in retirement pay, according to figures reported in The Springfield Republican. Taken together with his base salary, Wilson's total compensation amounts to $473,200 in 2008.

Wilson's income last year totaled $467,634, meaning his total compensation has risen by approximately $5,566 or 1.2 percent, according to The Chronicle of Higher Education.

In 2004, when Wilson became president of the University, he was the highest-paid state employee with a base salary of $349,999.

Though Wilson's compensation may seem high to some critics, UMass spokesman Robert Connolly said Wilson's total compensation was almost $5,000 less than in fiscal year 2007, citing a Chronicle report.

"His total compensation has actually declined if you look at the data from the past two years," said Connolly.

Wilson's total compensation is also significantly lower than that of University of Connecticut President Michael Hogan. Hogan's base salary in 2007-2008 was $550,000 and his total compensation was $610,000. UConn is one of the schools UMass compares itself in order to determine appropriate benchmarks, according to UMass Board of Trustee Edward W. Collins Jr.

As public universities across the U.S. grapple with tighter budgets, a surprising number of university presidents are declining to accept their raises. Some are even giving money back to their universities in recognition of the difficult financial situations facing their schools, according to a recent article in The New York Times.

UMass is no exception. This year, Wilson declined to accept a performance bonus of $54,000, said Connolly.

Hogan also recently declined a performance bonus of $100,000 from the UConn Board of Trustees because of the difficult economic times, according to Lisa Troyer, UConn chief of staff and senior associate to the president.

"In light of the economic downturn and decline in appropriations, he felt it was the right thing to do," said Troyer.

The $100,000 bonus money was contributed to the graduate department because Hogan felt the program would be the most vulnerable to budget cuts.

"He felt it was the best use of the state's money," Troyer said.

While some public research university presidents find they have money to give back, the Massachusetts Society of Professors (MSP), a 1,400 member faculty and librarian union at UMass, is still waiting to hear whether a proposed 2.5 percent salary increase will be approved by the state legislature, according to union President Max Page, who is a professor of art at UMass.

"We accepted the offer [of a 2.5 percent increase] because of the national economic crisis and budget cuts, we felt it wasn't the right time to demand more," said Page.

He said the salary increase they sought was not enough to meet the cost of living, especially in the Amherst area. The union originally sought a raise of 4 percent during negotiations.

In a recent MSP press release, the union cited figures, stating administrators in the UMass President's Office in Boston had received on average a 7.46 percent raise in 2008, and that Wilson received a 15 percent raise in his base salary.

"This proves once again that when a university president says there is 'no money,' he means there is no money for you," said Page.

"If everyone in the President's Office had received the same 3 percent raise most other UMass workers got, that would have made over $300,000 available for new faculty, additional scholarships or enhanced programs for students," said Randall Phillis, vice president of the MSP.

Connolly said the figures were inaccurate.

"That's completely incorrect," he said. "I don't know where those numbers are coming from."

He stated that administrators received at most a 3 percent increase in salary from a cost of living raise last year.

Connolly emphasized that Wilson felt the frustration of the UMass faculty and employees, and desired to resolve conflicts concerning the union contract.

"[Wilson] is a strong advocate of appropriate compensation, but we are looking at an incredibly bleak financial situation," he said.

Class surveys 'everyday life of students' at UMass

By Colin McDonald
Collegian Staff

Over the last few weeks, Professor Ekra Miezan and his class of six students have conducted a survey to assess their educational experience at UMass.

The 33-question study covered a broad spectrum of subjects that play a part in the everyday life of students. Questions ranged from feelings about advisors to assessing peer relations to campus law enforcement.

"I want my students to be curious about what's going on around them," said Miezan. "I want them to analyze critical issues."

In Miezan's class, students work to learn how to conceptualize an issue, and then how to develop a way to analyze the data.

Because the class is so small, Miezan has plenty of time to help each of his students individually. As each semester comes to its end, Miezan allows his students to decide upon an issue they desire to investigate.

"We feel what students should focus on are local issues," said Matt Sullivan, a senior communications major in the class. "In this project, we wanted to investigate how issues on campus made them feel."

The students designed a survey to cover a wide variety of campus issues. They then interpreted these results in relation to race, income level and the age of students on campus.

Miezan has taught the class important professional skills for data measurement and analysis.

Among the other tools used to collect and organize the data, the students learned to use a program called Statistical Package for Social Sciences (SPSS). Computer programs like this are used by experts in many fields to help interpret data.

The first section of the questionnaire covered topics relating to academics, classes, advisors, grading systems and peer relations.

According to the survey, most students agree that UMass offers a wide variety of majors and classes, the grading system is fair and the average workload is acceptable.

Though students felt it was sometimes difficult to develop class-based relationships with other students, most agreed that their peers are generally respectful in class. Students seemed less pleased by tuition rates and the difficulty to enroll in classes outside their majors.

The final interpretation of these results in relation to race, income and age seemed universal. All students, regardless of these three issues, felt similarly about this section of the questionnaire.

"A large part of our data came from communications majors, but if we could get more results we'd have liked to seen how other majors felt about their grading systems," said senior Brian Hartley.

The class also found it interesting that higher income and lower income families agreed that UMass tuition was not affordable.

When asked about student resources, Miezan's class discovered that although the library staff is very helpful, students are still having some issues finding the books they need.

Most students also felt that there are not enough computers in the library. Miezan's class related this to another part of the survey, in which they found students largely prefer the Internet as their primary research tool.

"It's no wonder why they want more computers in the library," said Miezan.

A third section of the study asked how students felt about transportation, police control and parking issues.

They found that a large majority of students find public transportation at UMass very efficient. Though the figures were close, the data suggested that slightly more students feel there's too much police control on campus. Many feel that parking fees and traffic control are unfair and too rigidly enforced.

"I was interested in the parking issues," said UMass junior Joseph Johnson. "I remember when parking cost less as you became a junior and senior, but I was upset when I found prices are now the same for everyone. I was interested in how others felt about it."

The student researchers also investigated residential issues at UMass.

They found that a majority of students felt the locations of dorms are convenient and that off-campus housing is too expensive. Two out of three UMass students agree that the quality of food in the dining commons is acceptable.

The study also assessed how students feel about campus and national news coverage.

About half of the students said they are "heavy readers" of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian, and the other half are "light readers."

Data showed 77.7 percent of students felt The Collegian reports issues important to students, while 18.5 percent disagreed.

About one third said they are heavy readers of major newspapers while two-thirds are light readers, which includes not reading at all.

When analyzing all this data in relation to gender and race, the class discovered it didn't affect how students felt about the issues in the questionnaire.

"Whether they are white, black, Asian, or Hispanic, they tend to see the issues the same way. Race wasn't an issue," Miezan said.

The same was also true of family income and student age neither proved to be a factor. Regardless of how much money a student's family made or whether they were seniors or freshmen, they viewed the issues in the survey in the same light.

The class would have liked a larger sample size to gather information from. Of the 300 students contacted about the questionnaire, the class only received 157 back. They believe the results of the survey are still very accurate, but expressed a desire to expand the research if they could do it again.

"We are very pleased with our results," Miezan concluded.

UM studies impact of climate change on construction

By Adam P. Coulter
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts researchers are working to stay one step ahead of climate change by studying the negative impact it can have on the infrastructure of towns and cities.

Having a better understanding of the unique challenges related to climate change may prevent disasters such as Hurricane Katrina and help to answer the larger question of how to deal with extreme weather in the future, the researchers posit.

"We need to plan for more intense rainstorms, more flooding, less dependable rainfall – more intense weather, that is, more variable year to year," said Elisabeth Hamin, an associate professor of regional planning at UMass.

Hamin recently completed a study on the subject with colleagues in Australia. Their findings suggest there are advantages to towns and cities looking forward when designing infrastructure that can stand up to drastic changes in weather conditions, as opposed to the common practice of designing with past extremes in mind.

"The key advantage is that environmental conditions of the next hundred years are not going to be the same as the last hundred," said Hamin. "So if we design for the old parameters, we'll get it wrong."

On Dec. 2, President-elect Barack Obama said his incoming Chief of Staff Rahm Emanuel promised the nation's governors that federal money will be provided through an economic recovery plan to help rebuild or repair bridges, roads and schools.

"We need to rebuild America," Emanuel said, according to The New York Times. "We need to build those critical areas today to do it, and an economic recovery act has to do that."

Therefore, Hamin believes this is the perfect time to put the study's findings into practice and to start planning for intense weather with the new principles.

"Under President Obama, we may invest billions into new (much needed) infrastructure," she said. "So, now is the time to be sure that the criteria we use to build it is the right criteria to meet coming needs."

The study Hamin recently completed was designed to help community leaders of 68 fast-growing, medium-sized coastal towns in Australia devise a plan for the sometimes severe changes being predicted.

To put it into perspective, Hamin says there are housing developments down under that are just getting under way, but are predicted to be under water in 10 years. To prevent these occurrences, proactive steps can be taken.

"One of our first responsibilities is to reduce our greenhouse gas emissions," said Hamin. "And, good planning and zoning is essential in that."

Land use patterns encouraging transit and walking, and allowing small-scale renewable energy production will also help to change the extreme weather predictions ahead. Moving the houses off the coast is proposed as well.

"For coastal areas that are not heavily built, we can have 'planned retreat' where we plan for moving the homes inland over the years as seas rise," said Hamin.

Hamin is currently collaborating with Craig Nicolson, a professor of natural resources conservation at UMass, on a project that will assist New England towns in understanding how certain vulnerabilities might contribute to climate challenges related to climate change. These vulnerabilities can be physical as well as social.

"People who are older or poorer tend to have fewer ways to respond to disaster," said Hamin. "Even with the same 'weather,' those of us who are not elderly or poor experience less impact event if it's the same weather event."

A good example of this, she said, is the successful evacuation of the wealthier people in New Orleans during Hurricane Katrina.

"It's not that the rich didn't have flooding, but they had cars to get them out of town, so [they] were less impacted," she said.

When building infrastructure and planning ahead for drastic weather that might negatively affect those projects, it has now become easier for municipalities to utilize the climate change predictions.

Until recently, if mayors and planning commission members wanted to see climate change predictions for their towns, they couldn't do it easily. Past global change models divided the Earth's surface into huge grids, as large as some New England towns.

But now, details on a smaller scale are available.

"In the last five to eight years, experts have been downscaling the global grid data to provide predictions useful on a more local level," said Nicolson.

The new tools and expertise of researchers such as Hamlin and Nicolson will help to better predict and therefore plan for such events as higher storm water levels and floods.

"These kinds of things can now be anticipated," Nicolson said. "We can prevent some of the most awful surprises by looking ahead instead of backward in time."

International organization Food Not Bombs (FNB), run entirely by volunteers, serves food to locals in front of the courthouse bus stop in Northampton. FNB collects and redistributes food to feed the hungry in an effort to combat world hunger. The organization's slogan is, "food is a right, not a privilege."

Food Not Bombs provides free grub in Amherst and NoHo

One international organization is reaching out to improve society like no other, right here in the Pioneer Valley. Food Not Bombs (FNB) is a grassroots community dedicated to the redistribution of food in an effort to prevent waste and stop hunger.

FNB operates under the slogan "food is a right, not a privilege." The group is willing to go to any length to provide food to those who need it, and prevent it from being wasted. After the leftover food has been collected from sources such as local farmers, bakeries and schools, FNB members cook and redistribute vegetarian meals from nutritious food products that would otherwise be thrown out.

"The system we live in is set up in a way in which food and resources are going to be taken and redistributed without an eye on humanity," said FNB organizer and University of Massachusetts senior Tony Hall. "Being in the street is a way to engage others in the topic ... and that's the way humanity is going to overcome this problem."

FNB makes its presence known in the Pioneer Valley every Wednesday afternoon in Amherst at 1 p.m. and every Sunday afternoon in Northampton at 2 p.m. Organizers set up tables and offer their prepared meals to passers by. Members point out that although it's most visibly the poor and homeless who take the food they offer, everybody is welcome to it.

"We try to get a diverse community demographic," said FNB organizer and UMass senior Zachary Grey. "It's all about bringing the entire community together and trying to break down divisions between people and getting them to communicate across lines of difference. In this sense, we can all unite under free food." Grey also stressed that FNB is "not a charity, but a community gathering."

The organization originated in Cambridge in 1980, and mainly consisted of anti-nuclear activists. One of the group's activist campaigns included spray painting the slogan "money for food, not for bombs," all over the Boston area. As the slogan caught on, it became shortened to simply "Food Not Bombs," and the group adopted it as their name.

"It started out as street theater promoting issues of peace, anti-military spending and anti-capitalist activities," said Grey. "It was also meant to show the abundance of our consumer society, and how much of it is wasted rather than given to those who need it."

A second chapter was formed in San Francisco in 1988. This chapter drew attention to their cause when nine FNB members were arrested during a feeding event at Golden Gate Park on Aug. 15, 1988. After the controversial incident, more chapters began sprouting up in over 10 cities across the country, including Washington, D.C.

By 1989, FNB had enough members to effectively respond to the Loma Pietra earthquake in California, which left 12,000 people homeless. The public efforts of the organizers to reach out to the homeless presented FNB in a more positive light.

Throughout the 1990s, FNB continued to expand, and even grew to an international level. The group supports many human rights issues. FNB has participated in protests during the anti-globalization movement of the late 1990s, and protests against the Iraq War. FNB's main function and purpose at these demonstrations was to provide food for the protestors.

"For over 25 years the movement has worked to end hunger and has supported actions to stop the globalization of the economy, restrictions to the movements of people, end exploitation and [end] the destruction of the earth," according to FNB's Web site.

Today, there are over 400 FNB chapters in existence, with nearly half of them outside of the United States. The organization prides itself on the timeliness of its services to those in need.

"Food Not Bombs is often the first to provide food and supplies to the survivors of natural disasters and terrorist attacks," stated the Web site. More recently, FNB has provided immediate support to victims of the Sept. 11 attacks, the Asian Tsunami of 2004 and Hurricane Katrina.

"We have been one of the only organizations sharing daily meals in New Orleans since Katrina," continued FNB's Web site. "You can rely on Food Not Bombs in a disaster, and we are ready to help in the future."

The volunteer-run organization manages to remain active without one recognized leader or organizer. FNB is loosely structured, and gives everybody involved equal say in the decisions the group makes. Every decision is reached as a consensus. Each chapter shares similar ideals, but autonomously makes its own decisions based on what it feels is best for its community.

"It's more like a cooperative-based, do-it-yourself process," explained UMass freshman Kim Ovitz, who was involved with FNB in her home city of Chicago.

Hall said that when it comes to acquiring food for redistribution in the Pioneer Valley, farmers are often the best sources to help FNB's cause.

"The best way for us to get food is direct contact with farmers," Hall said. "Talking to the farmers market, Food Bank Farm and individual farmers has been by far our greatest strength. It's something the Pioneer Valley chapter has over others."

"A lot of farmers let us go in at the end of the season and glean their fields," added Grey. "We pick all their produce that would otherwise be tilled into the ground."

Hall also credited providers on the UMass campus, such as People's Market and Earthfoods Café. Also, many local bakeries provide day-old products that would be thrown out otherwise.

After the food has been collected, it's then cooked and made ready for redistribution. Most of the cooking for the Pioneer Valley chapter is done in Hall's kitchen. The group then distributes their food every Wednesday and Sunday. On Wednesdays, they distribute in the common across from Cousin's Market on East Pleasant Street in Amherst. On Sundays, they provide food in front of the First Congregational Church in Northampton.

One of the more widely known fundraising efforts for the Pioneer Valley FNB chapter is the group's benefit concert series at UMass. FNB will be hosting a benefit show tonight at 8 p.m. at the Student Union. Shows are held in either the Student Union Art Gallery or the Commonwealth Room (Earthfoods Café). Many local bands, primarily made up of UMass students, contribute to the set lists for the concerts.

"We love music, and Food Not Bombs is compatible with the local music scene," said UMass senior Andrew Jaquith, who plays guitar and saxophone for the band Biblioteca. "They do a great thing, even though they don't have to."

Overall, the Pioneer Valley's community response to FNB has been one of praise and gratitude.

"I think FNB is a wonderful and inspiring effort," said Ovitz. "It's the community being aware of hunger and poverty, as well as peace and justice. We need to redistribute food because our government and economy has such an abundance of food, yet it still allows hunger and poverty to exist."

Making food more healthful

UMass leads the way in enhanching beneficial nutrients in common food

By Dan Terk
Collegian Correspondent

Which of these food products do you think is the healthiest?
A) Salmon
B) Fruit Juice
C) Ice Cream
D) Margarine

You may think this question is a no-brainer, but if you've been paying attention while at the supermarket, you may be looking for another answer choice – E) All of the above.

In this age of food science, there's more to some foods than meets the eye. For example, all the foods listed above are now made with omega-3 fatty acids. This long chain of carbon atoms, purported as the silver bullet of nutrients, is naturally found in leafy greens, nuts and fish. Omega-3 is just one of the growing health-promoting food additives that have invaded grocery stores.

Many say that additives like these create a nutrient-centric view of food and has resulted in Americans eating more food-like products, and less and less food. For the University of Massachusetts student, this is not just confined to the supermarket – technologies to make such food additives are being developed right here on campus.

The food science department at UMass has recently begun to raise funds to benefit the Center for Health and Wellness, which will explore these types of nutrients and their addition to foods. The center's goal will be to improve the nutritional quality of food by adding nutrients believed to have health benefits that do not naturally contain them.

The newly appointed head of the food science department, Eric Decker, said there are two major aspects to the effectiveness of this type of research – biological activity, and what he calls "compliance." This means that not only must a nutrient have health benefits, but also people to actually eat it.

"The real challenge," explained Decker, "is to figure out ways to take these bioactive compounds and put them in the foods so that it still tastes good, looks the same, behaves the same, but more importantly, costs the same."

The new center is currently in the planning and funding stage. Funding for the $4 million project is coming from the University, and private gifts and grants from companies like ConAgra, Ocean Spray and General Mills. Decker notes that all these gifts come with "no strings attached." More money will be needed for operational costs, which typically comes from the U.S. Department of Agriculture and National Institute of Health.

"There's very important research to be done," said Noel Anderson, chair of the food science advisory board and head of worldwide technical insights for the Pepsi-Cola Co. "We have raised lots of money already because this research is very much in line with where the food and beverage industry is going."

While some may have reservations about this type of tampering with Mother Nature, Decker believes this is the future. By better understanding which populations require certain nutrients, "food is going to become, over time, even more personalized," said Decker. He admits there's no real evidence that a college student will gain any health benefits from eating more omega-3 fatty acids. However, significant research has shown that chances of a heart attack, in patients with cardiac issues, are reduced with increased omega-3 consumption.

The new Center for Health and Wellness sits at the confluence of the food industry, nutrition science, food science and food marketing. That's what has some scientists and journalists screaming foul.

It's an issue that even Decker will acknowledge: "Nutrition makes the press before the science is finished."

This creates an opening for the food industry to market the latest nutrient craze with the consumer's support and often times the Food and Drug Administration's blessing – all this before the truth of a nutrient's bioactivity can be fully explored.

Marion Nestle, a professor of nutrition and food studies at New York University, has published several books on various issues about the food industry. Her latest one, "What to Eat," is something of a user's guide to the modern-day supermarket. Nestle's major concern with nutrition science is the reductive approach taken to foods and nutrients.

"Nutrition arguments are almost invariable about single nutrients taken out of their food context, single foods taken out of their dietary context, or single risk factors or diseases taken out of their lifestyle context," stated Nestle in "What to Eat."

This means that omega-3 fatty acids may not be as beneficial if removed from the fish, fish may not be as healthy when fried and omega-3 fatty acids may not make a difference to the person who never exercises.

But how can we as intelligent people living in the 21st century not trust science? The gold standard for studies involving humans – the double-blind clinical trial – is very hard to use in nutrition science. One study of this type, exploring the lung cancer-fighting ability of beta-carotene, was stopped short because the smokers who were taking beta-carotene supplements were being harmed.

Nutritionists, because of issues like this one, commonly use case-control studies (asking people with specific illnesses about their dietary habits) or epidemiological studies (tracking the dietary habits and health of large groups of people over time).

Michael Pollan, a professor of journalism at University of California, Berkeley, discusses the problems with these types of studies in his most recent book, "In the Defense of Food: An Eater's Manifesto." It is known, even by the researchers conducting these studies, that people often lie about their dietary habits.

In one of the largest nutrition studies to date, the Women's Health Initiative, considered four ounces (a quarter of a pound) a "medium" portion of red meat. With most steaks now two, three, and sometimes four times that size, it's no wonder people often trim a few ounces when answering the questionnaire. This problem is so well known that researchers have formulas to try and correct the reported data.

Wrought with possible errors like these, it's understandable why a prominent epidemiologist, Gladys Block, was quoted by Pollan as saying, "I don't believe anything I read in nutritional epidemiology anymore ... it's a mess."

Endorsements from health agencies should also be taken lightly, says Pollan. While some endorsements are valid, they all cost money. General Mills pays the American Heart Association to put its seal of approval on Coco Puffs and Lucky Charms. The makers of Yoo-hoo chocolate drink do the same.

It's missteps and controversies like these that have people like Nestle and Pollan saying we need to radically change the way we think about diet, but others disagree.

"The reality is that we're not going to go backwards," said Decker. "If we're to impact the majority of the population we've got to do it though the foods that are in the grocery store."

"I'm for eating real foods," said Nestle in an e-mail interview. "I think that's the way forward."

Forwards or backwards, everyone has advice on what to eat.

Pollan said this: "Eat food. Not too much. Mostly plants." Nestle said it like this: "Eat less, move more, eat lots of fruits and vegetables."

This type of advice is not new, explained Decker.

"Nutrition education has been a huge failure. People have been told to eat these kinds of diets for a hundred years," Decker said. "[Students] cannot use an ingredient like whole grains as justification to eat junk. The issue is when people try to make comparisons from one food category to another, and you can't. A vegetable is always going to be better for you than Cheez-Its."

Black Friday

Rachel Dougherty

There was more carnage on the morning news in the days following Thanksgiving and Black Friday than in a R-rated horror movie.

A 34-year-old security contractor named Jdimytai Damour died in a Long Island Wal-Mart when shoppers broke down the doors and stampeded the store – a stampede which also put a 28-year-old pregnant woman in the hospital.

Across the country, in Palm Desert, Calif., two men shot and killed each other during a dispute in a Toys-"R"-Us. The violence on Black Friday has brought the "holiday" under intense media scrutiny and caused people across the country to question the values and priorities of the American consumer.

The hard thing concerning the joke about shoppers fighting to the death over some trivial piece of merchandise is that it isn't a joke anymore. It's a sick, frightening reality.

All the senseless bloodshed really got me thinking about the holidays and about the true meaning of Black Friday.

The "magic" of Black Friday has always eluded me. I just could never get into the spirit of the holiday. Shopping on Black Friday reminded me of a scene from Lord of the Flies. That is, if the boys had been armed with shopping carts and fat Vera Bradley purses instead of rocks and sticks.

The one and only time I ever did venture out on Black Friday, I took five steps into a Filene's Basement and got clothes-lined by some lady who thrust her arm out into an aisle shouting, "Hey D, reen, check this out. Looks good, right?" People were smacking and elbowing each other, squabbling over prices and fighting for the last sweater or pair of jeans.

It was chaos. As if they'd forgotten what the holiday is all about.

To understand the true meaning of Black Friday, it helps to look at its origins. Black Friday wasn't always about the petty sales and bargain items. The term "Black Friday" was actually first used in Philadelphia in the 1960s to describe the traffic jams that blocked up the city on the Friday following Thanksgiving.

It wasn't until the 1970s that it acquired its modern connotation as one of the busiest shopping days of the year, the first day of the Christmas shopping season in which the throngs of shoppers emerging nationwide enable businesses to turn a profit – also known as putting them in "the black."

Only in America would we follow national eating day with national shopping day.

Consumers across the country spend the holiday guzzling turkey and alcohol only to wake up hungover and cranky from the stress and excessive family time and storm the malls in packs, hungry for blood and ready to fight to the death over the last baggie of L'Oreal beauty products.

The hard thing concerning the joke about shoppers fighting to the death over some trivial piece of merchandise is that it isn't a joke anymore. It's a sick, frightening reality. It's hard enough to hear about people being stampeded and dying senselessly when it's in some remote location, like in India in October when 200 people died during a religious ceremony, but at least stories like that have some distance.

They are removed from day-to-day American life. When 34-year-old Jdimytai Damour was trampled to death in a Long Island Wal-Mart, it brought all the more sinister connotations of Black Friday home.

So, is the true meaning of Black Friday really just to beat the crap out of the other guy in the spirit of holiday savings and American consumerism?

Not exactly.

Black Friday is, literally, a celebration of the American dream of economic security and prosperity – the pursuit of happiness through the acquisition of material goods. Economists actually have a word for the amount of happiness you get out of a given product or purchase. They call it a utile, pronounced "yootle."

A utile is a measurement of the pleasure derived from an economic transaction. It's like when you open your presents on Christmas morning. If you get that Malibu Barbie you've wanted forever – five utiles. If you get socks, negative two utiles.

Black Friday is all about utiles. In a way, Black Friday is the American dream – something we're apparently willing to die or kill for to protect.

It's the "kill" part that concerns me.

When the rights of the consumer outweigh a man's right to life, it concerns us all. Jdimytai Damour's family is suing the Wal-Mart corporation for failing to protect their son. They're not seeking justice against the consumers who broke down the glass door and callously trampled him to death, but the corporation who failed to provide enough security on one of the biggest shopping days of the year.

Americans will have to decide whether this is the kind of America they want to continue – the kind of America they want passed down to their children.

The American dream is about more than utiles. Or at least, it can be.

Love of life is left unorphaned

Alana Goodman

Moshe Holtzberg doesn't know about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. He doesn't know about India-Pakistan relations. He doesn't know about terrorism.

At two years old, Moshe is too young to understand the brutal slaying of his parents by terrorists. All he knows is that he misses them.

At a memorial service in Mumbai yesterday, baby Moshe cried out for his mother. "Ima, ima, ima!" – the Hebrew word for mommy – echoed through the synagogue. His downy, blonde curls stuck to his damp cheeks as his face crumpled in pain. A plastic toy basketball was clutched fiercely in his chubby, pink fingers.

Moshe became an orphan last week when his parents, Rabbi Gavriel Holtzberg and his wife Rivka, were murdered during a terrorist attack that shocked the world. They were two of nearly 200 people killed in Mumbai after a small group of heavily armed terrorists raided the Taj Mahal Palace, the Trident-Oberoi hotel and the Chabad Center.

Moshe became an orphan last week when his parents, Rabbi Gavriel Holtzberg and his wife Rivka, were murdered during a terrorist attack that shocked the world.

Throughout their short time on Earth, Gavriel and Rivka touched thousands of lives. Several years ago, the couple left their comfortable home in New York to open a Chabad Center in Mumbai in order to serve the Jewish community in India.

Each night, dozens of guests flocked to the Chabad house to have dinner with Rivka and Gavriel. The visitors tended to be an eclectic mix of tourists, foreign businessmen and local Jews. Besides being the only establishment in Mumbai that served kosher meals, the Chabad Center also provided free lodging, Internet access and Torah classes to their guests.

The Holtzbergs' lives were devoted to helping others, often at the expense of their own comfort.

"On my last Shabbat in India, I slept in [Rivka and Gavriel's] home, the fifth floor of the Chabad house. I noticed that their apartment was dilapidated and bare – the paint peeled from the walls, yet, the guest quarters on the two floors below were decorated exquisitely, with American-style beds, expansive bathrooms, air conditioning and marble floors," wrote visitor Hillary Lewin on the Chabad Web site, describing the selflessness of Rivka and Gavriel.

Sadly, the guest quarters of the Chabad house can no longer be described as "exquisitely decorated." Last week's terrorist attack left the Chabad Center's walls riddled with bullet holes and black with smoke from explosives. Broken furniture, glass and debris cover the floors, and the window frames dangle outside of the building like broken teeth.

But even in the midst of such great destruction, we found a reason to hope.

It was in the middle of one of these gutted rooms where Sandra Samuel, the family's nanny, rescued the Holtzbergs' two-year-old son Moshe last Thursday.

Samuel had barricaded herself in a lower-level room when the Chabad house was raided by terrorists the night before. Once the sounds of gun fire and explosions ceased the next day, Samuel heard the soft sobs of a child upstairs.

Risking her life by leaving her hiding spot, Samuel found baby Moshe crying over his parents' bodies, his pants wet with their blood. His tiny hands grasped a dirty, cloth doll.

Miraculously, Samuel was able to grab Moshe and escape from the house, even as the terrorists still patrolled the roof of the building.

Samuel's courageous rescue of the child was a greater blow to the terrorists than any weapon our military could build. Her selfless act of love, in the face of such evil, gave hope to millions of good people who were demoralized by the attack.

It's these good deeds, like Samuel's, Gavriel's and Rivka's, which we should all be emulating. By taking this type of action we can fight the feelings of despair and hopelessness that haunt so many people after a terrorist attack.

Rabbi Moshe Kotlarsky put it best.

"I vow that we will avenge the deaths of Gabi and Rivki," he said at the couple's funeral in Jerusalem on Tuesday. "But not with AK-47's, not with grenades and tanks. We will take revenge in a different way. We will add light. We will add good deeds. We will make sure that there is not one Jewish man who does not put on tefillin. We will make sure that there is not one Jewish woman who does not light candles."

This is how we will honor the lives of the Holtzbergs and the 186 other victims of the Mumbai attack. Simply by doing good deeds, by living happily, charitably and freely, we will show that our love of life is stronger than the terrorists' love of death.

365 days, 52 weeks, 12 months and one great 2008

Matthew M. Robare

We've come to the end of another interesting year – a year of sorrows, of joys, of change and of stability. It's been a year that encompassed all of human experience – just like every other year. In fact, very little distinguishes 2008 in my mind from every other year. So I've decided to do this little retrospective and recapitulate all the important stuff.

In fact, very little distinguishes 2008 in my mind from every other year, so I have decided to do this little retrospective and recapitulate all the important stuff.

The year began with a plastic Dick Clark being replaced by a young, male, celebrity robot with blond hair. I think it was Justin Timberlake or Clay Aiken. I suppose it doesn't really matter.

Those of us who were over 21 drank champagne and those of us who weren't were in bed by 10 p.m. January had some interesting times. It looked like Ron Paul and John Edwards might have a chance in the primaries and Barack Obama was still the junior senator from Illinois and not the Messiah.

February we got back to school, found our new classes, wondered why we didn't switch majors over break and finally settled in to the new routine. On a national level, it was the beginning of primary season.

In one day, 300 Democrats and Republicans combined dropped out of their party's nomination running. It was cold as anything and snowy. Fidel Castro, that darling of the left, dictator of Cuba for decades, resigned and was replaced by his "younger" brother, Raul.

March we had spring break. I spent my spring break procrastinating on a project and homework. Other people apparently partied or did other things. Besides that, not a whole lot happened in March.

April had some more interesting stuff. That stuff being more primaries. Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton's emergence as the front runners for the Democrats and John McCain's coming of age for the GOP. The British island of Sark abolished its feudal system under pressure from the United Nations. We also mourned the death of Albert Hoffmann, the discoverer of LSD.

May, we ended the spring 2008 term, went back home and prayed for lenient exam graders. There was a major cyclone in Myanmar and an earthquake in China. Nepal ended its monarchy and the Union of South American Nations was created.

In June, Ireland rejected the Lisbon Treaty, which was an underhanded attempt to pass a European constitution. There was a large earthquake in Japan, a typhoon in the Philippines and Robert Mugabe was somehow re-elected president of Zimbabwe.

Most significantly, gajillionaire Bill Gates stepped down from being chairman of Microsoft. Maybe they'll finally make decent software. I kid – I've written all my articles on Microsoft Word – with Vista and appreciate Halo.

July saw World Youth Day in Australia, my 19th birthday and a deepening of my hatred for McDonald's. Aside from that, I don't think much happened in July. I guess that's the way of the dog days of summer – too hot to do anything.

August was much more interesting. Russia invaded Georgia, I changed majors from physics to journalism and finally quit my job. It was a wonderful rush of freedom until my cash ran out. The Summer Olympics were held in Beijing, the Democrats nominated Obama while the Republicans nominated McCain, and everyone thought Michael Phelps was going to be vice president. Pervez Musharraf resigned as president of Pakistan. Somali pirates stepped up their attacks in the Red Sea. (Ohhhh it's a pirate's life for me!)

In September, Prime Minister Yasuo Fukada of Japan, resigned. The Thai military deposed Prime Minister Samak Sundaravej. Pakistani Prime Minister Yousaf Raza Gillani survived an assassination attempt. Not a great month for prime ministers. The Large Hadron Collider was turned on for the first time, and promptly broke. SpaceX Falcon 1 became the first privately developed launch vehicle to make orbit.

In October, the global financial system nosedived, and our pockets were raped for the bankers and politicians. In November, Barack Obama was elected president and inauguration tickets were all claimed. The Democrats captured a solid majority in the House of Representatives and a good majority in the Senate. Beginning in November and continuing into this month, protestors shut down a few airports in Thailand and the military deposed yet another prime minister.

It has been a most wonderful year, for me personally, and for all of us, even if we don't fully realize it. I've lived so much in this past year it's like I was in gestation until now. I've done so many new things – some of which I can't put in a newspaper – and discovered so many things about myself I never imagined before. I hope all my years are like 2008.

Here's to 2009. Look out, Mr. Prime Minister!

Former substitute teacher fulfilling musical aspirations brings unique sound

By Matthew Solomon
Collegian Staff

Sick of the same old regurgitated pop music? Well look no further, the Ryan Monibleau Band is coming to town and Zach Deputy will be opening it up.

Hailing from Peabody, Mass., Ryan has an assorted yet unmistakably original flavor to his upbeat and festive dance music. The band currently tours all over the country and has established a large and dedicated fan base.

These days, Ryan is a top-notch musician with killer chops and a powerful voice. It hasn't exactly been an easy journey for him. Not all that long ago, Ryan was a substitute teacher, supplementing the bar gigs he played throughout the Boston area at night.

He has grown immensely since the early days. On stage he plays guitar and sings, complimenting his amiable persona.

Together, the band is tight. Sometimes when they get deep into a jam, the different instruments melt together into one cohesive unit, all equally as important as the last.

It's clear from this group's demeanor that they deserve to be where they are today. They've put in the work, and seen it pay off. Musically, their clever instrument combination gives them an original sound.

Two years ago when they came to the Iron Horse Music Theater in Northampton, their fans were lined up out the door waiting for tickets.

Last year, when they came to the area they'll again, played to a full crowd at the Pearl Street Ballroom. Since then, their following has increased.

Tonight they'll be returning to the Pearl Street Ballroom in Northampton, for a 9 p.m. show.

In addition to the Ryan Montbleau band, Zach Deputy will be opening the show using his looping skills to create a whirlwind effect of sound. His personality illuminates on stage, projecting confidence and comfort that translates into his music. He still plays mostly small bars and pubs.

Judging by the dedication of his fans, Zach is going places and going there fast. He sings, plays guitar, the bass and drums all at the same time using a loop station and an array of complicated effect pedals. The looping technique allows him to start and stop a beat or a rhythmic sequence with just a quick tap of his foot.

He has perfected the art. Deputy still knows when to break it down into a guitar solo, when to come back in with the beat and when to add a spicy, new ingredient to his array of sound.

On stage Zach has the persona of a gentle giant. He's a big, yet unthreatening guy with a handsome, bushy beard that just won't stop smiling. It's obvious from watching him make music that he's doing what he loves to do.

Ryan Montbleau Band and Zach Deputy will be playing tonight at 9 p.m. at the Pearl Street Ballroom for $15. The show will also feature opening act Jesse Dee. Tickets can be purchased at the door or the Northampton Box Office at 76 Main Street in Northampton.

WMUA hosts festival for record vendors at Cape Cod Lounge

By Brian Wood
Collegian Staff

This Saturday, Dec. 6, WMUA will host "Record Fest" at the Cape Cod Lounge in the Student Union from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. The festival is the first of its kind and marks the latest in a string of events organized by the nonprofit student and community-run radio station.

20 vendors from across New England and the East Coast will have tables with an array of vinyl, CDs, movies and other paraphernalia for sale. With such a wide sampling of sellers, the selection of genres represented at the festival promises to be varied enough for any audiophile's tastes.

Originally conceived as a collaborative work with the Easthampton Flywheel fan arts collective that has run similar events in the past), Record Fest transformed over time into a solo venture for WMUA.

As time has passed, the event has grown by leaps and bounds. The station filled all its allocated table space to prospective sellers well in advance.

"The vendor response for the event has been amazing," said WMUA Music Director Alex Hornbeck. "We filled up weeks ago, and have still been getting requests."

The overwhelming response from vinyl retailers and labels was a pleasant surprise for the station.

"We weren't exactly sure just how big this would be," said WMUA General Manager David Murray. "After we posted a listing for the event a month ago, we've been getting a few e-mails and calls every day, it's been great."

In addition to the record sale, the station has booked a range of independent acts to provide live music for Record Fest. WMUA DJs will play sets in between bands to complete the sonic backdrop for the event.

One featured performer will be local electronic artist Eric Hnatow. Hnatow will perform his distinctive blend of electronic music for festival-goers. This is Hnatow's second appearance at a WMUA-hosted event this year, having played at the station's free concert in September.

Traveling all the way from Baltimore, Md., will be Teeth Mountain.

"Teeth Mountain played this past summer in Northampton and we were really impressed by them," Hornbeck said of the band. "We talked with them about coming up in the future to play a WMUA event. We're really happy to have them playing."

Rabbit Rabbit and Brown Recluse Sings will round out the festival's performers. The two bands will provide a change of pace with a mixture of post-punk and psychedelic pop to compliment the event's diverse selection of music.

With no precedent set, the station is still unsure what to expect in terms of a turnout. However, if student interest can come close to matching the interest displayed by area vendors, the station plans to make Record Fest a regularly occurring event.

"We're going to wait and see how it goes, hopefully if it's a success we'll try and organize another [festival] during the spring semester," Hornbeck said.

In addition to hosting and organizing the event, WMUA will also sell a variety of CDs and vinyl from its own vendor table.

WMUA's Record Fest will run Saturday from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. at the Cape Cod Lounge in the Student Union Center. Admittance is free.

It's time again for holiday spirits

By Jennifer Turner
Collegian Columnist

"I feel sorry for people who don't drink. When they wake up in the morning, that's as good as they're going to feel all day." – Frank Sinatra

The holiday season has officially arrived. Unfortunately for college students, that also means the stress of finals is here. However, once finals are over, most of us will return to our families for the seasonal festivities – which can usher in a whole different type of stress.

In order to deal with any dysfunctional family tension, why not enjoy some of the delicious libations that only come around during the holidays? Whip up some good old-fashioned mulled wine or homemade eggnog, and take a sip whenever you feel it necessary. You'll be feeling cheery in no time.

So, what is mulled wine? It's a traditional spiced wine drink, which is enjoyed not only in America but also all over Europe.

Mulled wines have been popular since medieval times and have many different names throughout history. During the warmer months of the year, a variation of mulled wine called Sangria is served.

For modern mulled wines, red wine is mixed with spices that can include cinnamon, cloves and nutmeg. The beverage is then served warm. Some mulled wine recipes also include a bit of brandy or cognac.

There are many different recipes out there, but here is a tasty one to try.

Brown Sugar Mulled Wine

Ingredients Needed:
2 bottles dry Cabernet Sauvignon (or other similarly dry red wine)
1 orange peel
1 cinnamon stick broken into halves
8 whole cloves
1 whole nutmeg
1/4 cup packed brown sugar
Orange slices for garnish (optional)

Directions:

Pour wine in a slow cooker or large saucepan. Wrap orange peel, cinnamon stick halves, cloves and nutmeg in a cheesecloth. Add to pot. Cover and cook on HIGH for two to two and a half hours in the slow cooker. If using a saucepan, warm on medium to medium-low and keep an eye on it. You don't want the wine to scorch.

Discard spice bag; ladle into glasses. Garnish with orange slices.

Sounds good, doesn't it? I'm already feeling warm and toasty inside just thinking about it.

However, if eggnog is more your thing, you don't need to settle for the grocery store kind. Let's face facts – it's far too tame. So impress your family by serving up this homemade, not to mention more potent, variation.

Homemade Eggnog

Ingredients Needed:
4 egg yolks
1/3 cup sugar plus 1 tablespoon
1 pint whole milk
1 cup heavy cream
3 ounces bourbon
1 teaspoon freshly grated nutmeg
4 egg whites

Directions:

In mixing bowl, beat the egg yolks until they lighten in color. Gradually add the 1/3 cup sugar and continue to beat until completely dissolved. Add the milk, cream, bourbon and nutmeg and stir to combine.

Place the egg whites in separate mixing bowl and beat to soft peaks. With the mixer still running gradually, add the 1 tablespoon of sugar and beat until stiff peaks form.

Whisk the egg whites into the mixture. Chill and serve.

For those of you who don't want to drink the traditional eggnog with raw eggs, there's a cooked version as well. It's just as yummy, but without the worry. Use the same ingredients listed above, but modify the steps just a bit.

Directions for Cooked Eggnog:

In mixing bowl, beat the egg yolks until they lighten in color. Gradually add the 1/3 cup of sugar and continue to beat until completely dissolved. Set aside.

In a medium saucepan, over high heat, combine the milk, heavy cream and nutmeg and bring just to a boil, stirring occasionally. Remove from the heat and gradually add the hot mixture into the egg and sugar mixture. Then return everything to the pot and cook until the mixture reaches 160 degrees Fahrenheit.

Remove from the heat, stir in the bourbon, pour into a medium mixing bowl and set in the refrigerator to chill. In a medium mixing bowl, beat the egg whites to soft peaks. With the mixer running gradually, add the 1 tablespoon of sugar and beat until stiff peaks form. Whisk the egg whites into the chilled mixture.

Whether you choose to make one of these delicious drinks, or just settle for a trusty bottle of wine, enjoy the holidays – and be safe!

Culinary history focuses on hamburgers for new book

By Jane Black
The Washington Post

Andrew F. Smith could have written about anything for "Edible," a new series of culinary history books. But hamburgers were the obvious choice. His first memory of eating outside his house was going to a small hamburger stand near his home in California. One of his most memorable moments: tasting his first burger at McDonald's in 1955. Oh, and for research purposes, he has eaten hamburgers in 30 countries.

A professor of culinary history at the New School in New York, Smith has always taken an academic approach to food. He is the author of the "Encyclopedia of Junk Food and Fast Food" and he edited "The Oxford Companion to American Food and Drink," published last year.

Smith spoke to staff writer Jane Black about his new book, "Hamburger: A Global History" (Reaktion Books, 2008). Excerpts follow:

Q. Are hamburgers really that interesting?

A. They're amazing. They start out as a street food in American cities in the late 1890s. Within 70 years, they're a global phenomenon. There are very few things like that. It is, in my opinion, the first commercial global food.

Q. How did burgers get their start and, for that matter, their name?

A. There is such a thing as Hamburg beef that was considered the highest quality. When Germans immigrated to America in great numbers in the mid-1800s, they came and opened delicatessens and low-end restaurants, and they served Hamburg steak. It was basically the patty we know today, but with sauces on top and eaten with knife and fork. Soon it moved from a German restaurant item to a popular restaurant item everywhere. In the late 19th century, when street carts were able to serve heated food, they started serving the patties because they were cheap and popular. The bun was added so that you could eat it more easily.

Q. Did they always come with french fries?

A. Actually, that connection doesn't begin until World War II. During the war, there were restrictions on beef, and White Castle and almost every other chain almost went out of business. They shifted into potatoes because there were no restrictions on that. It was a great combination, because the potatoes cost nothing. To this day, most hamburger operations make money on the french fries and the soda.

Q. What surprised you most about hamburgers today?

A. I couldn't believe how many indigenous hamburger chains there were and that some were even coming to America. In Japan, there's MOS, which opened a year after McDonald's first came there. But instead of cheap, they went expensive. They hand-grind the meat, and it's been incredibly successful. There's a Filipino chain called Jollibee, which started in 1975. It now has outlets in the United States and Hong Kong.

Q. Let's cut to the chase: Where do you find your ultimate hamburger?

A. I'm now into Five Guys. I had it when I was in Washington last week. We had it on Sunday and on Monday. It's juicy and fresh. I like that they grind the meat there and the potatoes are processed there on the spot. I love In-N-Out Burger in California. They have high-quality food, and it's made to order. And they have a secret menu that you have to go online to get. It adds kitsch to it.

Q. Are you philosophically opposed to fancy $15, even $20, burgers?

A. I wrote about a $5,000 burger (at Fleur de Lys in Las Vegas), but I didn't consume it. There are good places with high-end burgers. But the burger's main claim to fame is that it's good and inexpensive.

The hamburger has evolved over the years, becoming an American staple of the fast-food industry. The bun was not originally part of the design, but added later to make it easier to eat.

Lil' Wayne gets eight nods

Lil' Wayne has the most Grammy nominations this year with eight for his much anticipated album, "Tha Carter III."

By Preston Jones
McClatchy Newspapers

In a bid to inject some much-needed life into a ceremony that, traditionally, is one of the stuffiest awards shows going, the Grammys tried something new Wednesday night.

The clumsily titled "The Grammy Nominations Concert Live! – Countdown to Music's Biggest Night," hosted by Taylor Swift and LL Cool J, was an attempt to blend star-studded performances with the announcement of a handful of nominees (of the 110 categories the Grammys recognize, a mere six were announced on air, the full list of nominees was made available on grammy.com).

Broadcast live from the Nokia Theatre in Los Angeles, across the street from the Staples Center, where the 51st annual Grammy awards will be doled out Feb. 8, the evening was a welcome change of pace from the usual, bleary-eyed early morning press conference, and also served to highlight the opening of the new Grammy Museum.

But it's the multitude of fresh faces littering the list of award hopefuls this year that's most worth celebrating.

The 2007 batch of astonishingly hip Grammy contenders was no fluke, after decades of lining up the usual suspects (U2, Bruce Springsteen, et al) and handing out trophies, the Academy of Recording Arts and Sciences have, last year and this year, shaken things up by incorporating many popular and even a few cutting-edge acts into the roster of contenders. Put it this way: the 51st annual Grammys ceremony is going to be mighty interesting.

Lil Wayne's having a very good year – the multi-platinum rapper led the pack with eight total nominations, including a nod for album of the year.

British rockers Coldplay were right behind him with seven nominations, while rappers Jay-Z and Kanye West and R&B star Ne-Yo each earned six nods. Alison Krauss, Robert Plant, John Mayer, Radiohead and Jazmine Sullivan received five nominations each, and Adele, Danger Mouse, Eagles, Lupe Fiasco, George Strait, and T.I. each received four nominations.

Mariah Carey opened the show with a festive Christmas tune ("Christmas (Baby Please Come Home)"), while the other artists took turns providing fresh takes on songs inducted into the Grammy Hall of Fame. Over the course of the 60-minute broadcast, Swift (holding on for dear life through Brenda Lee's "I'm Sorry"), Celine Dion, Christina Aguilera, the Foo Fighters (whose grunged-up rendition of Carly Simon's "You're So Vain" was eye-opening), B.B. King and John Mayer each graced the Nokia Theatre stage.

Colbert's CD takes top spot

By Steve Johnson
Chicago Tribune

Neither Stephen Colbert nor Kanye West took first place in the album-sales duel instigated by Colbert on his show this week.

The biggest man of all, as measured by iTunes album sales, was Britney Spears.

At 5 p.m. EST Wednesday, the time Colbert had called on his fans to go to iTunes and purchase "A Colbert Christmas: The Greatest Gift of All," Spears' album was on top. And, during what iTunes has labeled "Britney Spears Week," it stayed that way throughout the early evening.

But by 8:30, Colbert's disc had surged in front of West's "808s & Heartbreak." Taking over the No. 3 spot and pushing West to No. 4 (Akon was in the No. 2 spot.) In initiating the "East Coast-Third Coast rap feud (if the definition of "rap" also includes "talking on TV," Colbert said Monday that he wanted to humble West, challenging the singer's assertion that he's the voice of his generation.

"With all the Auto-Tuning on your records, you're barely the voice of your own albums," Colbert said.

West responded, no joke, without getting the joke. On his Twitter account, he posted, "Who the (bleep) is Stephen Colbert?" which would have been more credible if he had misspelled it as Steven.

But if he lost the battle of wits, West seemed likely to stay well ahead in sales over the long haul. Whatever was happening on iTunes, West had the No. 1 album on the Billboard charts.

Colbert's effort took a while to move up on iTunes, but Colbert Nation eventually came through. Either that, or Apple's updating software finally kicked in.

UM preps for A-10

By Holly J. Galvin
Collegian Staff

Although the nationally-ranked Massachusetts swimming and diving teams won't be together this weekend, UMass uniforms will be out in full force. Coach Mandy Hixon's divers are set to depart this morning for Saturday's Galbraith Invitational in New Jersey, while the remainder of the men's and women's teams will both compete in Amherst.

The No. 19 Minutewomen are set to take on Northeastern for the second time this month, while the illness-riddled No. 9 Minutemen have scheduled an intra-squad scrimmage. In New Jersey, UMass fields two diving rosters that have captured first-place finishes at every meet this season.

Men's Head Coach Russ Yarworth lauded Cook's transition to college diving thus far, but cautioned that Galbraith might be the freshman's first true test.

"I think this weekend will be a little more challenging for him," Yarworth predicted, speaking at a point in the season where Cook has only lost one event. "The competition level will be a little bit higher. This is what the divers have been pointing to."

The Galbraith competitive field will include Penn State, University of Pennsylvania, La Salle, Yale, Army and host Rutgers.

Although Hixon's divers will be on the road, a mutual agreement between UMass and NU states that diving scores from the Terrier Invitational will be counted at Saturday's dual meet, much to the delight of head coach Bob Newcomb.

"It's advantageous to us because our diving is so strong," he noted, highlighting a squad led by veteran Karen Upperco, Anne Fogerty and Sarah Horstmann. "It's nice to know that there's strength at the other end of the pool all the time and you don't have to worry about it."

Upperco notched two first-place finishes at the BU Invitational, and has five overall.

Fresh off a strong showing in Boston the Minutewomen return to Amherst on Saturday to face familiar faces from a Huskies squad that placed second overall at BU. Newcomb, whose squad was a mere 74 points removed from second-place, said he's looking to see how UMass performs physically.

"We match up very well [with Northeastern]," he pointed out. "The interesting thing is how the teams respond after having Thanksgiving off and then getting back up into training."

The Minutewomen had multiple days off prior to and following the three-day Boston tournament.

Rest has been key for the men as well, as UMass has battled a litany of illness and injuries recently. Roster numbers were noticeably down at Thursday's practice, as a third men's swimmer has been diagnosed with mononucleosis.

Additionally, two Minutemen are nursing injuries. Yarworth noted star sprinter Juan Moliere was "still a little sore" and may rest him some.

Yarworth sought a silver lining amidst the slew of setbacks.

"We're really battling sickness," he said. "We're just going to get through it. I guess the good thing is it's hitting us in December rather than in February when we're getting closer to A-10s."

Two guys, one column

Michael King

Eli Rosenswaike

We here at The Massachusetts Daily Collegian – and by we I mean myself (Sports Editor) and Mr. EIC himself, Michael King – have been covering UMass sports for far too long.

So who better to go to when you want to know the results of Saturday's irrelevant intra-squad swimming scrimmage – before it even happens?

In every Collegian Weekend Edition throughout the rest of the year, we will be prognosticating every UMass sporting event – no matter how inconsequential.

Just remember, you heard it here first.

Friday, Dec. 5

Hockey vs. Connecticut (Rosenswaike) Well, SOMEONE needs to win something eventually for UMass. Lord knows the basketball team won't be the ones to do it. So why not UMass hockey against a poor UConn team? Plus, it's at the Mullins Center. The Minutemen win 4-1.

(King) The annual game with Con(n) U, two years ago this was an 8-1 blowout. Last year's game was a bit closer, but the Huskies still have no chance. This game should be appealing to UMass fans since it's the only sport where the Minutemen clearly dominate. UMass wins 6-2.

Men's and Women's Swimming & Diving at Galbraith Diving Invitational (New Brunswick, N.J.) (King) Both UMass squads have had some talented divers in the past few years. Look for individuals from each team to have strong showings this weekend.

(Rosenswaike) I complain about these meets weekly. It's just so confusing, why can't one team face another? And why can't they play with a ball? And why does no one care about these teams? They are perennially awesome. I bet if Michael Phelps was here people would care.

Saturday, Dec. 6

Men's Basketball vs. Boston College (Rosenswaike) Good news for UMass: it's at home. Bad news for UMass: they have to play a basketball game. That's a bit harsh, but this team is playing poor basketball this season. They need Anthony Gurley to step up, because he's a big reason for it. He should have all the motivation for this one, being a Boston native. Gurley shows his stuff, but Minutemen lose 81-74.

(King) I'm not sure if there's a game left on the schedule where the Minutemen are the overwhelming favorite. And it certainly isn't this game. Al Skinner always brings an underrated squad back to his alma mater, so look for the Eagles to win 62-51.

Women's Basketball at Long Island University (Providence, R.I.) (King) Seems like Long Island has a good chance in this game if it has a few players taller than 5-foot-3. But this game will probably be a low-scoring game as the Minutewomen win 59-47.

(Rosenswaike) Long Island almost beat Kentucky. That sounds impressive. And they have a player (Ashley Palmer) that averages over 20 points per game. So this sounds like an LIU win. However, my father went to school there. That makes me think they are going to lose. But, they are playing UMass…so that means a win. Congratulations dad! LIU wins 63-57.

Men's Swimming & Diving Intrasquad Scrimmage (Amherst) (Rosenswaike) Good news! UMass wins!

(King) White is clearly superior to Maroon…

Women's Swimming & Diving vs. Northeastern (King) Unless this meet takes place in the Charles River, Northeastern has no chance.

(Rosenswaike) I don't know much about swimming, but in doing about 10 seconds of research I've come to the conclusion that UMass is better. That's what makes me such a great reporter. Minutewomen win.

Sunday, Dec. 7

Women's Basketball vs. Brown (Providence, R.I.) (Rosenswaike) This team plays way too many games, and we've got another one coming in a second. Excited, Mike? When they play games, they usually lose. So why should Brown be any different? The Bears score more points than UMass; do we really care what the exact numbers are?

(King) The more games they play, the more improved the Minutemen should get right? Three games in one week sounds better than practice to me. Nonetheless, UMass drops this one 55-46.

Wednesday, Dec. 10

Men's Basketball vs Holy Cross: (King) The Crusaders have enjoyed some success in recent years, especially in March. But the team's recent losing streak indicates that UMass has a chance to get its first win against a Division I team. UMass prevails 79-73.

(Rosenswaike) Holy Cross has lost six straight games after starting off 2-0, which included an overtime win over Saint Joseph's. The Minutemen will win this game. That's a guarantee from me. And you know how much that means. UMass shoots the lights out from the perimeter in a 77-63 win.

Women's Basketball vs. Delaware (Providence, R.I.) (Rosenswaike) We've ragged on the women's team a bit too much in this column. Now it's time to criticize Delaware. They're awful. Really bad. UMass better beat them or Marnie Dacko should resign on the spot. Minutewomen win 66-50.

(King) Looks like the Minutewomen will be spending some serious time in the Ocean State. Maybe the change of scenery will translate into some wins. Look for UMass to beat an overmatched Blue Hen squad 66-59.

Scores and Smack

Last week: Rosenwaike 2-4, King 2-5
Season: Rosenwaike 15-11, King 13-15

(Rosenswaike) Another week, another win. This is starting to get a bit old. I didn't predict the UMass-Harvard soccer game (i covered the game for the Gazette), but I did come closer in both swimming meets (which aren't reflected in the records) and did come closer in the majority of the scores in games we agreed on. You got any excuses this week, Michael?

(King) Well, the second week in a row I've lost because I picked all of the games on the schedule. Maybe next week I'll pick only one game and we'll see who comes out on top, OK?

(Rosenswaike) Go right ahead Mike. But good luck catching up in the overall standings if you do. You're a bit behind…

Minutewomen to face Ivy League foe

By Nick O'Malley
Collegian Staff

After facing off against Providence Wednesday night, the Massachusetts women's basketball team will be heading to the Friars' home city to face off against Brown and Long Island as part of the Brown Classic this weekend.

The Minutewomen, coming off a 75-63 loss, will be looking to answer many of the questions raised after dropping two straight against Colorado and PC. There's no larger issue, however, than the lack of consistency UMass has shown over the last few games.

"It's a puzzle to try to figure it out," said UMass Coach Marnie Dacko. "In the second half, we'd make a nice run, but then we'd shoot ourselves in the foot by turning the ball over. We'd get a shot and then we'd steal the ball and then throw it away again and give them a layup."

Against Long Island and Brown, UMass (3-3) will need its veteran leaders to step up for a team that has struggled as of late. However, the team's two seniors currently lead the team in turnovers. Stefanie Gerardot leads the team with 30 turnovers while Sakera Young is second with 23.

"The inconsistency is coming from upperclassmen, that's where I have a problem. I can handle it if it's underclassmen," Dacko said. "You know, upperclassmen and underclassmen, our upperclassmen are sophomores."

Long Island (3-3), meanwhile, has nearly the same amount of youth as UMass, as the Blackbirds boast only two seniors on their roster, with five upperclassmen in total. Contrary to UMass, though, LIU gets most of its production from its younger players. Each of the team's five top scorers is either a junior or younger.

The Blackbirds' two top scorers, Chelsea Palmer and Chelsi Johnson, are only in their second year of eligibility. Palmer leads the team in scoring (20.7 points per game) and rebounding (11.2 per game).

"LIU, they're very athletic and they play a 2-3 zone. So we really have to concentrate on closing out on them and playing defense against them," Dacko said.

"We practiced really closing out defensively and keeping them off of the boards and we were really trying to attack on that."

In terms of rebounding, the Minutewomen look to have the advantage. Both Long Island and Brown have been outrebounded by their opponents on the season while UMass has outrebounded their opponents this season (40.1 per game).

"I think we really have to rebound well. I think we need to take care of the basketball," Dacko said. "You know, you have to play defense. I think if we held Providence to 60 points, their average, we win the ballgame."

The second game against host team Brown (1-6) looks to be an easier matchup for the Minutewomen. The Bears opened the season against the same Providence team that beat UMass by 12 but fell by a 23-point margin.

Brown is led in scoring by sophomore guard Grace Kelly, but has yet to hit their stride offensively. The Bears have only averaged 52.9 points per game and do not have a player with a scoring average in the double digits.

However, Brown's one win this season came against Maine, which beat UMass earlier this season, a game indicative of the Minutewomen's up-and-down play this season. This weekend's pair in Rhode Island will be an opportunity for UMass to get back on track.

"We got to get back on the horse again," Dacko said. "We got kicked off the horse, we got kicked down, and we got to jump back on it and there's no better time than this weekend."

Nick O'Malley can be reached at nomalley@student.umass.edu.

Teya Wright positions herself in front of an opponent in a game last year. The Minutewomen take on Brown this weekend as part of the Brown Classic.

Limiting turnovers

years with a total of 51 meetings in the "Battle of the Commonwealth."

BC has the all-time lead with a 23-18 record. In their last meeting, UMass won, 83-80, on the road Dec. 12, 2007. Prior to last year, the Eagles won eight straight meetings.

If the Minutemen hope to snap their five-game losing streak, they'll have to take better care of the basketball. UMass has the worst assist-to-turnover ratio (0.60) in the Atlantic 10.

Lowe believes the key to cutting down on turnovers will be giving his teammates easier passes to get better shots. In the game against the Rockets, Lowe had as many turnovers (four) as he did assists.

"I'm going to have to feed them like a little baby, just like how you feed a little newborn," Lowe said.

Kellogg is looking for redshirt senior Luke Bonner to come back from his knee injury soon after the Dec. 13 against Kansas. Prior to the injury, he averaged four points and 4.5 rebounds per game.

He has started every game since, averaging 4.0 points and 3.75 rebounds per game in his four starts. He feels that he is getting better as he gains experience, but he knows he isn't at his peak.

"Lately I've been getting more acclimated to going out there every day, competing hard and doing what [UMass Coach Kellogg] wants me to do, which is rebound and try to cause havoc on defense as much as I can," Lynch said. "I'm just taking it day by day."

Lynch has to mature quickly for UMass to be able to compete in the Atlantic 10. With Bonner and Hill out, only four players on the team are taller than 6 feet 4 inches, and two of them, Matt Glass and Trayon Wilcher, aren't suited for the low post.

In Lynch's most recent start for the Minutemen, a 57-56 loss against Toledo, he grabbed nine rebounds, including six offensive boards in 33 minutes of action. Kellogg felt it was his best game of the season, but improved performance comes with increased expectations.

"[The Toledo game] was the best he's competed all year, that's how I expect him to compete every game now. He showed great strides," Kellogg said.

Still, Lynch cared more about the team's loss than his personal performance.

"After the game he was devastated because he played hard, he competed, and we didn't get that last rebound and I think he felt personally responsible," Kellogg said. "The only way you can feel hurt and feel pain from a loss is when you compete hard."

Kellogg is not quite sure when Bonner will be able to return to the starting line-up, so in the meantime Lynch will have to get used to playing heavy minutes.

"Who's the last [freshman] to log 33 minutes [only] five games into the season? I don't even know. I'm just throwing it out there," Kellogg said. "It's a little bit of a burden on Tyrell right now, but he's fighting, he's starting to come around and turn the corner."

He'll face a tough test tomorrow when the Minutemen host Boston College (5-2) in the Commonwealth Classic. Lynch will have to battle for control of the paint against Eagles' big men Josh Southern (6'10") and Joe Trapani (6'8"). If Lynch can win his individual battles, UMass will have a great chance to earn the victory.

There's been a large wolves in my bedroom for years. He's very very quiet and hardly moves. He just sits there.

I know where he sits all night long.

If I want to grab something in the middle of the night I've taught myself how to reach around him even if I can't see.

I have to use a coded language to explain him to my girlfriends.

The girls are shy and confused about why he's there with us in the room and how he got there in the first place.

I don't know his name because I don't know much about him. When he leaves, my life will fit better..... the world will look differently, and I'll finally know his name.

With my bad luck his name will probably be something like Butch or Sheila Gordon

Eagles fly to UMass

UM to face Boston College on Saturday

BY ADAM MILLER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

For three of its last five losses, the Massachusetts men's basketball team has seen what it's like to be surprised by teams it's heavily favored to beat.

Tomorrow, the Minutemen (1-5) hope to bring that feeling to Boston College in their first game at the Mullins Center since losing to Jacksonville State Nov. 24.

UMass is off to its worst start since the 2002-03 season, where the Minutemen lost five of its first six games before beating Florida International at home. A loss to the Eagles would be the first time they went 1-6 since the 2000-01 season.

UMass has had almost all its games on the road. In its previous game against Toledo, Justin Arrygoog had a tip-in at the buzzer to beat the Minutemen, 57-56.

While UMass coach Derek Kellogg didn't get the offensive results he was looking for, he saw plenty of improvement from center Tyrell Lynch. The freshman finished with nine rebounds in 33 minutes.

"He could've had 15 [rebounds]," Kellogg said. "When he gets in playing shape and playing conditioning, that's what we're going to expect."

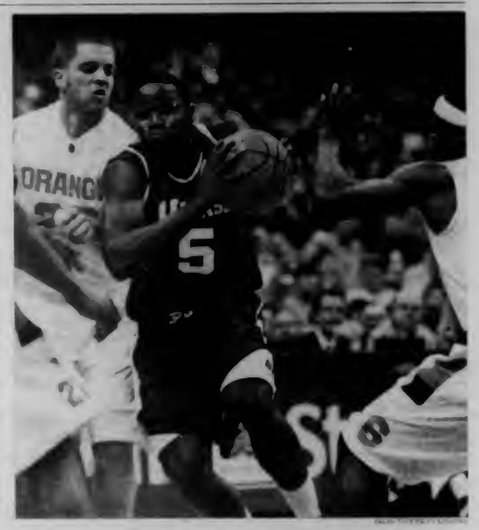
BC (5-2) will come into Amherst with two straight wins and plenty of confidence after finishing with a 4-0 conference record last season. Since joining the Atlantic Coast Conference during the 2005-06 season, the Eagles have otherwise held their own in a competitive basketball conference.

This year, BC is a lot more competitive and should give UMass problems with its size. While the Eagles aren't incredibly big and aren't deep in the frontcourt, but they're still bigger overall than the Minutemen, who have two active men above 6-foot-7.

"It's an important game because they're an ACC team and they're two hours down the road," Kellogg said.

Besides being close in proximity, Kellogg is simply looking for UMass to snap its five-game losing skid. He believes the team is starting to come together, but the Minutemen's short rotation will continue to test their character.

BC comes off a dramatic 57-55 win over Iowa after sustaining a 10-0 surge from the Hawkeyes with two minutes, nine seconds left to play.



The Eagles' main offensive weapon is point guard Tyrese Rice (who scored 15 against Iowa). The senior leads the team with 17.7 points per game and 4.0 assists.

For UMass, senior Chris Lowe should get the assignment for shutting down the catalyst to the Eagles' offense. Considering the point guard's recent struggles on both ends of the court, Lowe is looking forward to the challenge of stopping the sixth best scorer in the ACC.

"I guarded him for three years now, so I'm just going to play him man-up and give it all I've got," Lowe said of his defensive assignment.

The Minutemen are no strangers to facing the Eagles. The two teams have met 10 of the last 12

See M. BASKETBALL on page 13

Ricky Harris dribbles through the lane in a game against Syracuse last year. Harris leads the Minutemen with 18.7 points per game and shoots 76 percent from the free-throw line.

Chris Lowe goes up for a shot in a game last year. Lowe averages 14 points per game.

Freshman, Lynch, primary contributor off UM bench

Lynch toughing out start of first year

BY SCOTT FEITMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Sometimes in college basketball, there are a few elite freshmen who are instant superstars. Players like Greg Oden, O.J. Mayo and Carmelo Anthony were ready to play as soon as they stepped on the court.

Those players are the exception, not the rule. Most of the time a freshman does not find himself starting games unless circumstances force him to do so. Redshirt freshman Tyrell Lynch on the Massachusetts men's basketball team is such a player.

Originally, Lynch was expected to provide frontcourt depth off the bench behind Luke Bonner and Matt Hill. However, both players wound up injured two games into the season. Suddenly, Lynch found himself starting his first career college basketball game at the FedEx Forum against No. 13 Memphis in front of over 18,000 screaming fans. An atmosphere like that can be intimidating to a redshirt senior, never mind a freshman making his first career start.

"It's been tough, a lot tougher than what I expected," Lynch said about his first year. "Coming off a year sitting out and you have to expect it to be tough like this, so I'm staying optimistic, and I keep looking toward the future."

It wasn't an easy game for Lynch, but he played about as well as one could've expected. He notched six points and three rebounds in 20 minutes of action as the Minutemen (1-5) 80-58 lost to Memphis.

UM Dems recognized

BY EMILY REYNOLDS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Last Tuesday night, three members of the University of Massachusetts Democrats and UMass for Barack Obama were invited to the Massachusetts Democratic Party Headquarters to celebrate their achievements in registering voters for the 2008 election.

"It was a congratulatory event where the campaign workers were honoring the students," said Emma Einhorn, president of the UMass Democrats. "This is the first time they really organized campuses in this way, so they were really pleased with the turnout."

The two groups from the University of Massachusetts were recognized for their voter registration efforts. They registered close to 650 students and helped an additional 610 students to register for absentee ballots.

"It was a competition with other schools," said Ashley Coulombe, the press director for both clubs. "It gave more of an incentive for schools to register students."

Part of the drive was a $200 award for registering more students than any other school in the state. Northeastern University and Tufts University came in second and third, respectively.

"Our biggest draw was that we tabled at the dining hall," said Einhorn. "It was packed every night and got so busy. It was great. We got at least 100 students registered every night we were there."

UMass clubs registered 4,000 students collectively. The Student Government Association, MassPirg and the Cannabis Reform Coalition were among other organizations on campus that pushed to register students.

"We did a smaller voter registration last Spring semester, but we didn't get nearly the turnout we got this semester," said Einhorn. "This semester, students were really motivated by the historic election and Barack Obama, and the students really pushed this registration."

UMHHO also made calls for Obama the day of the election and the weekend leading up to it. They made around 2,300 calls to people all over the country, including swing states like New Hampshire and Pennsylvania.

High grades for academics but expenses too high for some

BY KATE DEVANS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A recent report by The National Center for Public Policy and Higher Education assessed public higher education in America, grading each state on a number of factors.

The Bay State received high marks in several areas, including an A in preparation, meaning how well young people are prepared for college, a B- in participation, how likely residents are to enroll in college; an A in completion, how many students enrolled actually receive a degree and an A in benefits, how much the standard of living is improved by possession of a college degree.

Massachusetts has improved in the key factor used to determine each of these rankings over the past several years.

However, like every other state except California, Massachusetts received an F in the affordability category. Massachusetts residents pay more than the national average — and more than students in states with higher-ranked educational systems — to attend two- and four-year colleges and universities.

Around 47,000 undergraduate students take advantage of the University of Massachusetts system, not counting all who attend public community and junior colleges. Depending on the school, 80-to-95 percent of them are Massachusetts residents. These students, according to the report, are generally both well-prepared and eager to attend college, but many of them will have difficulty paying for it.

The report found that even with financial aid, the average Massachusetts family would need to spend 26 percent of its annual income to send a student to a two-year state college and 32 percent for a four-year school. This represents around a 30 percent

Door closed on housing fund

BY CHRIS RUSSELL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The proposal to establish an Amherst Affordable Housing Trust Fund, known as Article Six, was defeated in the Nov. 10 special town meeting, but town officials are hopeful it will pass in the spring.

Town officials said the article was defeated primarily due to fear of the town being liable for debt incurred by the Trust.

According to the Amherst town Web site, the Trust's "purpose shall be to provide for the creation and preservation of affordable housing for the benefit of low and moderate income households."

The creation and preservation of affordable housing is currently performed by the Housing Partnership/Fair Housing Committee (HP/FH), an Amherst town committee, and the Amherst Housing Authority (AHA), a state agency.

Although the Select Board would appoint the Trust's Board of Trustees, it would be an independent agency. This would allow the Trust "more flexibility to investigate and develop affordable housing" than town committees, according to Nancy Gregg, chair of the HP/FH. Gregg said the Trust would have more flexibility because it could spend money to create and preserve affordable housing at any time, whereas town committees have to wait for the approval of a town meeting.

Roy Rosenblatt, a staff member of the HP/FH, said the Trust would also have more flexibility to develop affordable housing than the AHA because the development would be the Trust's sole purpose, while the AHA has other additional responsibilities and commitments.

Town officials also noted a housing Trust would be more likely to receive donations of money or property than town or state agencies.

Community groups gather to celebrate, examine Kwanzaa

BY NETHA GILL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

On Tuesday, Dec. 2, the Community Kwanzaa celebration was held in the Campus Center Auditorium from 6-to-9 p.m.

The event's purpose was to start the holiday season with a deeper look into the origins and meaning behind Kwanzaa's rituals and inception.

Kindyl Tolson, president of the People of Color United and senior at Amherst Regional High School, and Jonathan Nyawo, member of the Malcolm X Center's staff and a junior at the University of Massachusetts welcomed those in attendance at the event.

Professor in the Afro American Studies Department John Bracey was the keynote speaker of this event. The main focus of his speech was on self determination in modern day society.

He first compared it to that of the time during the civil rights movement, where it was decided that "we didn't want to be Negro anymore." In those times there was a clear objective, but now as Bracey said, "we don't where we are anymore." This time is often labeled as "post-industrial" or "post-modern," and Bracey feels that this generation of Blacks in America is going to have to unify, define what needs to be achieved and take it from there.

Mr. Julius Ford spoke on unifying the Black community on campus. He then sang the Black National Anthem, titled "Lift Every Voice and Sing."

Jason Cunningham, junior at UMass and member of Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity Inc., talked about the history of Kwanzaa.

He said, in 1966 the holiday was conceived and developed by Dr. Maulana Ron Karenga. It is usually celebrated from Dec., 26 to Jan. 1 with each day focusing on one of the seven principles called the Nguzo Saba.

The purpose of this holiday was to "reaffirm the commitment of African people to themselves, their families, their community, the struggle for equality and to reflect upon the Nugozo Saba that have sustained us," Cunningham said.

Bracey spoke on president-elect Barack Obama, describing him as a symbol for who have opened more possibilities for black Americans.

He said, "There are no excuses now ... if a brother can be president, you can get a 'B' average."

He also stressed the fact that change will not come from Obama alone, but rather it is up to the new generation to establish for themselves what is to come.

Then, the symbols of Kwanzaa as well as its principles and colors were explained. Black represents the people, red is for the blood and the struggle itself and green represents hope for a better future.

The lighting of the seven candles (Mishumaa saba) as symbols of the seven principles of Kwanzaa (Nguzo saba) followed.

Deqa Farah, a sophomore at Amherst Regional High School, lit the first candle which represents the principle called Ujoma, which stands for unity. This principle means "to strive for and maintain unity in our family, community, nation and race," Farah said.

Wasim Thomas, a sophomore at Amherst Regional High School, lit the second candle.

Study shows Mass. schools too pricey

increase in college costs relative to income over the past decade. For poor and working-class families, the percent of income needed to cover costs for a four-year college jumps to 49 percent of total earnings.

The report also showed that students from wealthy families receive more aid on average than those from lower and middle class families – possibly due to merit aid, which is given to talented students regardless of their financial situations. Many from lower income brackets are then forced to take out private loans, an often reluctant decision given difficult economic times.

With the United States in a recession, many state schools face budget cuts, and tuition costs are expected to rise further.

UMass students seemed to agree with the report findings, saying that the cost of tuition was unnecessarily high.

Freshman Matt Brown, for whom cost was a big factor in choosing a college, described the price as somewhat high for a state school. He said that while he was lucky to have avoided private loans, he was aware that this was not the case for many other students. He added, however, that it's possible for many students to get at least partial scholarships like the John and Abigail Adams Scholarship, which waives the cost of tuition at a state college or university for Massachusetts residents with high MCAS scores.

Fellow student Myles Ragland, who plans to transfer to community college next semester for partly financial reasons, described UMass as a great school at a not-so-great price. He said, "The fees are ridiculous. Don't get me wrong, I love the school, but it's too expensive."

Campus Democrats honored

Campaign posters and paraphernalia are laid out on Election Day in the Lincoln Campus Center. Two UMass groups were recognized for their efforts in registering University students for the presidential election.

nity members making calls," said Coulombe. "We also made about 300 calls to UMass students in Amherst that we and MassPirg registered."

In addition to the calls and voter registration, the two clubs also organized trips to New Hampshire on weekends to canvas.

"When we made trips, we sent up about 20 people, and we made about three or four big trips," said Coulombe. "Mt. Holyoke was recognized for canvassing. I think it's good to give out an award because it keeps student's interest up."

According to Einhorn, the clubs went to New Hampshire because as swing state, the election was more likely to be closely contested.

UMass Democrats and UMFBO started working together last spring to register voters. UMFBO was originally created to introduce students to Obama and spread information about him. Once it was clear that Obama was the front runner, the main concern was getting people registered so that they could vote for him.

Of the three students who were invited to the event, only Einhorn attended. Coulombe was also invited along with Matt Cadwallader, the president of UMFBO. At the event, Einhorn met John Kerry and asked him questions along with students from other schools.

"I was chosen to meet John Kerry outside and walk him upstairs to where the event was being held," said Einhorn. "He asked us about our experiences during the election and all kwed questions. He was amazing with the questions."

The event recognized schools that registered the most students to vote, made phone calls and sent people to canvas in New Hampshire.

"It was fun, and I got to meet a lot of people from other schools, which was really nice," said Einhorn.

Amherst shoots down fund

The article had approval from the Planning board, the Finance committee and the Select Board, as well as the support of the Town Manager and the League of Women Voters, yet failed to pass. According to Laurence Shaffer, Town Manager of Amherst, this was due to concern the town would assume debt incurred by the Trust.

Shaffer said Amherst would not be responsible for the Trust's debt, but this was not explained clearly enough at the town meeting.

"People expressed concern about the trust and frankly we didn't do as good a job as we might have in allaying those concerns," Shaffer said. "People want to have a more formal conversation about how the Trust's liability is structured and whether or not there is any way that liability passes through to the town. Hopefully we will make it clearer the town would not be responsible for the Trust's debt at the next meeting."

Gregg said some also may have voted against the Trust because it would not answer to town meetings.

"There are some people who cling to every power the town meeting has," Gregg said.

She said others were confused about how the Trust would benefit affordable housing more than the current system. Gregg also said "a reluctance to want more affordable housing in Amherst" may have helped defeat the trust. She said the failure of the proposed Butternut Farms affordable housing project provides some proof of this.

Originally proposed in 2002, Gregg said residents of the neighborhood where the project is supposed to be built have stalled the approval process.

"Some people were very irate about it," Gregg said.

Gerald Weiss, chair of the Select Board, said he does not believe reluctance to want more affordable housing among Amherst residents helped defeat the Trust. He did agree that Butternut Farms has been stalled by neighborhood residents though, and cited the several lawsuits brought against the town that tried to stop the project.

However, Weiss said that not all who oppose Butternut Farms do so because they object to having affordable housing near them.

"There is a fine line between the neighbors "having a not-in-my-backyard mentality," and having legitimate concerns," he said. "I think there were some things that were done badly when this first came forward that helped generate a sense of distrust. The neighborhood people felt like nobody was paying any attention to them. They felt the town was not listening to their concerns about density and traffic and the appropriateness of the size and scope of the project in that neighborhood."

Town officials expect the proposed affordable housing project on Olympia Drive to proceed more smoothly, because it is on town-owned land. According to Roy Rosenblatt, Amherst currently has about 900 units of affordable housing, about 11 percent of Amherst's total housing. To be considered affordable, the housing has to be available to those earning less than 80 percent of the area's median income.

According to 2000 census data cited in a recent report on the town's Web site concerning low income housing in Amherst, half of renters were spending more than 30 percent of their income on housing, about a third were spending more than 50 percent, and 18 percent of homeowners were spending more than 30 percent.

representing the Kujichagulia/Self-Determination principle. The objective of this principle is "to define ourselves, name ourselves and speak for ourselves instead of being defined, named, created for and spoken for by others," Thomas said.

Tony Gentils, a sophomore at UMass Amherst and a member of Alpha Phi Alpha, talked about the fraternity's vision of kujichagulia.

UMass sophomore Asia Taylor lit the third candle, representing Ujima, which stands for collective work and responsibility. Amaka Mbaulke voiced the Black Student Union's vision of Ujima.

Amherst Regional High School junior Yanlecc Rivera lit the fourth candle for Ujamaa, meaning Cooperative Economics. With this symbol people are "to build and maintain our own stores, shops and other businesses and profit from them together."

Sharina Dottin, a UMass sophmore, lit the fifth candle for Nia, meaning Purpose. This principle means "to make our collective vocation the building and developing of our community in order to restore our people to our traditional greatness," Dottin said.

Darius "D.J." Peyton, Amherst Regional High School sophmore, lit the sixth candle for creativity, called Kuumba. With this principle one must seek "to do always as much as we can in the way we can, in order to leave our community more beautiful and beneficial than we inherited it," he said.

The Cape Verdean Student Alliance also talked about their vision of Kuumba.

UMass senior Malika Jamal lit the last candle for Imani, meaning faith. This means, "to believe with all our hearts in our people, our parents, our teachers, our leaders, and the righteousness and victory of struggle," Jamal said. Then Kanisha Louis Jean, Jessica Toussaint and Marylynn Bauzile, members of Sigma Gamma Rho Sorority Inc., talked about their vision of Imani.

Byron Bullock, associate vice chancellor of Student Affairs at UMass led the libations ceremony. In this ceremony, one pours water in the bowl in honor of someone deceased who has impacted his life. Bullock poured in honored of pivotal figures in the struggle of African Americans such as Harriet Tubman, Sojourner Truth, Martin Luther King Jr., Malcolm X and Medgar Evars. Others came and poured libations for parents, grandparents and lost friends.

The Afrikan Pledge was addressed to the audience by Rick Pierre, president of Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity Inc.

CVSA then performed a variety of cultural dances, such as funana and batuque for the audience. The women wore long flowy skirts in red, white and blue, and the men wore white shirts and rolled up jeans.

Then a dedication to Kwanzaa was performed by Briana Figarella and Tolson. It was a combination of poetry and song.

The event concluded with the blessing of the Karamu (Feast) by Mr. Kenneth Tolson Sr.

The food provided for this feast was donated by the Goodwin memorial AME Zion Church in Amherst. It was asked that elders be served first, then families with small kids and finally students.

College, if you want to

Nick O'Malley

You can dance if you want to. You can leave your friends behind. Because if your friends don't dance and if they don't dance, well, they're no friends of mine.

You can follow Internet fads if you want to, but you will be made fun of because of it. It may seem like an awesome idea right now, but down the road, a lot of the stuff you do now will be as ridiculous as a flock of seagulls.

You, or someone you know, has gone to yearbookyourself.com and put it as a profile picture. If this is you, it is also very likely that you've posted pictures of yourself after being "Simpsonized" or "South Parkized." This has already ceased to be cool and barreling toward ridiculous. Hide the evidence now.

You can complain about the New Facebook if you want to, but you're already used to it. You've either seen, been a part of or created one of the groups heralding the site's inevitable doom. Prophecies were abound of how the change would bring the site down in flames, leaving college's most prevalent time-waster as a smoldering crater.

But face it, you're used to it already.

You can watch America's Next Top Model if you want to, unless you're a dude. Most TV you watch right now is ridiculous and you know it. Assuming, of course, you actually have time to watch TV.

Twenty years from now, you're going to look back upon you college self and realize you watched the likes of Tila Tequila (twice), New York (also twice) and Flavor Flav (three times).

Really? Flavor Flav gets three shots at this? What's wrong with you people?

You can smoke if you want to, since now all you'll get is a fine. You won't get arrested for setting off your fire alarm, claiming that you were "spraying cologne."

Nowadays, your tendency to lie down, eat stolen DC food and watch the scrolling channel screen on channel 20 is now more legally accepted. That, and Hampshire College has suddenly become a much more attractive college destination.

You can pay attention to politics if you want to, but it really doesn't make a difference. Sure, you could've watched CNN everyday and read The New York Times in order to keep up with the issues. But the only time the elections got interesting was during the "Maverick" drinking games and mercilessly making fun of republicans afterwards. Sorry guys.

Twenty years from now, you're going to look back upon you college self and realize …

In fact, the only necessary political actions you need in college are in riot form. People don't read your blog, but they'll cheer you on if you light something on fire.

You can ignore most school functions if you want to, unless they're for extra credit. Why? Because you have a 15-page paper due Friday and, you know what, you really don't care about that "distinguished faculty lecture."

You can drink if you want to, but don't tell anyone about it.

With your luck, you have an RA (who, more often than not, isn't even yours, he lives upstairs) who wants to jeopardize your college career for something that has been widely accepted as part of the college culture. By the way, that RA walked past a dozen rooms with parties in them last night, but those kids didn't have your stupid friend that never shut the door.

Whether or not you support the Amethyst Initiative, it probably helps you out or will get you out of doing beer runs for freshmen, which is weird, because 18, 19 and 20 year olds don't do anything of the sort.

You can write columns entirely in the second-person if you want to, just as long as you make it work. Because originality takes you further than your 10-page paper on Samoan poetry. That, and your friends didn't think you would.

Just don't get caught up in the useless things while you're here. You don't want to remember these (preferably) four years of your life sweating over your Stats class. Then again, you could just go to school for a decade. The real world sucks.

You can quote songs incorrectly (it's actually "we can dance if we want to," if you want to, because you really can't make it much worse. You will find that the iPhone is one of the few decent things to come out of this decade. The economy's crap, Britney Spears refuses to go away, Tom Cruise belongs in a box and Miley Cyrus is schizophrenic, and nobody's doing anything about it.

But, as ridiculous as this all looks now … one day, this will be your 80s.

Another New Deal? Try trains.

Paul Payer

Assuming the office of the Presidency during the height of the Great Depression and facing record unemployment, Franklin Delano Roosevelt led the country out of economic peril through an expansive economic policy focused on putting Americans back to work.

Seventy-five years later, Americans are once again faced with a challenge which threatens the future of our economic prosperity. Unemployment has exploded in the past year, reaching a rate of 6.7 percent following a month of November in which 533,000 Americans lost their jobs, a 34-year high.

Last week, The National Bureau of Economic Research confirmed what was already painstakingly obvious to the 1.9 million Americans who have lost their jobs in 2008: the economy is in a recession.

As congress continues to iron out the details of a bailout deal for the American automotive industry, President-elect Barack Obama has begun to outline his plan for economic recovery.

As Obama appointed members to his Cabinet, the media fawned over the notion of Obama selecting "a team of rivals," a concept suggested by historian Doris Kearns Goodwin to describe Abraham Lincoln's decision to staff his cabinet with individuals of conflicting ideology and perspectives. The comparison is legitimate, but perhaps Obama should also consider following the direction of another Presidential icon, Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

So far, it seems as if Obama has taken some advice from the book of FDR. In his recent weekly address to the nation, Obama mentions the need to embark upon a public works effort unprecedented since the development of the interstate highway system in the 1950s.

An expansion of America's public transportation system would … restore the world's respect for American ingenuity and invention.

Obama identifies five major areas for improvement; update schools to meet 21 century needs, repair the national infrastructure of roads and bridges, invest in alternative energy, expand broadband Internet access and improve medical recordkeeping by switching to an electronic record system.

Obama notes that these tasks will not only improve infrastructure and cut down on operating costs, but will create new jobs for an American workforce desperately in need of gainful employment.

For example, take Obama's plan to invest in alternative energy. One project Obama mentions would be to retrofit all federal buildings with green technology. This would not only spur growth in the alternative energy industry, but would cut down on annual operational costs for the buildings by saving on energy expenses and create thousands of American jobs.

Obama's new direction is certainly encouraging and necessary to America's economic recovery, but his plan ignores a valuable opportunity to create jobs, further America's energy independence and catch up to the rest of the world in terms of transportation and technology.

That opportunity is Amtrak.

The public transportation system in America is, simply, abysmal. Transportation systems in Europe and other first world countries provide communities with affordable, sensible and ecologically viable means of transportation.

An expansion of America's public transportation system would not only create hundreds of thousands of jobs, but it would restore the world's respect for American ingenuity and invention. High speed trains have been in development across Europe and Asia, including in China, where magnetic powered trains connect to Shanghai at speeds over 220 miles per hour.

This need not even be an issue of cutting edge technology. Comprehensive public transportation systems existed in the 1960s before the widespread advent of the automobile (including the buyout and subsequent dismantling of rail companies and infrastructure by the automotive industry). Furthermore, several mass transit systems located in the nation's major metropolitan cities indicate that efficient public transportation is possible.

At one point, it seemed as if public transportation had finally reached a level of public interest and concern as gas prices spiraled to over $4 a gallon. Amtrak and metropolitan transportation systems across the country enjoyed record ridership last summer as commuters sought relief from the pump.

The rapid decline in the price of oil resulting from decreased demand in a weakened economy has quelled some of those motives. But interest will rise once again as the market recovers and demand increases, once again allowing OPEC to continue their game of cat and mouse with oil prices.

There is no question that the United States must reform and expand its public transportation system. The current method of transportation in this country relies on an energy source of an impermanent nature and prone to extreme price volatility.

Eventually the price of gasoline or the simple absence of it will require alternative means of transportation. No amount of new roads or "Big Dig" projects can address the future traffic congestion caused by a national population expected to double by 2050.

There is no better time for this project than right now. A massive public transportation undertaking would have an effect similar to that of FDR's New Deal programs which built a country and put an economy back to work. President-elect Barack Obama made a promise of change on election night to the American people, now it's time for him to follow through on the deal.

Return to an American republic

Eric Magazu

With whom do you feel you have the most influence: your city mayor, the president of the United States or your parents and siblings? Unless you are extraordinarily talented and influential, I assume that your influence is maximized among your family members. This is a verity that the history of civilization confirms. There is a constant conflict between the desire for control that is made manifest in great empires and the desire for liberty that is made manifest with independence and local autonomy.

Until very recently, conservatives and their philosophical forerunners were always strong advocates of republican government. Republicanism is enshrined in the United States Constitution under Section 4 of Article IV: "The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government," and in the Tenth Amendment, "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

I want to point out that this form of government has nothing to do with the Republican Party, but rather it is a system of the vertical division of power among varying levels of government. A republican form of government leaves power closest to the people, unless and until certain specifically enumerated powers are delegated upward toward more centralized government.

People are happiest when they have the most control over their lives. We have incredible autonomy as individuals. In our families, we may not always get our choice of supper, but we are generally happy with our living arrangements. In our cities and towns, we can easily get to know our local officeholders. In our state we have less say, but we understand its quirks. At the national level, we start to feel disenfranchised if a candidate we disfavor wins an election. By the time authority reaches the international level, most of us feel completely powerless.

There are great arguments for more centralized power. We can have more influence in world affairs, distribute wealth more equally, regulate commerce more uniformly, experiment with new social paradigms more easily, and, for those who are very talented, have stronger influence over the lives of our fellow man.

It is this tension between republican and centralized government, and not the issue of slavery, that dominated the national debate that led up to the civil war. In 1798, when there was a great outcry over the Alien and Sedition Acts, the Kentucky legislature passed several resolutions, the first of which teaches us, "whensoever the general [i.e., federal] government assumes undelegated powers, its acts are unauthoritative, void, and of no force." In 1833, during Andrew Jackson's presidency, this idea was at the heart of the Nullification Crisis.

The fundamental question is how much we value liberty and local control over collective rights and control by a distant power. Many of us desire to see more equity in the distribution of wealth, and this can be a strong argument for central government. However, as power gets more distant, it is hard for us to have a genuine love for a fellow man that is required for such social programs to work.

We can say with confidence that liberty and local control is the best course of action.

God instituted disparities of wealth so that a man would have a need for his fellow man, and that, through kindness and justice, we can build the bonds of affection among each other. If we delegate this right to distant powers, we generate discord between the givers and the receivers.

We can say with confidence that liberty and local control is the best course of action. While foreign countries are not subject to the U.S. Constitution, there is a similar idea that occurs in the intercourse among nations. Individual nations, and groups of people within each nation, want to have as much sovereignty over their own affairs as possible. While many nations have their own internal concerns, they also feel threatened by the overwhelming influence of the United States, especially when we teach values and morals that run contrary to their own.

I'm confident that this overextension of American power is at the heart of much of the resentment that exists among citizens of other nations, since most people express great love for our principles, but become discontented when they see our inconsistency in applying these principles. In one such example, if we stopped trying to remake the Middle East in our own image, and instead assisted ordinary people in achieving the national aspirations and form of government they most desire, terrorism against Western targets would disappear.

The amazing achievement of the early American settlers was their determination in establishing government that was most responsive to the aspirations of the families with whom it was composed. The idea that every man is a brother to his fellow, and that the only legitimate government is that which each man covenants into voluntarily, is the only safe way with which to preserve liberty. This idea lies at the very heart of republican government, and it is an idea that must be preserved and expanded if we are ever to see a day when all men breathe free.

Of food, fasting, fowl and pets

Ben Moriarty

Christmas is coming, and you know what that means. For the Eastern Orthodox, it's the Nativity Fast, where they abstain from meat, dairy, wine and occasionally more, starting 40 days before Christmas. For the western Roman Catholics, it's Advent, which has a similar fast.

Aside from general knowledge of fasting, I am very intrigued by the practice of abstaining from meat. This is not because I wonder why the religious abstain, but why other people do, year round. They abstain from particular types of animals. You have the people who don't eat meat because animals are cute, the people who disagree with the treatment certain animals receive and the people who secretly think they're better than people who do eat meat. Then you have the non-pet-arians.

I think most people fall under the last category. Not many people want to eat their pets, and for good reason.

I inquired into several ads where pets were being given away. Most of the time, it was a result of a pet having offspring and, being unable to take care of them all, the person needed to give some away. So I offered to take them with one catch.

I was going to eat them.

It didn't come as a surprise when I was turned down. It does surprise me, however, that I was willing to give my name at the risk of becoming known as "the kid who likes to eat pets," (which is, by the way, totally false). So I did the only thing I could: I tried to figure out why, despite having an idea, people wouldn't let me eat their pets.

"Because no one wants their pets to be eaten. You have an emotional bond to them," said Kate Marsh, class of 2011. After some probing, I got Kate to admit that she didn't have an emotional bond to her fish. This is probably a result of them being dull, boring and merely decorative. "Still, you raised them and you're responsible for them."

Not many people want to eat their pets, and for good reason.

So what about farmers or those who raise animals like cows from when they were cute little calves?

Marsh responded with, "no, that's not bad because that's what they need to do to live. They just need to not be cruel."

Joseph Berger, class of 2010, replied similarly. "For me, I don't think I'd be able to eat a cow if I raised it, but you can't really fault the farmer for their job. I do love my hamburgers, but the factory farming methods are horrible. But, in order to maintain competition, farmers must adapt."

It's seemingly clear. People get pets for companions (or decoration), and they don't want to eat their pets because they have an emotional bond to their companions. But what about other people's pets, who you don't have any emotional bond to?

Curiously enough, everyone I questioned wouldn't eat someone else's pet even if the owner didn't mind, despite this situation being like the farmer's. And this includes animals like chickens and cows which they regularly eat and aren't the most common "companion" animals.

"It was someone else's, so you know it was living and what not. It's easy to take the life out of a packaged chicken at a store, [which is] messed up," answered Marsh. Berger also remarked that he wouldn't eat their pet, saying "even if they were OK with it, I'd assume they still wouldn't want me to."

People won't eat someone else's animal, an animal that they have no emotional attachment to, and that the owner also doesn't have an attachment to. And yet they have no problem eating something from a store or restaurant, because there is also no attachment.

There is an obvious contradiction and a very seemingly underlying hypocrisy here. And I say that with myself being a part of this group.

Is it acceptable for us to value life only in situations that involve our conscious well-being? Or, should we accept the fact that since we acknowledge farmers aren't doing anything wrong, we should forgo our ideas when it comes to matters like eating certain animals?

It seems we all have a little 'animals are too cute to eat' in us. We just have to decide whether we find it acceptable to pick and choose what animals are OK to eat by their effect on our conscious, or, forego these ideas and realize all animals are the same to eat or not to eat despite any emotionality.

Former 'Sunny' singer hits Iron Horse

Jeremy Enigk brings new album along to display with older tunes and fan favorites

Jeremy Enigk (center) comes to the Iron Horse this Wednesday playing new tunes from his next solo album that will be released in February.

By Angela Stamowski
Collegian Staff

On Wednesday, Dec. 10 at 8:30 p.m., former Sunny Day Real Estate front man Jeremy Enigk is set to strut his solo chops at Iron Horse Music Hall in Northampton.

With a new album nearing on the horizon, as well as two previous solo releases and a fortune of Sunny Day songs, Enigk comes to Western Mass. with an impressive portfolio of acoustically stunning tunes.

Best known for his deceivingly powerful falsetto that pioneered the emotional rock movement, Enigk possess a naturally endearing quality that allows for a great deal of stylistic diversity.

Early in his career, Enigk found success with Sunny Day Real Estate, producing hard-working, heartfelt tunes that often wandered the themes of life and death.

Sunny Day's debut record, "Diary," was released on independent record label Sub Pop in 1994, a label they shared with Nirvana.

Songs like "In Circles" and "Seven" made their way to rotation on MTV, but the band never showed interest in such exposure.

In fact, while promoting "Diary" they only agreed to do one interview and released a single publicity photograph, creating an enigmatic image that was well suited to their sound and message.

After various other successful releases, including 1998's "How it Feels to Be Something On" and its final album "The Rising Tide," Sunny Day Real Estate parted ways for good in 2001.

To this day, however, all members have maintained an enormous following, several even joining forces with Nirvana's Dave Grohl to form Foo Fighters.

Enigk was no exception to this rule. Since officially splitting with his former band mates, he has been hard at work pursuing other endeavors, including a band called "The Fire Theft," which he formed with William Goldsmith and Nate Mendel of Sunny Day Real Estate.

The band released a self-titled debut in 2002, which remains its first and only album to date. While the project remains on the back burner for Enigk, there is always the potential for another record from the trio.

"We never really broke up … we just said we'd take a break and that we'll get back to it when we're ready. … But we've just not talked about it since. It may happen one day," said Enigk in a recent interview for Billboard.com.

The majority of Enigk's music and tears, however, has been directed toward his solo work. His first album, "Return of the Frog Queen" was released in 1996 during an indefinite hiatus of Sunny Day Real Estate.

The album featured a full orchestra and carried by denser content over Sunny Day's sheer volume, was significantly influenced by Enigk's religious conversion that same year. It has been rumored that his new arrangements contributed to the end of Sunny Day Real Estate, but the reminder has never been confirmed.

Regardless of reference to faith, he continued to produce beautiful tunes that transcended the conventional rock and roll stereotype.

In 2003, Enigk scored the soundtrack to the film "The United States of Leland," creating soaring piano-based ballads like "Don't Let Regret" and "Ballroom," which added his distinct brand of emotion to the movie's

Enigk's next album, "World Waits," released in 2006, was Enigk's second solo record. The album allowed Enigk to explore the expanses of his vocal range, while accentuating his taste for experimental sounds.

The album was released on the singer's own label, Lewis Hollow Records, which was named after a tune from "Return of the Frog Queen." He also released a follow up entitled "The Missing Link" on his label in 2007, which featured five live recordings of "World Waits" tunes amongst a few new tracks.

Enigk's next album (tentatively titled "Oh Bear" is set to be released in February 2009.

Of course, Enigk's current proclivity for softer sounds does not nullify the intensity of his Sunny Day-era power. Once his next album is alleged to be a more raucous return to the louder side of music.

"There guys are Sunny Day Real Estate fans and the moment they got their hands on my songs, whether they were mellow or not they turned them into heavy rockers," says Enigk of the album's producers.

On his current tour, Enigk has been performing a combination of his tried and true originals and some unreleased material, as well as the occasional song from his former bands.

Be it a loud or soft, guitar or piano based, Enigk possesses the art of vocal sincerity and genuine passion that makes everything he sings turn gold.

Jeremy Enigk will be performing at Iron Horse Music Hall in Northampton on Wednesday, Dec. 10 at 8:30 p.m. Tickets are $15 in advance or $18 at the door.

Gregory announced to host 'Meet The Press'

NBC's long search for Russert's heir over

David Gregory was announced on Sunday as the new moderator of "Meet the Press."

By Maura Golf and Fayl Fiore
Los Angeles Times

NEW YORK — "Meet the Press," NBC's Sunday morning political forum, has announced that journalist David Gregory will take the helm of the program.

The announcement was made six months after the death of longtime moderator Tim Russert. The announcement of Gregory, NBC's chief White House correspondent, was no surprise, having leaked out days after weeks of speculation.

Interim host Tom Brokaw confirmed the news at the end of Sunday's show, introducing Gregory as a great friend and cherished colleague."

Gregory, 48, called the appointment "daunting and humbling" and briefly choked up on the air as he described the program's "great purpose."

"There's a lot of pressure," he said later. "I'm not Tim Russert, but I can, working with this team, try really hard to make him proud."

Bob Schieffer, moderator of CBS's "Face the Nation" and a close friend of Russert's, called Gregory "a very good choice."

"He'll be a tough competitor, and I intend to give him no break whatsoever," Schieffer said.

Gregory's arrival could recharge the political rivalry among the Sunday political talk shows after 11 years in which "Meet the Press" has dominated the ratings.

Gregory has covered three presidential campaigns and the Bush White House, where he was known for his pugnacious questions. He faces no doubt that he faces a challenge in living up to the legacy of Russert, who served as moderator for nearly 17 years before dying from a heart attack in June 2008. "Tim left such a void there that there was no natural to step into that role," said Gurney Utley, a former NBC anchor who preceded Russert in the post.

Network executives spent months mulling candidates such as NBC chief foreign affairs correspondent Andrea Mitchell, NBC political director Chuck Todd, PBS anchor Gwen Ifill and CBS anchor Katie Couric.

But throughout the process, Gregory was the front-runner, said NBC News President Steve Capus.

"After we had any number of conversations that I would characterize as planning sessions from either Jeff's or Steve's point of view, David had the top spot and it was going to take something extraordinary to knock him out of that position," Capus said.

Internal contests within NBC may key to unlock.

"We don't have the luxury of stopping up and putting up to spend," he said. "The country is in two deep turmoil on so many fronts that we thought it was important to be ready to go from Day One. This is the toughest Washington insider's job, and David has prepared day in and day out [for] this job. He's the person we want to be."

Gregory is giving up his daily afternoon show on MSNBC but will continue as substitute anchor on the Today show.

What really makes us happy these days?

Studies highlight emotional influence within community

By Judith Graham
McClatchy Newspapers

You may think your attentive spouse, your loving children and your good friends are what make you happy. But something else may be going on: The people they're connected with are making you happy too.

So suggests a new study proposing that happiness is transmitted through social networks, almost like a germ is spread through personal contact. The research was published Thursday in BMJ, a British medical journal.

It's the latest in a growing body of work investigating how our social connections, neighbors, friends, family, coworkers, fellow congregants at church and other associates affect us. The premise is that we live in a social environment that shapes what we do and how we think and feel.

"We've known for some time that social relationships are the best predictor of human happiness, and this paper shows that the effect is much more powerful than anyone realized," said Daniel Gilbert, author of "Stumbling on Happiness" and a professor of psychology at Harvard University.

Previous research by the authors, James Fowler of the University of California San Diego, and Dr. Nicholas Christakis at Harvard, has concluded that social networks influence obesity and tobacco use by altering perceptions of acceptable weight and desirable behavior.

Now they've turned their attention to the emotional realm, exploring how social ties influence our moods and our sense of well-being. Their primary finding: People who are surrounded by happy people are more likely to be happy themselves. And it's not only people in our immediate circles who make a difference, it's the people surrounding the people we know.

Imagine several pebbles thrown into a pool of water that send ripples outward, said Fowler, an associate professor of political science. Each pebble represents a happy person and the waves the impact of that person's mood on others. This impact, his study found, extends through several degrees of separation, to the friends of a person's friends.

Some experts question whether the researchers' statistical methodology can support that conclusion. It's difficult to sort out cause and effect in this kind of research and the authors may not have done so with enough rigor, said Charles Manski, a Northwestern University economics professor who studies how inferences can be drawn from social interactions.

He asks, is it that one person's happiness makes another person happy, or could it be that another factor experienced by both people is affecting both?

Say two friends are watching a TV show together, and one laughs after the other does, Manski said. It may look like the first person's chuckle is the cause of the second, but the jokes on the TV show might inspire both reactions.

Christakis said his research factored out such mutual influences. The study asked the subjects 4,739 participants in the famous Framingham Heart Study in Massachusetts to complete a survey including four questions relating to happiness three times between 1983 and 2003. They also provided information about social contacts, which allow researchers to map their connections.

The study found that happy people form clusters and the happiest people are those most centrally located in the clusters.

"If you imagine the fabric of humanity as a patchwork quilt, it turns out if you're happy or not depends on if you're in a happy or unhappy patch," Christakis said.

"We postulate that people who are in closer, more frequent contact with each other are more susceptible to catching each other's moods," Fowler said.

The researchers stress that personal factors such as jobs or marriages also affect happiness and that although happiness may fluctuate, people tend to return to a personal happiness "set point" over time. It is this relatively stable emotional condition they examined in the paper, not the fleeting moods people experience day to day.

Richard Suzman, director of the division of behavior and social research at the National Institute on Aging, said the line of research holds "enormous promise in helping us improve interventions aimed at helping people change behaviors and improving public health."

Such interventions may involve targeted programs designed to alter social networks that influence behavior. The institute on aging has provided funding for Fowler and Christakis' work.

An editorial accompanying the report in BMJ called its conclusions "intriguing" but advised caution. Framingham

Researchers are studying how happiness is bred and cultivated in groups and communities.

a relatively small community, may prove unique in ways not yet understood, wrote Peter Sainsbury, director of population health in Sydney South West Area Health Service in Australia.

As for whether unhappiness is also spreadable, Fowler and Christakis plan to look at that topic in upcoming papers on loneliness, depression and social networks.

Nicole Kidman stars in the new Baz Luhrman ("Romeo + Juliet") film "Australia" alongside Hugh Jackman ("The Prestige"), but she isn't being used a a marketing tool for the film. Rather the studio is using Luhrman's past successes as a director, and Jackman's good looks to garner the film attention and praise from the public.

Judgement still out, Nicole Kidman 'star?'

Falling short of the standards left behind

By Patrick Goldstein
Los Angeles Times

HOLLYWOOD — When I wrote about "Australia's" critical and commercial prospects on my blog the other day, I said, somewhat flippantly, that the movie "once again proves that Nicole Kidman is many things, but not a movie star." The film, in fact, is being sold by 20th Century Fox largely as a Baz Luhrmann extravaganza, not as a Kidman-Hugh Jackman picture. I've been getting a lot of flak from readers, especially loyal Australians, who have been posting comments defending Kidman's movie stardom and, well, basically saying that I'm an idiot.

Fair enough. But who's right? Is she a star or isn't she?

First, let's define our terms. In the movie business, being a star isn't about being a recognizable celebrity. If that were true, Paris Hilton and Lindsay Lohan would be getting $15 million a picture. Being a star is not about being a great actress, either, or Kate Winslet and Cate Blanchett would be getting $15 million a picture. (For the record, Kidman has given many fine performances, going all the way back to "To Die For." She can be a formidable presence on screen.) Being a movie star is about a very simple equation. Do people pay money on opening weekend to see you in a movie?

Movie marketers want actors whose presence in a picture makes rank-and-file moviegoers say, "Oh, my God, I want to see that movie."

By that standard, Kidman doesn't fill the bill. ("Australia" placed fifth, with $20 million, over its holiday opening.) In fact, there are shockingly few female stars of any stature who fulfill that equation. I called a couple of movie marketers to ask if I was being unfair to Kidman. Their answer: No.

As one marketer cannily noted, "If someone moves a Will Smith film onto one of your [release] dates, you panic. If someone moves a Nicole Kidman movie onto your date, you shrug. She's just not a real commercial force." Or as another marketer put it, "She's an actress, not a movie star. There's a big difference."

You can check out her track record at the-numbers.com, one of the more reliable box-office websites. It reveals that Kidman has had several distinct chapters in her career, but only one relatively brief period where you could say she was a genuine star.

In the Tom Cruise Era in the early to mid-1990s, she was an intriguing new screen luminary, but her only big hits — "Days of Thunder" and "Batman Forever" — were summer action movies carried by Cruise or "Batman's" Val Kilmer, Jim Carrey and company.

The 2001-05 era established Kidman as a recognizable commodity. She appeared in a series of international hits, notably "Moulin Rouge," "The Others," "Cold Mountain," "Bewitched" and "The Interpreter." But marketing experts say none of these movies was solely propelled by her star wattage. "The Others," for example, was a genre thriller sold on its concept, not its star. "The Interpreter" had Sean Penn, who could've carried the film with almost any actress. Ditto for "Bewitched," which was as much Will Ferrell's movie as Kidman's film.

As far as Kidman is concerned, 2006-08 was the Ice Age, with flops like "Fur" and "The Invasion." Kidman was a supporting presence in "The Golden Compass," but marketers say that movie did well overseas because of its concept, not its costars.

At best, Kidman has helped elevate genre material ("The Others") or delivered a strong performance ("Cold Mountain" and "The Hours"), but it's hard to say she drove fans to the theaters, as Will Smith does – or as Julia Roberts did in her heyday.

What's really depressing is that when you ask marketing execs to name the actresses who do earn their keep, you're usually met with silence. There are always caveats: Meryl Streep in the right role, as with "Mamma Mia!"; Angelina Jolie, who can put some extra oomph in a genre film like "Wanted"; Reese Witherspoon or Sandra Bullock in the right kind of comedy. In today's Hollywood, it's a lot easier to build a career as a respected actress than as a box-office icon. Whether you're Kidman or anyone else, it's a man's, man's, man's world.

Kidman got her Oscar in the film "The Hours" for her portrayal of literary icon Virginia Woolf but it didn't catapult her into an instant box-office success.

down the stretch. In the final 3 minutes of regulation Gaffney grabbed five rebounds, blocked a shot and scored four points, while also sending the game to overtime on a tip-in with 4 seconds remaining off a missed Chris Lowe free throw.

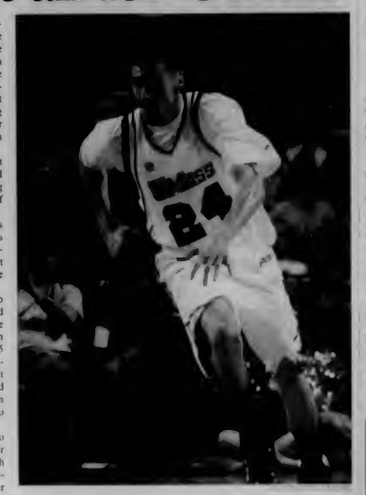
"I was just thinking I've got to put this in. I saw it bounce off the rim, and I just wanted to get my hand on the ball and put it up on the rim because I knew if I missed that one I would have another chance at it," Gaffney said of the tip-in that sent the game to overtime. "Luckily, I put a little touch on it and it dropped in."

"For Gaffney to give us a chance to win it with that last tip-in is a testament to a young man who had one more game that will go down in the lore of one of the great games in UMass basketball history," Kellogg said after the game. "The kid was everywhere."

Gaffney has put up numbers all year, averaging 12.7 points, 13.1 rebounds (third in the nation) and five blocks (second in the nation) per game. But one thing Gaffney brings to the court every game that can't be seen in the box score is his energy.

"Have you ever seen the Tasmanian devil?" Kellogg asked after the game. "That is what [Gaffney] looks like out there. It looks like there are 10 of him."

The 6-foot-8 forward is putting up impressive numbers while playing just about every minute (36.9 minutes per game, a team high). And he's doing it all while playing out of position. Since 7-foot center Luke Bonner went down, Gaffney has been playing more the role of the five-man for UMass, but it hasn't slowed him down one bit.



"[Gaffney] is going against guys that are 6-9 and 6-10 and competing his butt off," Kellogg said. "I'm so happy and proud of that kid it's not even funny."

The Minutemen made strides against the Eagles, but there is still work to be done. As their 1-6 record shows, Gaffney cannot single handily win games for the Minutemen.

One player UMass needs to step up is Chris Lowe. Lowe had eight points and 11 assists in the loss, but was held scoreless on 0-for-8 shooting until there was 5 minutes, 23 seconds left in the second half. He also committed eight turnovers. The senior point guard has played well at times early in the season, but has struggled to do it with any consistency.

The Minutemen must also get more production off of their bench. Against BC, UMass' bench added just six points and has averaged less than nine points per game.

Tony Gaffney ranks third in the counties with 13.1 rebounds per game. He is tied for second in the nation with five blocks per night.

Comeback effort falters in overtime

the efficient-scoring ability of Rice that sparked the Eagle offense late in the game. Twice during the overtime period, Rice followed UMass possessions with a basket to retake the lead.

Three other BC players scored 16 points, including forward Joe Trapani who also added a strong interior presence with 12 rebounds.

With UMass guard Anthony Gurley having only limited success driving to the basket and Lowe struggling with his jump shot (2-for-12 shooting, eight points), Harris' 23 second-half points proved crucial to keeping pace with the Eagles.

Though the loss continued the theme of the team's inability to close out games, the performance offered tangible signs of progress for Kellogg. However, the coach acknowledged that the nature of this year's team won't necessarily translate into many comfortable victories.

"We're going to be in a lot of tight basketball games this year," Kellogg said. "We're not overpowering enough to go and blow other teams out. That's just not the type of team we have. We have a gritty, scrappy bunch that will have to give everything they have every game — or we're just less than average."

The Minutemen remained frustrated with their inability to get a win, but like Kellogg, can also point to progress.

"These losses are hard to [illegible], but we're clearly growing," Gaffney said. "As a team we know what we're capable of, so we knew that we'd have to stay in game until the end. I think we're more confident now and hungrier for a win."

Consequently, BC coach Al Skinner was relieved to leave Amherst having survived the overtime period and get a win for his young team. But the UMass alumnus also left feeling impressed with the Minutemen's potential.

"I've seen some of the games UMass has played and I think that as is by far its best of the season," Skinner said. "Michael King can be instrumental in making a student into..."

BCS founders defend controversial system

By Randall Mell
Associate Sportswriter

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. — The men who created the BCS don't wear disguises when they go out in public.

They haven't changed their names or relocated to exotic islands.

In fact, Roy Kramer and Gene Corrigan are proud of what they've wrought even as a new legion of BCS bashers forms in Texas to curse their handiwork.

"I'm tremendously pleased with how it's working," said Kramer, the former SEC commissioner who put the controversial structure in place as the first BCS coordinator in 1998. "One of the purposes was to make the regular season more interesting and exciting, and I think it's accomplished that to an enormous degree. I'm watching an NFL game (Sunday) and in the middle of the game, they're talking about the BCS. You never heard that in the past."

Kramer and Corrigan spoke for an hour on the telephone Monday morning.

Corrigan, the former ACC commissioner who helped Kramer invent the BCS, wasn't calling to see if the newest storm of discontent raging in Texas will finally require they enlist in a witness protection program. He was calling to compare notes about the game they still love. Though both are retired, they remain vital parts of the BCS. They vote in the Harris Interactive Poll.

All you Texas fans cursing them should know they both assert that they voted Texas ahead of Oklahoma this week. They are among the 133 former coaches, administrators, players and media who vote in a poll that accounts for one-third of the BCS standings.

"We never thought the BCS was a perfect system," said Corrigan, who was Notre Dame's athletic director before joining the ACC. "But it was a hell of a lot better than what we had. People forget that. When you look back, the bowl system was so completely bad. You almost never got No. 1 to play No. 2."

Before the Bowl Coalition morphed into the Bowl Alliance and finally the BCS, bowl officials secretly wooed teams in smoke-filled back rooms, typically making deals in early November. They gambled that the teams they picked would win out and retain their high rankings.

The gambles didn't always pay off.

In the 50 seasons between 1942 and '91, The Associated Press No. 1 team met No. 2 just eight times in a bowl game, about once every [illegible].

The BCS, of course, is a perfect [illegible] up No. 1 vs. No. 2 since its creation.

The outrage is over who most deserves [illegible] and why a playoff is so distasteful to [illegible].

"There will always be some controversy," Kramer said. "You can't eliminate it. I never got so many letters as I got for leaving someone out [illegible] made the NCAA tournament when [illegible] ball committee."

That won't appease Texas fans, [illegible] and Penn State who think their [illegible] champs are being unfairly excluded.

In Sunday's newest BCS standings, [illegible] held tight to No. 1 while Oklahoma [illegible] ssally moved up to No. 2, jumping over [illegible] Longhorns slipped to No. 3.

That's notable because Texas beat Oklahoma [illegible] on a neutral field in Dallas in the first [illegible] in October. It was notable, too, because the BCS standings were used as the tiebreaker separating Oklahoma, Texas and Texas Tech from their [illegible] Big 12 South. Oklahoma is now favored in the Championship Game with an [illegible] national title game.

"Going into the last couple weeks, the [illegible] good team was going to be left out of the Big 12 championship," Texas coach Mack Brown said. "I [illegible] in this situation, it was us. We don't [illegible] agree with it or think it's fair, but [illegible] we'll handle it and move forward."

Though Texas beat both Oklahoma and Missouri, the Longhorns will watch the Sooners and Tigers [illegible] Big 12 title Saturday in Kansas City, Mo.

Texas got bumped mostly because of the computers, with four of the six computers used [illegible] Oklahoma.

"They don't have agendas," Oklahoma coach Bob Stoops said. "They don't have loyalties. They don't have opinions. They don't have all the bias [illegible] does."

Yet even Stoops, just two weeks ago, spoke of "come full circle" in desiring a playoff.

"The BCS is the system we have, and I don't see a playoff on the horizon," Kramer said. "I don't [illegible] support. I think we are as far as you'll get."

For Kramer, the storm that's passing ultimately [illegible] to nurture the game's roots. He knows it well, [illegible] believes the game will be better for its passing.

UMass wins Brown Classic

Mosgrove, Gerardot lead offense past Brown, LIU

The Massachusetts women's basketball team recovered from a tough loss to Providence last Wednesday, defeating both Long Island University and Brown this weekend in the Brown Classic in Providence, R.I.

The Minutewomen won the Classic after defeating the Bears, 64-41, Sunday and the Black Birds Saturday, 53-51.

"We struggled a little bit on Saturday, but we were fortunate to get a win from it," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said after the tournament. "I am pleased with the way we came out, especially in the second half against Brown."

Senior guard Stefanie Gerardot had 22 points Sunday against the Bears, while sophomore guard Cerie Mosgrove added 12. Both players were named to the All-Tournament Team.

"It was nice to see," Dacko said of Gerardot and Mosgrove. "They're a great scoring punch, and I would also like to see Kristina Danella get in there."

Danella, a freshman forward, logged 11 minutes Saturday but did not register a point, going 0-for-2 from the field while securing a rebound.

Senior guard Sakera Young had 11 assists Sunday in a lopsided game that featured the Minutewomen getting off to a fast-paced start against the Bears.

On Saturday, the Minutewomen started strong but gave up a 7-0 run with fewer than 11 minutes remaining.

"It was an ugly basketball game, and I wanted us to dictate the tempo and we didn't do that," Dacko said. "It was a sluggish game, and we were fouling and not running our offense effectively."

With 12 seconds remaining in the second half, Wright hit two free throws to break a 51-51 tie, putting UMass up by two against the Black Birds.

UMass missed an opportunity to break that tie five seconds earlier when Gerardot was sent to the foul line for one shot after being fouled on a made jumper. Although she was 7-for-9 from the free-throw line throughout the game, Gerardot missed the foul shot.

But Wright grabbed the offensive board and was fouled on UMass' next offensive possession, and sank the two shots.

"She was struggling and was in and out of foul trouble," Dacko said of Wright. "But, she kept her composure, and that was after one of their players was injured, so that was a great job by her."

After the Black Birds missed a 3-pointer at the other end of the floor, Wright got to the line and sank the two shots.

A desperation shot was put up by Black Birds freshman forward Ashley Palmer, (17 points and eight rebounds) with 1 second left, but it fell short, as UMass held onto the victory.

Wright had six points and a team-high eight rebounds, while Gerardot led all UMass scorers with 16 points and three assists.

The game went back-and-forth throughout the first half, with neither team gaining a substantial lead. At the break, the Minutewomen took a 29-27 lead in a game that featured eight ties and six lead changes.

The Minutewomen played strong team defense throughout the first half, allowing only one shooting foul as well as an 0-for-9 shooting from 3-point range.

The stagnate defense translated into consistent offensive possessions, with UMass holding a 17-9 advantage in points off turnovers as well as an 18-7 advantage in bench points.

Young and Danielle Hill both saw substantial minutes off the bench for the Minutewomen, recording four and eight points, respectively.

The Maroon and White return to the Mullins Center Wednesday night against Delaware.

McClatchy Newspapers

SEATTLE — In the suburbs of Detroit, where so many people are spending the holidays worrying about their financial futures, Allen Iverson awoke on Thanksgiving morning and decided he didn't want to go to work.

In New York, where Wall Street has been sucker punching investors, Stephon Marbury sat at the end of the New York Knicks' bench marinating in an ugly, public dust-up with new coach Mike D'Antoni.

The NBA: Where Unhappiness Happens.

And, in Manhattan last Friday night, while his New York Giants teammates were preparing for an important Sunday game in Washington, wide receiver Plaxico Burress, who was going to miss the game with a tender hamstring, shot himself in the thigh.

"Plaxico Burress is a role model and he's let down the young people with his nightclub, self-shooting antics," comedian Jon Stewart joked on Monday's "The Daily Show with Jon Stewart."

This autumn the disconnect between players and their fans seems greater than ever.

The economy is crashing all around us, but some high-profile athletes aren't getting the message.

It's time they pay attention.

Washington Gov. Christine Gregoire is making deep cuts in the state's budget. California is going broke.

The leaders of the automobile industry are going back to Washington, D.C., to ask for a government bailout. And JPMorgan Chase announced the layoff of almost 3,400 Washington Mutual workers in Seattle.

And, all the while, too many professional athletes act as if they don't get it. In the face of this dramatic downturn, they can't appreciate their good fortune.

Imagine the reaction of a GM worker, who isn't sure he'll have a job in 2009, who can't afford to take his family to a Pistons game, when he hears Iverson complain about coach Michael Curry's mandatory Thanksgiving practice.

Imagine a Knicks or Giants fan, who is scrambling to find the money to make this month's mortgage payment, watching Marbury sulk in silk at a Knicks game, or seeing Burress, his arms handcuffed behind his back, on his way to being arraigned on gun charges.

Sports fans are watching. And sports fans are hurting. This latest run of the knuckleheads is different from all of the others because of its timing.

People are getting laid off or bought out in frightening numbers. Nonprofit organizations that provide necessary assistance for the most vulnerable people in the community are struggling to raise funds and stay alive.

Services are being cut, schools are hurting and nobody's really in the mood to listen to, or read about, the "troubles" of multimillionaire athletes.

Earlier this season, Burress missed a team meeting and was suspended for New York's game against the Seahawks. And when he returned to the team, he showed no remorse. In fact, he acted as if he were coming off a much-needed vacation.

He was fined $117,500 for that incident, fined $45,000 for verbally abusing an official later that month and fined $25,000 last June for missing a mandatory practice.

Marbury, who, minus about $400,000 in fines, is making $21 million this season, has been ordered, by the team, to stay away from the Knicks. He has called his relationship with D'Antoni a "bad marriage" and has become a distraction to a team that is trying to pull itself out of one of the worst stretches in franchise history.

Burress and Marbury have been monumentally selfish. Iverson has been just plain insensitive.

And, during this holiday season, while all of us search for cheaper gifts and look ahead to even more difficult times, Manny Ramirez shops himself as if he were stuck in the 1990s.

In Seattle we're coming off a baseball season where too many players acted as if the games were some kind of punishment and where supposed ace Erik Bedard accepted a $9 million salary while refusing to pitch through even the slightest pain.

Where's the responsibility to the ticket-buying public? Where's the empathy for a nation of sports fans who are feeling unprecedented pain?

American sports' big leagues — the NFL, NBA, NHL and MLB — are heading for a fall. Fans are growing weary of the knuckleheads.

And the players need to get the message.

In the same kind of no-nonsense language that American workers are hearing on an almost-daily basis, players should be informed of the seriousness of this economic crisis.

They should be told to wise up and calm down.

Nobody cares that Iverson had to postpone his turkey dinner. Or that Marbury lost his starting job to Chris Dubon. Or that Burress' arrest was as public as his Super Bowl-winning catch.

Fans are looking for a little responsibility from their millionaire athletes, maybe even a little sympathy.

The troubles of the knuckleheads aren't funny anymore.

Detroit Pistons guard Allen Iverson has been involved in a number of controversies in his 13-year NBA career.

Commonwealth crushed

Tony Gaffney's heroics fell just short for UMass, which dropped an 85-81 decision in overtime to Boston College. A stunned crowd, coaching staff and bench react as the final buzzer sounds.

UMass senior Tony Gaffney dribbles down the floor against Boston College Saturday night at the Mullins Center. Gaffney just missed a triple-double, scoring 15 points, grabbing 18 rebounds and blocking nine shots.

Rival Boston College finds way in Amherst

BY MICHAEL KING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

First it was a second-half collapse against Southern Illinois. Then it was missed free throws in a home defeat to Jacksonville State, followed by an at-the-buzzer loss at Toledo. Against rival Boston College Saturday night at the Mullins Center, the Massachusetts men's basketball team experienced another heartbreaking loss, falling in overtime 85-81.

UMass (1-6), which erased a five-point deficit over the final 8 seconds of regulation to force overtime, remains without a win against a Division I opponent, despite nearly upending its Atlantic Coast Conference foe Saturday night.

"One more hard-fought loss, but I thought we played hard to the final buzzer," UMass coach Derek Kellogg said.

The Eagles (6-2) overcame 35 points from UMass guard Ricky Harris and a heroic 15-point, 18-rebound and nine-block effort from forward Tony Gaffney.

Despite the unpastimed defensive performance from Gaffney, it was the senior's pair of missed foul shots with 33 seconds left in overtime that let a possible victory slip away.

After BC forward Josh Southern followed a missed Tyrese Rice 3-point attempt with a quick put-back to give the Eagles an 81-80 lead, Gaffney was fouled while driving to the basket on the other end.

With the UMass forward unable to convert either attempt, BC made four consecutive free throws to escape the Mullins Center with the team's ninth win in the Commonwealth Classic in 10 years.

Nearly 5 minutes earlier, however, it was Gaffney's play that single-handedly propelled the Minutemen into overtime.

Immediately after guard Chris Lowe missed the front end of a 1-and-1, Gaffney tipped in the missed foul shot into the hoop to tie the game at 74-74 and force the extra frame.

Kellogg lauded his captain's near triple-double performance, especially his ability to maintain a strong defensive intensity for 43 minutes.

"It was one of the great performances in UMass history," Kellogg said. "The kid was everywhere on the court tonight."

Though BC received a balanced scoring effort, it was

Gaffney doing everything on floor, but again in losing effort

BY JEFFREY R. LARNARD

Tony Gaffney does it all, but he can't do it all.

He plays offense, plays defense, blocks shots, rebounds, scores and even pickpockets the opposition for the Massachusetts men's basketball team. Just take a look at his numbers from Saturday's game against Boston College: 15 points, 18 rebounds, nine blocks, three steals and two assists, while turning the ball over just once.

But Gaffney needs help if the Minutemen (1-6) want to end their six-game losing streak. While Gaffney got help from Ricky Harris' 35 points against BC (6-2), the Minutemen still fell to the Eagles, 85-81, in overtime, in what has become a common ending for UMass. Gaffney does everything he can, one other player has a strong game, but UMass drops a close game – needing one more player to get them over the hump.

Even though the team continues to struggle to get its second win of the season, Gaffney's play through the first seven games has not gone unnoticed, by his team and the opposition.

"When is the last UMass player to have 15 points, 18 rebounds, nine blocks and three steals?" UMass coach Derek Kellogg asked after the game. "You probably have to go all the way back to [Marcus] Camby. He's not Camby, but he does that for our team."

Even BC coach and former UMass basketball star Al Skinner had high praise for Gaffney.

"For Gaffney to have the game he had tonight, he almost had a triple-double if you include the blocks. That is a tremendous effort," Skinner said.

But to Gaffney, the praise means nothing without the win.

"A part of me feels like I let the team down. I went to the line with 33 seconds left for two shots and I missed both of them. I could have given us a lead," Gaffney said. "Stats and those comments are nice but they don't mean a whole lot if you don't win."

Gaffney may have missed his two free throws in overtime with UMass down 81-80, but the Minutemen wouldn't have been in overtime if it wasn't for his play

Huskies no match for UMass

BY MELISSA TURTINEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts hockey team entered Friday night's game against Connecticut as the better team, and for the first time in over three weeks it won a game it was favored to.

The Minutemen downed the Huskies, 5-1, at the Mullins Center to earn UMass coach Don Cahoon his 300th career win and 120th with UMass.

The Minutemen (7-6-1, 4-4-1 Hockey East) entered the third period with a 2-1 lead, but the Huskies (4-11) created enough offensive opportunities to tie the match – aided by two UMass penalties. But unlike UMass previous games, the Minutemen continued to pick up their play until the final buzzer.

In the last 7 minutes of the third period the Minutemen tallied three goals to secure the victory, including a Chris Davis goal with 23 seconds left.

The Minutemen started the game stronger than they have as of late, carrying the puck deep into their offensive zone and controlling play for the first minute of the matchup. UMass' first goal came 5 minutes, 3 seconds into play when freshman TJ Syner crashed the net to find a rebound off of Davis' shot and beat UConn netminder Beau Erickson. It was Syner's first career goal.

Syner's speed has contributed frequently to UMass' success this season, and he has a stronger presence on the ice every game.

"[Syner has] good puck skills, good vision," Cahoon said. "As he continues to battle a little bit more I think you're going to find out that we're going to have a very dynamic player."

UMass scored its second goal at 13:13 in the first with Davis in the penalty box on a hooking call. Senior Alex Berry received a pass from senior Cory Quirk near center ice. Berry carried the puck into the zone and drew Erickson left to move him out of position.

He pulled the puck to his forehand and shot it past a diving Erickson.

UConn put the game back into reach with 1:10 left in the first period with a power-play goal by Chris Ochoa, but the Huskies couldn't get past sophomore goaltender Paul Dainton for the remainder of the game. As the game progressed, Dainton looked more comfortable in the net, making 20 saves for the Minutemen.

"[Dainton] made some good saves and he looked solid," Cahoon said. "He got better as the game went on."

In the other net, Erickson had a strong performance making 38 saves.

GAME NOTES

Defensive partners Topher Bevis and John Wessbecker are a combined plus-22 this season; Bevis is plus-9 while Wessbecker is plus-13. Since the start of the seniors' careers they are 42-7-3 when finishing with a plus at the end of the game. Wessbecker went plus-3 on Friday while Bevis rated a plus-2. ... Berry's shorthanded, game-winning goal was the third of his career and the second short-handed goal for UMass this season, the other was scored by Quirk. ... With one more win, Cahoon will be the all-time winning coach at UMass, passing Jack Cannuff (120 wins, 1967-79). ... The Minutemen will host American International on Dec. 12 at 7 p.m. at the Mullins Center.

Alex Berry beats a diving Beau Erickson for UMass' second goal in Friday's 5-1 victory for the Minutemen over Connecticut. Berry now has six goals and nine assists this season in 13 games.

Effort leads Mass Attack in victory

BY RYAN FLEMING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

If you were present for both last Friday's 5-1 win against Connecticut and the game two weeks ago, a 4-3 loss against St. Lawrence, you saw two completely different Massachusetts hockey teams.

On Nov. 28 when the Minutemen (7-6-1) hosted the Saints the Minutemen weren't at their best. They looked lost forcing errant passes, committing careless penalties and giving way to St. Lawrence attackers entering UMass' zone.

The 4-3 outcome could have been worse, as the Saints had the game in their control. It wasn't until a last-minute barrage of desperation that UMass pulled within one goal.

This past Friday the Minutemen were a completely different team, taking control of the game from the opening seconds. UMass played more physically and controlled the flow of the game.

The UMass defense clogged up the inside portion of the rink forcing the Huskies to try and move the puck up against the boards. Forwards Alex Berry, Cory Quirk and Chris Davis threw their bodies around. UMass used its physical play to try to force UConn (4-11) into less than desirable passes and jar attempts to loosen the puck from their opponents grasp.

UMass played with a seemingly desirable effort to win, which certainly hindered a chance for a Huskies victory.

The Minutemen cycled with more fluidity – causing the UConn defenders to stay at bay and wait for the UMass forwards to skate to them. But by then it was too late. The UMass forwards and defenders wasted too much time in shooting on Huskies goaltender Beau Erickson.

Erickson was subjected to 43 shots, 38 of which he stopped. It seemed as if the Minutemen had a 'shoot and see what happens' sort of mentality. In some cases, UMass attackers rifled pucks at Erickson just as they entered the zone, hoping to create a big rebound and neglecting to try and cycle around the zone to set-up plays.

Freshman TJ Syner was awarded with his first career goal and picked up two assists. Chris Davis tallied a goal and two assists while leading the Minutemen with seven shots.

The Minutemen also generated chances even with a man down. Berry scored a shorthanded, breakaway goal on a heads-up play by Quirk.

"It was kind of a broken play on their power play," Quirk said. "I just wanted to get it [the puck] to him [Berry] and hopefully he could get a shot on goal or something good would happen."

UMass played with a lack of fire or energy in most of its losses this season, which was also evident in the loss to St. Lawrence. But when that momentum or motivation is found the Minutemen will prove to be a one of the best teams in the Hockey East.

"I was pleased with the effort tonight," UMass coach Don Cahoon said Friday. "There was a level of enthusiasm that was missing here in the last week, and I thought that was central to what our problem was."

Student cashes in on Jeopardy!

Amherst College Senior Ben Bishop has won four consecutive nights so far on Jeopardy!.

BY JOSH WALOVITCH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Amherst College senior Ben Bishop of Seattle, Wash., has been cashing in recently by answering trivia on TV game show Jeopardy!

Bishop was aiming for his fifth straight win Monday night.

He plays squash at Amherst and he is the second person with ties to the college to appear on the show this year.

In April, 25-year-old town resident Katherine Duke was a Jeopardy! contestant. She is a writer and editor for the Amherst College's public relations department.

Bishop's recent TV appearance was actually taped in September, but was sworn to keep his results a secret.

He spoke with a reporter from The Massachusetts Daily Collegian to answer some questions about his recent fame and success.

Daily Collegian: How long have you been a fan of Jeopardy!? Do you routinely watch it?

Ben Bishop: "I watched it on and off when I was younger, but began watching it most nights when I got to college, when I had nothing to do most nights at 7:30 p.m."

DC: How did the application process work? Are they selective in choosing candidates?

BB: "They advertise for an online test that they offer about once a year. I took this and then got an e-mail asking me to tryout in person in Boston. I went to that tryout, where there was a written test (to determine skill), an interview (to determine personality), and a mock-game (to make sure we could keep the game moving and answer in the form of a question)."

DC: How did you train, if at all, for the show?

BB: "I went to trivia night at the Harp on Tuesdays, and read a little about topics that show up a lot (Royalty, Presidents...)"

DC: Are you given categories ahead of time?

BB: "Absolutely not. All material is hidden, and they randomly select which set of questions they will use before the game."

DC: I was told that you won $25,000 on your first appearance resulting in you playing the following night, what were the results of that show?

BB: "I've won $88,800 going into Friday's show."

DC: What do you plan to do with your winnings?

BB: "No idea."

Hookah hopes go up in smoke

NoHo Board of Health votes against changing city smoking regulations

BY MATT ROCHELEAU
COLLEGIAN STAFF

NORTHAMPTON — The Northampton Board of Health shot down an attempt to open a downtown hookah bar by voting against loosening the city's tobacco laws.

On Dec. 4, the board voted two to one against changing the city's smoking regulations, ending months of debate over hookah lounge's opening.

Co-founders of The Den, Victor Quinn, Scott Radner and Christian Rahn, received a tobacco permit from the board in April. In May, the Health Board's three members voted to pass a one-time exemption to Northampton's no-smoking laws.

They were told the hookah bar could open as long as an adequate ventilation system was installed, which was approved by the Board of Health and the Northampton Building Inspector, according to The Den's Web site.

The owners describe on their site how the ventilation would work.

"Air is being sucked out of our lounge faster than it is being pumped in and thus whenever a door is opened a vacuum is created and all air is sucked inwards," the Web site says. "This means that no smoke will ever be billowing out of our lounge."

The businessmen said they spent around $75,000 to meet the board's ventilation and other sanitation requirements. Believing they had the city's approval, the owners scheduled to open their 122 Main St. location, below Pinocchio Pizzeria, during by mid-August.

The opening was delayed while the owners waited for building permits to be granted until early November when their plans came to a screeching halt. The city told the board The Den would not be allowed to open under the city's current smoking laws.

Though Massachusetts has a statewide ban on smoking indoors, there is specific exemption for smoking bars, which must be approved by the Department of Revenue.

A public hearing was held on Nov. 12, to debate the hookah bar's exemption.

"The predominant point that the opposition made is that smoking is bad for you, and therefore the town should not allow an establishment that encourages smoking," said The Den's owners on their Web site. "Our main argument is that smoking is a legal activity, smoking bars are legal in the state, and no one that did not specifically choose to enter a hookah lounge and make an informed, adult decision to smoke would be subject to any smoke at all."

"The Board of Health is required to regulate public health," the owners continued. "They have done so by making sure that no one no willing to smoke will be subject to a health hazard. It should not be their place to regulate the personal decisions of adults regarding something that is legal everywhere else."

According to The Springfield Republican, chairman Jay Fleitman said the board has received over 200 letters and e-mails on the subject since the public hearing.

The board said they had warned the owners not to install the ventilation system until their approval was finalized.

"The Den chose to move forward against our recom-

The Student Government Association (SGA) will host a town-hall style meeting about the campus budget crisis, tonight at 7 p.m. in the Student Union.

The meeting will be held in the Commonwealth Room, also known as Earthfoods Cafe. It is open to all students of the University of Massachusetts "as a space to exchange information on how the UMass budget crunch will affect students as early as next year," according to SGA president Malcolm Chu.

"The meeting can be an opportunity for students to learn what the Task Force has been discussing in its meetings," said Chu, one of three students who sit on the Chancellor's Budget Task Force.

"While the task force meetings have been open to the public, the fact that only two undergraduate students and one graduate student sit on the task force suggests that student input is marginalized," said Chu. "Rather than tokenize students in this discussion on how the University's funding and allocations will change, we want as many students as possible to not only be informed of the current situation, but also actively working to plan the University's response to the upcoming budget cuts," Chu continued.

The mid-year cuts from Gov. Deval Patrick's office eliminated between $11 and $12 million of UMass' budget. Some are anticipating more significant cuts in the near future, according to Chu.

The immediate effects of such cuts to the budget vary, and could include increasing class sizes.

Chancellor Holub recently released a message to the Budget Task Force outlining specific priorities for the Task Force that he has in mind.

"Departments must be ready to enter the next academic year with a teaching staff that is perhaps smaller than they had anticipated it would be," said Holub.

Members of the SGA's executive cabinet, the Student Senate, and several area governments are expected to attend the meeting.

Students are invited to bring questions about the budget process, ideas for how to alleviate financial burdens placed on students, as well as potential strategies to maximize student input in decision-making bodies of the University, Chu said.

Distinguished lectures continue today

BY MATT ROCHELEAU
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Rafael A. Fissore, professor of veterinary and animal sciences at the University of Massachusetts, will give the second of four Distinguished Faculty Lectures today at 4 p.m. in the Massachusetts Room of the Mullins Center.

Fissore's talk titled, "Activating the Egg: A Tale of Mice, Pigs, and Men," will discuss how the egg, the female gamete, always emerges from the ovary arrested in its development.

Professor Fissore and his research team have been studying the female gamete, which will be the topic of his lecture today.

Precisely how the sperm "activates" the egg has been a mystery for scientists for quite some time.

Fissore, who has been with UMass since 1993, will explain what his research team has discovered about mammalian fertilization. Their research has included the use of mice and pigs, and most recently studying infertile men.

He will also discuss what these findings mean for new treatments for infertility, as well as their ethical implications.

"His research looks at understanding the mechanism by which the sperm is able to induce activation and trigger development in mammalian eggs," said a statement from University spokesman Patrick J. Callahan. "His research has implications for understanding reproduction and the development of new treatments for infertility and the ethical questions such treatment will raise."

Fissore was an assistant professor from 1993 to 1998, an associate professor from 1999 to 2007 and has been a professor since then.

He also served as a visiting professor in the department of physiology at Katholieke Universiteit of Leuven in Leuven, Belgium in 2003.

Weibo Gong, electrical and computer engineering, is another participant in the lecture series, who will give a talk titled, "Will the Internet Soon Outsmart Humans?" on Monday, Feb. 23, 2009. Sally J. Powers, psychology, will conclude the series in her discussion, "Hormones and Lovers' Quarrels: How Stress Translates into Depression," on Monday, April 27, 2009.

There is a reception after each talk where faculty members in the series are given a Chancellor's Medal following their lecture.

"The Chancellor's Medal is the highest honor bestowed on individuals for exemplary and extraordinary service to the campus," the statement said.

The lecture series is sponsored by the offices of the chancellor and the provost.

Fissore was also an embryologist in the in-vitro fertilization program at Brigham and Women's Hospital's department of obstetrics, gynecology and reproductive biology and Harvard Medical School from 1990-93. From 1983 to 1984 he was a veterinary assistant in the veterinary practice of Dr. Roberto Magnasco in Canals, Cordoba, Argentina.

Fissore earned a degree as a veterinary surgeon from the University of Buenos Aires in 1983, was a resident at the School of Veterinary Medicine at the University of California, Davis from 1984 to 1988; earned a master of preventive veterinary medicine from the University of California Davis in 1988; earned a diplomate ACT from the American College of Theriogenology in 1988, and earned a doctorate in veterinary and animal sciences from UMass Amherst in 1993.

UMass professor of veterinary and animal sciences Rafael Fissore.

Professor Fissore also served as a postdoctoral fellow in reproductive biology at Harvard Medical School and Brigham and Women's Hospital in Boston from 1988 to 1989.

What is your opinion on this matter?

Despite much debate about the opening of a hookah bar in Northampton, the Board of Health ultimately rejected its permit to open. Do you think the bar should have opened, or do you think it falls under smoking, and should be illegal in public establishments?

What do you think? Check out what other UMass students are saying at http://www.dailycollegian.com/messageboards

"I think that having a hookah bar wouldn't necessarily be against the law, because they know what they are getting themselves into. You know it's a hookah bar, that's what people do when they go there. It's one thing when people are smoking at a bar, but the hookah bar is designed specifically for that."

–Rachel Green

Sophomore
Sociology and Legal Studies major

"I think of course the bar should have opened. It wouldn't go against any regulations if people weren't there specifically to smoke hookah. They know what they are getting themselves into."

–Alex Green

Junior
Hospitality and Tourism Management major

"I guess if it is a place designed specifically for smoking, versus a bar with multiple things, then it is okay, because it is different from a bar or restaurant offering smoking."

–Sarah Finer

Senior
History and Theater major

"I support it. I think that if you don't want to be around smoking, don't go to a hookah bar, just the same way that if you don't like drinking, don't go to a bar, or if you don't like food, don't go to a restaurant. If you are going in, you want to smoke hookah."

–David Piper

Junior
Management and Spanish major

JEOPARDY from page 1

DC: How would you describe the whole experience?

BB: "Fun. It's a game show, and I enjoyed playing the game, and I enjoyed entertaining."

DC: Was it intimidating - were you nervous?

BB: "Not too nervous or intimidated - more excited. I was getting paid enormous amounts of money for answering questions. What's not to like?"

DC: Did you mess up on any of the phrasings, like forgetting to say "what is..." or "who is..."?

BB: "Nah, it just becomes kind of a reflex."

DC: Was playing final Jeopardy! as fun as it is when watching at home?

BB: "More fun – the money is real."

DC: Did you get to meet Alex Trebek? Was he still rock'n that sweet mustache? Did it mesmerize you? Did you get lost in it?

BB: "No, I asked him at the end of the first show why he got rid of it. He refused to answer. It remains one of life's great mysteries why he shaved it. I always thought it was the source of his strength – like Samson's hair. I guess not."

DC: How much of that money do you actually get to keep?

BB: "Don't know – you'll have to ask the IRS. Jeopardy! doesn't pay me until 120 days after the show airs, so I'm still scrounging in my couch for beer money for another four months."

Heightened cell phone use causes problems in prisons

By Dan Kane
McClatchy Newspapers

RALEIGH, N.C. — Cigarettes, drugs and booze used to drive a prison's black market economy. Today, state prison officials are trying to stop another item from being smuggled in: cell phones.

So far this year, the North Carolina Department of Correction has confiscated roughly 140 cell phones that were found on inmates or stashed on prison grounds. The phones are considered contraband, but they are coming in anyway.

They arrive by visitors who sneak them in, by inmates returning from work release, and, in some cases, by staff looking to make a fast buck. A $25 phone can sell for as much as $500 behind bars, prison officials say, and inmates who have them can charge others for their use.

Prisons director Boyd Bennett said the cell phones can be used for all kinds of mayhem in and out of prison. They can be used to set up attacks on inmates and staff, coordinate escapes, harass victims and allow criminals to continue running criminal enterprises outside prison.

In one case, North Carolina prison officials say, a gang leader in one prison used a cell phone to call inmates at another prison to give them the go-ahead to attack another inmate.

"He was a player in the gang hierarchy and he said, 'Yeah, go ahead and cut this guy,' " said Zack Kendall, an investigator who handles security issues with the Division of Prisons.

It's a growing problem nationally.

So far this year, South Carolina prison officials have confiscated more than 1,800 phones or components such as batteries and chargers, while Texas officials reported seizing more than 700 phones and components, including 20 phones from inmates on death row.

Cell phones are being confiscated due to the numerous issues they cause for state prison officials.

"We have had multiple escapes coordinated with cell phones," said Josh Gelinas, a spokesman for the South Carolina Department of Corrections. "It's our biggest problem right now."

In Tennessee three years ago, an inmate used a cell phone to plot an escape that took the life of a correction officer. The inmate was later caught.

In North Carolina, Bennett said his staff is trying to close off the cell phone pipeline with tighter checks of those entering and exiting prisons and by obtaining a 4-year-old chocolate lab named Sally, who is being trained to sniff them out. A component within cell phones produces a unique scent.

The department recently sent staffers to South Carolina to watch a demonstration of cell phone jamming technology. But that may not become an option until federal lawmakers change Federal Communications Commission rules that prevent the blocking of cell phone signals. South Carolina has asked federal authorities to make such a change.

Texas is holding a similar demonstration later this month.

"We believe the answer is to jam it, but the FCC of course is not seeing it our way," said John Moriarty, inspector general for the Texas Department of Criminal Justice.

Bennett said he will also ask state lawmakers next year to provide a tool other states have, a felony charge for those who smuggle cell phones in prison. He was less sure about creating a criminal possession charge for inmates caught in prison with the phones, saying that can be handled as an infraction subject to punishment.

Correction

An article titled "Volunteers feed the hungry," published Friday, Dec. 5, incorrectly stated that food is distributed by Food Not Bombs across from Cousin's Food Market in Amherst, and at the First Congregational Church in Northampton. It is actually distributed at the Amherst Common across from Hastings and in front of The First Churches in Northampton.

mendations," said Scrimgeour, according to The Republican.

The owners could not be reached for comment prior to publication.

Northampton resident Brian McCullough had been following some of the controversy swirling around The Den and was disappointed to hear the proposed hookah lounge is now out of luck.

"They would have had good business," he said. "To me it seems pretty obvious that the place put in a ventilation system so it's not affecting anyone around them. And, anyone that goes in there knows what it is."

"As long as you know what you're getting yourself into, then I don't see a problem," agreed University of Massachusetts freshman and biology major Brittani Barrett.

Freshmen Emily Morin, a Spanish major, agreed.

"It's a travesty," Morin said, who felt the state's recent decriminalization of marijuana and the Northampton Board of Health's recent decision posed a double-standard.

A hookah is a single or multi-stemmed, often glass-based, water pipe for smoking tobacco. Originally from India, the hookah has gained immense popularity, especially in the Middle East, and locally among teens and college students.

Dems. push $15 bil. auto industry bailout

Rep. Barney Frank (D-MA) and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-CA) spoke to reporters in the US Capitol Building on an auto bailout package in Washington, D.C. on Monday.

Congress likely to consider proposal this week

By David Eightman and Kevin G. Hall
McClatchy Newspapers

WASHINGTON — Democratic congressional leaders agreed Monday to push a $15 billion auto industry bailout plan that would require Detroit's Big Three to restructure and answer to an overseer appointed by the president.

The plan, which Congress is likely to consider this week, would give the government authority over major decisions by the automakers. General Motors, Ford and Chrysler would have to report progress to Congress regularly and come up with a long-term restructuring plan by March 31.

The bailout plan was unveiled as the domestic car industry is suffering its worst sales since the early 1980s. The leading six automakers all showed month-to-month drops of more than 30 percent in November, and GM and Chrysler could face bankruptcy by the end of the year without emergency aid.

The plan, which is still being scrutinized at the White House and faces an uncertain future in Congress, would provide the companies with bridge loans from an energy program approved earlier this year. The funds were supposed to be used to help the auto companies produce more fuel-efficient vehicles, but will be diverted to the firms to help them avoid cash crises.

"Come March 31, it is our hope that there will be a viable automotive industry in our country with transparency and accountability to the taxpayer," said House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif.

Congress expects all stakeholders involved in the bailout to make sacrifices. Labor, which already made big concessions on health and welfare benefits last year, could see a further decrease in promised benefits for retirees and those who will soon retire.

Bondholders would be expected to take losses, a "haircut" in industry parlance, but that would be better than having to fight for repayment in bankruptcy proceedings.

Investors in Ford and GM, who've already seen shares drop to prices of half a century ago, also are likely to be hurt. Under virtually all scenarios, a bailout would put taxpayers at the front of the line in recapturing any money lent to the companies once profits return, pushing back existing shareholders.

"We call this the barbershop," Pelosi said. "Everybody takes a haircut here."

The measure also would give the overseer authority over executive pay at the automakers. It specifically says that automakers getting the loans "may not own or lease any private passenger aircraft, or [have] any interest in such aircraft," a reference to the controversy last month when the Detroit CEOs flew to Washington in corporate jets to seek a taxpayer bailout.

Neither Pelosi nor Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., was especially enthusiastic Monday about the proposal. The carmakers had sought $34 billion, but it became clear after hearings last week that the package would have a difficult time winning congressional support.

As a result, leaders from both parties and the White House spent the weekend trying to iron out a new plan.

White House Press Secretary Dana Perino said: "We've made a lot of progress in recent days to develop legislation to help automakers restructure and achieve long-term viability. We're reviewing draft legislation we received this afternoon and are continuing our discussions with Congress.

"Long-term financing must be conditioned on the principle that taxpayers should only assist automakers executing a credible plan for long-term viability. We'll continue to work with members on both sides of the aisle to achieve legislation that protects the good-faith investment by taxpayers."

Universities put naming rights for new bats species up for sale

By Rex W. Huppke
McClatchy Newspapers

CHICAGO — Looking to honor a loved one by naming a new species of mammal after them this holiday season?

Starting Monday, Purdue University researchers will be auctioning off the naming rights to seven recently discovered types of bats hailing from Mexico, South America, Central America and Africa. And if the bats seem too "last Christmas," there's also a pair of yet-to-be-named Amazonian turtles up for grabs.

Universities and ecological organizations across the country have begun to view the naming rights to new species as a way to draw big bucks to pay for their research.

"There's not very much money to support the kind of work it takes to discover these new species," said John Bickham, a Purdue University professor of forestry and natural resources and discoverer of several of the new bats. "Money generated by someone who says, 'I'm passionate about the environment, and I'd love to go down in history by having a species of organism named after me,' that's very important to our continued work."

And imagine the envy when people learn that you are, say, John Tenselhaum, namesake of the Rhogeessa johntenselhaumi, a black and yellow bat that weighs less than a spoonful of water and subsists on flying insects.

"How many people do you know that have a species named after them?" Bickham asked.

In 2005, an online gambling Web site paid the Wildlife Conservation Society $650,000 for the naming rights to a Bolivian monkey.

Since then, a fish-naming auction in Monaco raised more than $2 million for conservation work in Indonesia, and the University of Florida took in more than $40,000 for naming a new species of butterfly after an Ohio grandmother.

Name immortality doesn't come cheap, and anyone interested in naming the Purdue bats and turtles can expect to pay a hefty sum.

For the people who skim sea beds and scour branches in search of new forms of life, this name game is about more than just money. It helps raise awareness of what they call a "biodiversity crisis," the fact that myriad creatures are dying off before they're even discovered.

"We're losing species every minute," he said. "People don't really understand the full impact of this."

So come on, eco-friendly shoppers. Give till it hurts.

Study focuses on the power of negative racial stereotypes

By Karen Kaplan
Los Angeles Times

Barack Obama's election as president of the United States might be seen as a harbinger of a color-blind society, but a new study suggests that racial stereotypes on social status might be more powerfully ingrained in American culture than we thought. They might even affect the perception, and self-perception, of race.

Derogatory assumptions about black Americans are so entrenched that the likelihood of being perceived as black increases for people who are unemployed, in prison or living in poverty. Some even see themselves as black, according to research published Tuesday in the Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences.

In a long-term study of 12,686 people, changes in social circumstances prompted changes in the racial perceptions of 20 percent of them at least once over a 19-year period. Researchers have long recognized that a person's race affects his or her social status, but the study is the first to show that social status also affects the perception of race.

"Race isn't a characteristic that's fixed at birth," said Andrew Penner, a sociologist at the University of California. He is one of the study's authors. "We're perceived a certain way and identify a certain way depending on widely held stereotypes about how people believe we should behave."

Penner and Aliya Saperstein, a sociologist at the University of Oregon, examined data from the federal Bureau of Labor Statistics' National Longitudinal Survey of Youth. Although the ongoing survey is focused primarily on the work history of Americans born in the 1950s and 1960s, participants also have provided interviewers with information on such topics as health, marital status, insurance coverage and race.

On 18 occasions between 1979 and 1998, interviewers wrote down whether the people they spoke with were "white," "black" or "other."

The researchers found that people whom the interviewers initially perceived as white were roughly twice as likely to be seen as nonwhite in their next interview if they had fallen into poverty, lost their job or been sent to prison. Meanwhile, people previously perceived as black were twice as likely to continue being seen as black if any of those things had happened to them.

For example, 10 percent of people previously described as white were reclassified as belonging to another race if they became incarcerated. But if they stayed out of jail, only 4 percent were reclassified as something other than white, according to the study.

The effect has staying power. People who were perceived as white and then became incarcerated were more likely to be perceived as black even after they were released from prison, Penner said.

The racial assumptions affected self-identity as well. Survey participants were asked to state their own race when the study began in 1979 and again in 2002, when the government streamlined its categories for race and ethnicity. Of the people who said they were white in 1979 and stayed out of jail, 95 percent said they were white in 2002. Among those who were incarcerated at some point, however, only 81 percent still said they were white in 2002.

The results underscore "the pervasiveness of racial stratification in society," said Amon Emeka, a social demographer at the University of Southern California who was not involved in the study. "The fact that both beholders and the observers of blackness attach negative associations to blackness speaks volumes to the continuing impact of racial stratification in U.S. society."

But Robert J. Carter, a professor of psychology and education at Columbia Teachers College in New York who studies race, culture and racial identity, said he wasn't convinced that stereotypes have the power to change the perception of race.

"It's not social status that shapes race. It's race that shapes social status," he said. "Stratification on the basis of racial group membership has been an integral part of our society since prior to the inception of the United States. It's been true for hundreds of years."

To see if the changes were the result of simple recording errors when interviewers filled out their survey reports, the researchers checked how often a participant's gender changed from one year to the next. They found changes in only 0.27 percent of cases, suggesting that interviewers weren't being sloppy with their reports, according to the study.

They also looked for subjects who were interviewed by the same person two years in a row. Even in those cases, the results were the same, Penner said.

The researchers are reviewing their data to see if other social stereotypes have a similar effect on perceived race. According to their preliminary analysis, people who have less education, live in the inner city instead of the suburbs and are on welfare are more likely to be seen as black and less likely to be considered white, Saperstein said.

"The data is really interesting, but it doesn't allow us to say what was going on in these people's heads," Saperstein said. "Our story is consistent with the story that there's implicit prejudice."

Of course, changes in racial perceptions – whether from outside or within – were concentrated among those of mixed ethnicity.

"After Michael Milken goes to prison, he'll be no more likely to say he's a black person or any less likely to say he's a white person," Emeka said. "Clarence Thomas might say he's transcended race, but he wouldn't say that he's a white person, and certainly no one on the planet would say he's a white person."

And no one would conclude that Barack Obama is white on the basis of his electoral success.

"He had a white mother and a black father," Emeka said. "Why does that make him black? The fact that there is all this discussion suggests that there is something that needs to be changed in our common-sense notions of race."

Congolese crisis

In a time where we are all thinking of escalating tensions between India and Pakistan and where almost 200 people were killed in one attack, we have to think about other places where people are killed daily and nothing happens.

Subhan Tariq

In India, the attacks took place and the army responded, but in some places around the world – the army does nothing.

In the Congo, where nearly 5.5 million people have died in this decade, the stakes are even higher. Nearly 45,000 people die every month in the Congo – that's 1,500 individuals every day.

The Congo has become the most dangerous place on the face of the planet and yet no one is paying attention to the plight of the Congolese. Mass rape has become a formal strategy and is used as a weapon in order to drive people out of their land.

Men are killed and women are raped. You may be thinking to yourself – why?

This atrocity takes place on a daily basis because of us.

We have an insatiable hunger for electronics. Our iPods and Blackberrys are made with minerals from the Congo.

The Congo is the largest producer of columbite-tantalite, also known as Coltan, in the world. This mineral is used in all our electronics from phones to music players, CDs and DVDs has helped to kill enough people to fill New Hampshire more than five times.

We have sat on the sidelines for way too long as millions of people have suffered in the Congo.

The second largest producer of Coltan – Australia – recently announced that it would no longer produce Coltan because it couldn't compete with the Congo's prices.

The war in the Congo is the deadliest war since the Holocaust, but unlike the Holocaust where other countries tried to get involved, no one is doing anything for the suffering of the Congolese.

In the endless need to get this mineral, there is no rule of law and no moral code that the militias use to get the mineral. Men are killed and women are raped for the simple purpose of expelling people from their land. When the women are raped, they are less likely to come back to the land.

There are solutions that can be taken almost immediately in order to help the people of the Congo. It needs a stable government which will help protect the people against these militias.

There needs to be peace, protection and punishment for the perpetrators. Lastly, the international community needs to step up and call for action in the Congo.

A stable government would help represent the needs of the people and help protect against this massive tragedy. A government is needed that can nationalize the production of Coltan and use its military force in order to protect people in the villages in which Coltan is found.

A government needs to be in place which can eradicate these militias and provide peace through out the Congo. The government needs to be able to provide protection against militias which are out to kill everyone who stands in their way.

Finally there needs to be punishment for those who are accused of these crimes. People need to know that they will be punished for the killing and raping millions of people.

The international community needs to stand up and say enough is enough and help put an end to this.

The international community has raised a voice before when atrocities such as the Rwandan genocide and the blood diamonds in Sierra Leone. The international community needs to stand up with one unified voice and put an end to this horrific tragedy.

When we usually think about the mistreatment of women, many think about the treatment of women in Arab countries. We don't tend to think about the Congo where approximately 200,000 women are raped and killed each year. The Congo has become the most dangerous place on the planet for a woman to live and yet we do nothing.

We have sat on the sidelines for way too long as millions of people have suffered in the Congo. We must stand up and do something for if we don't – the lives of millions more hang in the balance. We have entered countries where horrendous human rights travesties have been going on. We need to stand with the Congolese people, who at this point, have nothing.

Last week there was a panel discussion on the plight of the Congolese which brought this issue to my attention. As someone who reads the news everyday, I used to skip over the stories on the Congo without even noticing and now I understand what is really at stake.

By the time this piece is printed, another 3,000 people will have died – that is another 9/11 and yet we do nothing.

Our lives are a direct reflection of the suffering of others.

Our constant need to buy the newest electronics has led to the massacring of millions of people who have done nothing wrong other than live in the Congo.

We have become such a society of consumers that we often forget where our things actually come from. We must send a message that this can not continue – not in our name

The truth behind Christmas

The abbreviation X-mas is an affront to Jesus, alias of God.

The reason why "X" marks the spot where "Christ" was in "Christmas" comes from the Greek language. In Greek, the "ch" sound in "Christ" has its own letter, chi, which looks like an X. However, like any guilty former Catholic, I know that the Bible was written in Latin, which must have been the language of Jesus, Moses and all the Jews.

Chris Amorosi

I doubt that Jesus the Carpenter, a small business owner from the Middle East, would want his name associated with a language that gave us "homosexuality," "atheism" and "chronic diarrhea."

Replacing the Greek chi with the Latin X also brings along the vile connotations associated with X. They can be summed up in the three P's: pornography (XXX), pirates (as referenced above) and moonshine (from prohibition; jugs of it were marked with Xs).

Surely anyone preaching that Jesus was a boozing and lewd thief would go straight to Hell.

Pagan ceremonies surrounding the winter solstice are often cited as origins for the Christmas tree and Yule log traditions. Despite the enormous amount of historical evidence indicating how Christianity borrowed from Greco-Roman religion, I dismiss it.

Why would Christianity, seeking to supplant popular and widespread beliefs, adopt aspects of pagan religions as some kind of cynical popularity ploy?

I give you instead my alternative theory behind the Christmas tree. Trees were integral to ship construction since human prehistory.

When Helen of Troy's face launched a thousand ships, they were built from the cedars of Lebanon. When the Thirteen Colonies decided to sink the so-called "Unsinkable Aircraft Carrier" of Great Britain, they built the USS Constitution out of white pine from the Appalachian mountains. When Prince Eric killed Ursula with a sailing ship to the heart, Disney animators drew the ship with wooden pencils.

However, when steam engines became popular during the 1800s, ships began to switch over to iron and steel construction. The wooden shipbuilding lobby, or "Big Wood" as they were then known, panicked. Big Wood was down in the fourth quarter for its third fiscal year when they developed an ingenious way to recoup their losses through insurance fraud.

Only political correctness gone mad could have produced mall Santas who return children to their parents without considering the child's behavior and Will Farrell in white face paint as the title elf in the movie Elf.

After the employees left the shipyards on Christmas Eve, bosses rigged their tree stocks with notoriously dangerous gas lamps and hoped the combination would create a profitable blaze. The workers returned to work a day later not to a charred wasteland but a beautiful display of lights and pines and decided to emulate the effect in their homes.

Big Wood subsequently went bankrupt without the expected insurance money and all the workers were fired by New Years Day.

The cocaine-laced beverage lobby likes to claim for themselves the origin story of Santa Claus but his true origin is more sordid than anything invented by coke fiends.

Santa Claus is instead the neutered result of political correctness when applied to centuries of glorious tradition.

Santa Claus' true origin is from the Dutch tradition of Sinterklaas. Sinterklaas lives in Spain in his hidden fortress all year long except when he sails to the Netherlands and Belgium on a steam ship on Dec. 5. He distributes presents to good children with the assistance of his servant Black Pete, an African Moor.

Because there are few actual Moors in the Netherlands, Black Pete is played by a Dutch man in blackface. Black Pete is also responsible for putting bad children into Sinterklaas' sack so Sinterklaas can kidnap and imprison them in his secret Spanish castle.

I assure you I did not embellish the preceding part because it needs no embellishment to stand in stark contrast with our watered down, tasteless American interpretation of the Dutch master version.

Only political correctness gone mad could have produced mall Santas who return children to their parents without considering the child's behavior and Will Farrell in white face paint as the title elf in the movie Elf.

I hope you, my readers, understand the true dignity of Christmas now that I laid it stripped and shivering before you. Pagans, pornographers, wood-mongers, and Mr. Farrell caused more damage than a Muppet reinterpretation could repair in one lifetime.

It is up to our generation to begin reversing the damage wrought by two thousand years of a nonsense tradition.

A bias unfit to be in newspaper print

Greg Collins

All the biased news that's fit to print – or so the description of The New York Times should read.

Looking back at The Times' coverage of the presidential race and continuing to this day, the newspaper has only confirmed that it is one of the most unreliable and deceitful media outlets in America.

One way we can find out whether a newspaper is reliable is if it reports news based on hard facts instead of hearsay evidence. The most blatant breach of this basic journalistic principle was The Times' story that was splashed across the front page this summer about John McCain's supposed improprieties with a female lobbyist.

Instead of reporting substantive facts, the basis for the story was essentially this: some McCain staff members may have felt that the public may perceive the appearance of a female lobbyist at his public appearances as a possible reflection of a possible romantic relationship between the two.

Such a blatant cheap shot at McCain's character was so conspicuously anti-McCain that it merely confirmed the widespread opinion that The Times was campaigning for Barack Obama on its news pages.

This flimsy evidence is something you would see on PerezHilton.or in tabloids. However, here was supposedly the most reliable newspaper in the world writing a front page story based on not one shred of substantive and credible evidence.

Did we ever see a news story splashed across The Times' front page about how some staff members hinted to Obama that he may want to stop smoking cigarettes, so as not to be perceived by the public as immoral? Of course not.

The point is that neither story, both McCain's and Obama's hypothetical, deserve front page coverage. However, McCain's was thrown across the front page by The Times clearly to undermine his presidential ambitions.

This story was a shameless violation of journalistic integrity.

But The Times had the gall to go beyond that.

This summer, it rejected a McCain piece about Iraq in its original form for the newspaper's Op-Ed pages. The fact that any newspaper would reject a submission from a presumptive presidential candidate – running for a position so esteemed, so respected, so revered in American history – illuminates how The Times' editors consciously strive to shape political dialogue in forums in ways they should not shape it, such as from the campaigns of presumptive, presidential nominees in op-ed pages.

The excuses that David Shipley, the Op-Ed page editor, gave to justify his rejection of McCain's piece further reflected the papers' deceitfulness of limiting freedom of thought with which they do not agree.

Shipley said he wanted McCain to revise the draft to "lay out a clear plan for achieving victory – with troop levels, timetables and measures for compelling the Iraqis to cooperate." The bias in these requirements is clearly evident, as not a single, active general has come out publicly and explicitly supported "timetables."

Nonetheless, Shipley had the audacity to shape – to dictate – the political views of such a revered Navy serviceman, a former prisoner of war, in the middle of the biggest race for elected office in the United States.

How would you feel if Barack Obama's Op-Ed was rejected in a similar fashion because the Op-Ed editor personally felt it did not reflect the information that the editor himself wanted to read?

Nonetheless, Shipley had the audacity to shape – to dictate – the political views of such a revered Navy serviceman, a former prisoner of war, in the middle of the biggest race for elected office in the United States.

It would have been equally as shameless if The Times had done so.

Additional evidence of The Times' lack of journalistic integrity is when it reports isolated facts without placing them in proper context. For instance, this past Saturday's New York Times' lead story in its US news section was titled, "When a Job Disappears, So Does Health Care." The story talked about how the recession is causing people to lose their health coverage.

Now it is most certainly a fact that some people will lose health insurance when they lose a job. Of course, it is just as accurate a fact that some people will obtain health coverage when they find another job. The Times failed to provide another story describing this reality.

This happens all the time in The Times.

You will read stories about how "critics" oppose Guantanamo Bay or torture, without reading that there are, amazingly, other people – such as defense department officials – who do support them.

The Times will tell us about how "teachers' unions" oppose charter schools and vouchers, without also reporting that the vast majority of parents in low-income school districts support them.

There are always "critics" for any policy, just as there are always supporters of any policy. But unfortunately, the Times mentions those critics specifically when they oppose something The Times' editors also oppose. Also, the newspaper mentions supporters of a policy specifically when The Times' editors support them as well.

What it comes down to is that The New York Times fails, day after day, in distinguishing between its news pages and editorial pages, between political campaigning and journalistic integrity.

It should go without saying: there is no bigger breach of journalistic integrity when newspapers allow political opinions to shape news stories.

Schadenfreude and words of advice for the Republican party

Ted Rogers

Much like crappy reality TV programs and Cuban dictators, political talk never dies – even when it's supposed to.

It's been two years since President-elect Barack Obama announced he was running for president. By all reasonable counts, we shouldn't hear anything about the government until Obama realizes that he has to run for president again – right? Wrong.

The second Senator John McCain announced that he was throwing in the towel in the 2008 presidential campaign, the greasy little hands that run elections have been working overtime.

The Democrats are mainly thinking of ways to solidify their gains. They won – and they won big. As for Republicans, they're already figuring out how to win the White House back in '12. It may seem a bit early for you and me, but getting re-elected is the only job politicians have.

Naturally, the Republican side needs to do a bit of soul searching. After all, they lost by a large – if not a total landslide – margin. Nearly 200 electoral votes and several million popular votes is nothing to laugh at.

While I am taking a little enjoyment at the expense of the Rove cabal's attempt to have a permanent Republican majority, I feel like I should offer the Republican side some hints.

Call it an identity crisis. After all, people our age (18-24) voted for Obama over twice the amount that they voted for McCain. In order to make sure that the Republican brand doesn't lose an entire generation to the Democrats, I think I should give out a couple suggestions.

First, let's talk about the culture war. Stop it.

If the Republicans want to win a majority of votes from the group born after Reagan became president, they need to start thinking of ways to accept the differences that the 80s and 90s generation brings. They're going to be needed to win another election.

There's also the respect issue.

This year, Republicans ran on a platform that was anti-immigrant, anti-homosexual and anti-urban. People notice that candidates deride big city life and then talk about the tragedy of 9/11.

Immigrants from Hispanic and Arabic backgrounds, who are normally social conservatives, are being insulted into the opposing team. Support for gay rights amongst Americans is growing every year. There isn't anything to be gained by smearing these groups into Democratic hands.

This generation tends to be more educated than the previous ones, and the Republican party denigrates intelligence at its own risk.

Then, there's the issue of the anti-intellectual movement. The current President has a reputation for disliking anything sophisticated. Governor Palin said we were spending too much on scientific research. Republican administrations typically under-fund education projects.

To top it off, the party complains that public schools don't teach children anything useful. With such condescending attitudes towards education, it really can't be that surprising that they lack the support of younger generations. This generation tends to be more educated than the previous ones, and the Republican party denigrates intelligence at its own risk.

The Republican party also needs to reconsider its status as the other party of Big Government. It seems like the Bush administration has woven its way into every facet of American life – as long as it isn't providing healthcare or watching Wall Street.

Republicans need to offer a choice for limited government if they want to remain competitive.

Finally, the Republican party needs to find new blood.

Mike Huckabee and Sarah Palin are the two favorites right now, especially amongst social conservatives. But they can't carry an election without independents. Huckabee's biggest supporter was Chuck Norris and statistically speaking, Palin drove away more independents than she brought in.

By dropping candidates who made their names promoting social agendas that this generation generally disagrees with, the GOP can appeal to a larger amount of people.

Bring in people who have grounding in free-market economics and care about issues like smaller government. It's not like they can do any worse.

One of my favorite words is schadenfreude. It's the act of taking joy in another person's misery. And to tell the truth, after watching the current administration lie and mismanage their way into Iraq, throw away the good will the rest of the world had for us after 9/11 and ensure that there won't be any decent jobs around when I get out of school, I'm taking a little schadenfreude in the Republican defeat.

At the same time, I don't want them to go away.

I think the best thing about America is that we are offered a choice in our government. Republicans just need to make sure that the choice isn't a raw deal for my generation. Besides, while a permanent Democratic system wouldn't be the end of the world, it certainly would make things real boring.

Feeling great in 2008

Many views of what releases have to offer

By Ian Nelson
Collegian Staff

The year in music came and went just like that. With many high-profile releases falling flat, there appeared few colossal smashes among that handful of records you just couldn't put down. Here are some records you should keep spinning well into next year:

10. Vivian Girls – "Vivian Girls"

While this album may not exactly have the staying power as others on the list, Vivian Girls have crafted one of the catchiest pieces of guitar fuzz all year. The trio lists the tight punk of The Wipers as well as the old standby Nirvana as influences, which prove accurate, but there's more going on here. Walls of guitar noise wash over simple, crashing drum parts, each song with deeply embedded pop hooks and girlish harmonies. The record's ten tracks barely last over 20 minutes, instantly begging multiple listens.

"Wild Eyes" steadily lolls forward, wrapped in an aura of distortion and angelic vocal echo while the propulsive drumming on "Tell the World" guides rising harmonies, recedes, then climaxes with another singsong-y verse. Sugar-sweet and addictive, it's hard to listen to this record just once.

9. Conor Oberst – "Conor Oberst"

Taking a break from the Bright Eyes moniker after touring last year's "Cassadaga," Conor Oberst set off to Mexico with some friends (dubbed the Mystic Valley Band) simply to record a country-rock n' roll record. Oberst takes cues from the likes of Tom Petty, layering many acoustic guitars to create a huge, dynamic sound. The record sees Oberst maturing even further after the cleaned up tones of "Cassadaga," following rather traditional structural paths laid out decades ago while flaunting the influence of their location south of the border.

The album excels with strong choruses ("Get-Well-Cards," "Moab," "Souled Out!!!"); a few, up-tempo rockers ("I Don't Want to Die (In the Hospital)," "NYC – Gone, Gone"), and some welcome balladry ("I enders in the Temple," "Milk Thistle"), familiarly urgent and, ultimately, necessary. The first track, "Cape Canaveral" inhales deeply while "Milk Thistle," the closer, breathes out in both hesitant and hopeful tones, ultimately achieving little but doing so in such a fun way that it really doesn't matter.

8. M83 – "Saturdays = Youth"

M83's French mastermind Anthony Gonzalez has consistently been releasing music for the better part of the decade, releasing his most pop-oriented work yet, "Saturdays = Youth." Gonzalez ditched the ambient landscapes of last year's "Digital Shades Volume 1" in favor of tighter song structures and vocals.

The return to the pop format sees M83's ominous overtones fleshed out with stylized lyrical content (think wavers words at night, 1980s vampires, and ghostly mist) matched up with super-memorable synth-pop hooks in the vein of Cocteau Twins or even Tears for Fears. "We Own the Sky" is a textural heaven, with washes of electronic hum and silvery vocals mingling over stuttering drum machine patterns, while "Kim & Jessie" and "Graveyard Girl" are shimmering and radio-ready.

The centerpiece is clearly the eight and a half minute "Couleurs," a pulsating dance-floor showcase which is proof that Gonzalez sure knows how to craft a catchy single.

7. Gang Gang Dance – "Saint Dymphna"

One theme this year, and for that matter for music in general, was the constant drift of established acts towards the mainstream. One to add to this list is NYC's Gang Gang Dance, whose slightly more accessible "Saint Dymphna" not only has one of the best cover arts of the year, but also contains some of the year's best grooves, plain and simple. The group has always experimented with multi-layered percussion and eerie electronics, evidenced by the squealing metallic tones of album opener "Hebey," which flows right into "First Communion," on which Singer Lizzi Bougatsos prominently wails and shrieks to good effect. Bougatsos proceeds to remain silent on "Vacuum" and sees concise vocal parts on "Princes," which sees East Londoner Tinchy Stryder busting verses over Gang Gang's blipping barrage.

The true turn towards a pure pop feel comes in "House Jam." Multi-tracked "oohs" and "mmms" start the track and make up the basic beat even before drums kick in, eventually mixing it up with some "ahhs" for good measure. The song takes a biopsy of the group's sound and injects it successfully into a tame pop format, in glaring opposition to "Afoot," a tribal piece of found drum sound clatter, the tinkling of chimes, and the paradoxical line "McDonalds cashiers in a land where cows are sacred." GGD can easily tread the thin line between oddballs and pop genius and rarely stumble.

6. Air France – "No Way Down," EP

Sweden's Air France crafts some of today's most interesting dance music, drawing on many styles to create a unique, synthetic sound. Their infatuation with disco becomes apparent quickly, as horn and string sections are laid over processed percussion sounds and spacey atmospherics. The blissful single "Collapsing at Your Doorstep" features a repeated vocal sample of what seems to be one young girl's voice musing "Sorta like a dream" before another grounded in reality quickly claims "No, better." The patterns press together harder and harder like topographic lines before climaxing in bombastic glory, trumpets blaring.

The next track, "No Excuses," is just as vibrant, but grows to its full height within the first 30 seconds, melodic strings serenely sweeping into the chorus line of "No excuses left – waiting to fail, but not quite yet." A whimsical whistle sums up the title track, while "Windmill Wedding" opens with church bells, woodpecker pecking, bird chirps, and female gasps before huge harp flourishes reveal Spanish-sounding guitar and, you guessed it, more strings. With only two EPs under their belts (the former being 2006's "On Trade Winds" EP) clocking in at a combined 36 minutes, a full-length would be ideal, but anything more Air France has to offer is welcome.

5. White Denim – "Exposion"

One of the most infectious rock records of the year belongs to Austin's White Denim, who released their U.S. full-length debut "Exposion" themselves in only vinyl and digital formats since, according to the band, "CDs seem pretty worthless." The album is not completely new material, and includes reworked versions of songs which appeared on "Workout Holiday," a Europe-only LP released earlier this year which itself contains reworked versions of songs from both their "Workout Holiday" and "Let's Talk About It" EPs. Rehashed songs include the cleaned up stand-out track "All You Really Have to Do" and a vastly different "Sitting," the latter of which expanded from a measly two minute pop gem to a more substantial five minutes, beefed up with sassy saxophone and an extended outro to finish the record.

The record sports a few new songs as well, including "Migration Wind," a pleasant, backwoods escape from the more ethereal side while a precious few, including "Batcat" invoke a harder, metal sound. While the record's sound is very diverse, there is a persistent sense of unity that is signature to the band's progressive style.

Bon Iver releases greatness

By Angela Starkowski
Collegian Staff

In review, 2008 had its share of monumental releases. With new records from media darlings Coldplay and Kanye West, the popular music industry certainly kept itself busy.

Other highly anticipated releases included Beck's "Modern Guilt" and Death Cab for Cutie's latest, "Narrow Stairs," which were received with only moderate enthusiasm by the college radio crowd.

Another notable release came from notorious rockers Guns 'N Roses, who finally completed their fifth studio album, "Chinese Democracy," after 10 years of false promises and hard work.

With the fate of compact discs in a sort of commercial purgatory, an increasing number of artists have begun to release their albums on vinyl. Digital music also took a turn for the better this year, increasing significantly from previous years.

Even with the "new" manifestations of music sales, it has been a poor year for the industry as a whole with piracy quickly becoming a sore subject.

However, what the music business has lacked in profit, it has more than made up for in genre-bending albums that have gradually made their way to the forefront of the listening masses. Despite the hard times, it is comforting to know that there is still room for truly original music.

10. Right Away, Great Captain! – "The Eventually Home"

Created as a side project by Manchester Orchestra's singer and guitarist, Andy Hull, "The Eventually Home" is the sophomore album for the project and explores some of the same themes as the previous release, "The Bitter End." However, with the progression of time, the music has certainly strengthened, earning countless comparisons to the likes of Conor Oberst. Hull has pioneered his own way in the music industry, crafting songs that rely on the efficacy of his vocals for the desired effect. The vulnerability that is ubiquitous in Hull's music is best represented on this album, most notably in "I Was a Cage," a tune whose sparse instrumentation displays true vocal sincerity.

9. Coldplay – "Viva La Vida"

No one can deny the staying power of Chris Martin's merry band of British minstrels. With their fourth album, the pop radio songsters further defied the laws of piano rock, inching their way into every form of media with incessantly catchy tunes like "Viva la Vida" and "Violet Hill." The percussive nature of the piano in these tunes is infallibly gut wrenching, swirling up in great firework displays of sound. With Martin at the helm, soothing falsetto vocals croon lyrical displays of lost love and reminiscing. Call them what you will, but Coldplay's "Viva la Vida" appeals to the softer side of anyone's musical taste.

8. Mogwai – "The Hawk is Howling"

Returning with its second album in two years, Mogwai releases another brilliant record to maintain its nearly flawless reputation. With a sound that is often described as atmospheric, "The Hawk is Howling" is another example of successful post-rock intelligence. The album displays a variety of tempos and focuses a good deal on variations of dynamics in order to conjure a particular sentiment within each song. The first track, titled "I am Jim Morrison, I am Dead," is on the more ethereal side while a precious few, including "Batcat" invoke a harder, metal sound. While the record's sound is very diverse, there is a persistent sense of unity that is signature to the band's progressive style.

7. Atmosphere – "When Life Gives You Lemons, You Paint that St Gold"

The underground rap scene is often underrepresented in musical reviews. Atmosphere's "When Life Gives You Lemons..." is simply too good to pass up, however. "Guarantees," the album's first single, is perhaps the best known, serving as an ode to the difficulties of subsisting just below the middle class level. "You," a faster-paced romp through similar themes, relies on heavy bass grooves and an incessantly catchy chorus. As a whole, the album treads on an entire spectrum of emotions and topics, all carried out with a tremendous amount of musical know-how. Atmosphere is a rap artist for a new generation of rap fans.

6. Frontier Ruckus – "The Orion Songbook"

Though it has often fallen into the shadows of bigger, flashier acts, Frontier Ruckus has made a name for itself with "The Orion Songbook." The concept of the record is based off some fabricated Midwestern town called Orion. Leaning towards the folk side of the musical spectrum, the album pulls off the difficult feat of including a singing saw, something very few albums can accomplish successfully. "Orion Town 2" and "Animals Need Animals" are glowing displays of acoustic prowess, focusing on the beauty in simplicity. The harmonies present in this album add another delicate layer of sonic clarity, particularly in "The Deep Yard Dream." As a whole, there is something quite familiar about the album that suggests the warmth of coming home.

5. Shearwater – "Rook"

Formed by Will Sheff and Jonathan Meiburg of Okkervil River as an outlet for their softer, more serious side, Shearwater shines with its latest release. The album features piano hooks that are simply breathtaking, effortlessly accompanying both quiet and upbeat songs. "Rooks," a favorite track on the record, succeeds brilliantly with eclectic instrumentation and a quietly frantic intensity to Meiburg's vocals. The band's lyrics are more thoughtful and introspective in nature than that of Okkervil River, and have earned comparisons to Talk Talk's experimental era.

Independent of this influence, the record is pure, alternative rock gold. "Leviathan Bound" and "On the Death of the Waters" are equally brilliant tunes, displaying the kind of controlled intensity that is found very rarely in modern music. Notably, due to conflicting tour dates and other various stressors, Meiburg recently left Okkervil River to pay more attention to Shearwater.

4. Grampall Jookabox – "Ropechain"

There is something to be said about an album that defies all explanation. The group is a collaborative effort of David Adamson and Aimee Brown, who create music that cannot easily be pinned down stylistically. Terms such as "jungle folk" have been created in attempts to describe the album's vibe, but nothing quite describes the schizophrenic sounds that the duo creates. In one review, a critic confessed that "I have no idea what you're trying to do, and that's either really good or really bad, I'm not sure."

"The Girl Ain't Preggers," is a quirky track that is deceptively mature on a technical level. With all instrumentation created by the duo alone, there is a tremendous amount of complexity that goes into the rhythm and melodies. "Lets Go Mad Together" contains a curious blend of scatting and soulful singing that

10. Sun Kil Moon – "April"

Ever since Mark Kozelek started Sun Kil Moon there has always seemed to be something missing. The former Red House Painters frontman has one of the most memorable voices in the business, but for whatever reason, his past offerings have fallen surprisingly flat. Kozelek has finally pulled it all together on "April," the second full-length release for Sun Kil Moon. Full of soothing melodies and lyrics that teeter on heartbreaking, "April" showcases all of Kozelek's strongest gifts as a songwriter, while not falling victim to the inconsistency issues that plagued his past releases. Opener "Lost Verses" may be the most breathtaking track of 2008, and possibly of Kozelek's career.

9. Shearwater – "Rook"

One listen to "Rook" and it's easy to see why Jonathan Meiburg left his supporting role in Okkervil River to devote the entirety of his efforts to Shearwater. "Rook" succeeds in taking the promising aspects displayed on the band's last release, 2006's "Palo Santo," and improving upon practically all of them. With Meiburg's haunting vocals at the forefront, "Rook," is both Somber and beautiful.

8. White Denim – "Exposion"

While it hasn't received many mainstream accolades, "Exposion" is an incredibly impressive, debut full-length from Austin, Tex.-based White Denim. The trio manages to defy classification on the record by melding sounds ranging from psychedelic pop to traditional blues seamlessly throughout the album's 11 tracks. Highlights include the hazy banjo-filled and jazz-inspired traveling song "All Truckers Roll," "All You Have to Do" and "HDA."

7. Mount Eerie – "Lost Wisdom"

An impromptu visit-turned-recording session is the foundation for Mt. Eerie's "Lost Wisdom." The album, a collaboration between Elverum and friends Julie Doiron and Fred Squire, is arguably the best Sub-6 album of the year. Elverum's distinctive tone and Doiron's astonishingly sorrowful vocals combine in perfect harmony over a backdrop of understated guitar work. "Lost Wisdom" is arguably Elverum's best release in years.

6. Bon Iver – "For Emma, Forever Ago"

Recorded and performed almost entirely by Justin Vernon, the debut album from Bon Iver is perfectly suited for colder climates. Recorded deep in the woods of Wisconsin, "For Emma, Forever Ago" is a minimalist album full of poetic lyrics and soothing, relaxing melodies. A follow-up EP is due in January for those who need a little more to get through the winter months.

'Fleet Fox' ranks number one album

5. Why? – "Alopecia"

Yoni Wolf's genre-bending outfit Why? has been producing quality albums for several years now. However, none have been greater than its latest offering, "Alopecia." "Alopecia" is a challenging album from start to finish – full of abstract concepts and heavy subject matter. Wolf's stream-of-consciousness lyrics very rarely stray from deeply somber subjects, but are delivered with stylish flair over such a diverse backdrop that the depressing subject matter fails to dampen the record in any way.

4. The Tallest Man on Earth – "Shallow Graves"

It's awfully tempting to compare Swedish, folksinger Kristian Matsson (also known as The Tallest Man on Earth) to a certain other harmonica and acoustic guitar wielding songwriter of yesteryear However, doing so would serve as a great injustice to the young songwriter and the remarkable album he has produced. Barebones production and lyrics that often border on narrative fantasy, fuel Matsson's debut full-length over a backdrop of finger picked banjo and frantic strumming. Highlights include the quick-paced tale of love and deception "The Gardner," and the frantic and defiant "I Won't Be Found."

3. The Magnetic Fields – "Distortion"

After four years away from the limelight, Steven Merritt returned in 2008 with "Distortion," a nearly 40-minute haze of 1960s pop, soothing melodies and reverb-infused instrumentation. Full of 1960s pop grooves and an overwhelming amount of fuzz, the album proved to be an ambitious, and highly successful, departure for the band. Merritt's voice, long renowned for its unique delivery and deep tone, has never sounded better. When combined with a musical backdrop fitting of the album's title consisting of distorted percussion and heavily fuzzed-out guitars, Merritt's vocals mesmerize as they are ushered to the forefront and it is next to impossible to resist. "Distortion" is an album filled with consistent high points, gorgeously delivered vocals, and a backdrop of blissful dissonance, and is easily the band's best release in nearly a decade.

2. Born Ruffians – "Red, Yellow & Blue"

It's been quite a year for debuts. No release embodies this greater than "Red, Yellow & Blue" from Canadian imports Born Ruffians. The album is at times sloppy and at others polished. The band jumps from frenetic to patient routinely with blatant disregard for the listener. The result is one of the most enjoyable listens from start to finish of the year. Purposely hasty tracks like "Hummingbird" and "Kurt Vonnegut" are offset perfectly by slower melodic selections such as the stand out track "Little Garcon," providing the album with a spontaneity and balance unseen in any other release in 2008.

1. Fleet Foxes – "Fleet Foxes"

By effortlessly blending the best qualities from countless sub-genres within the American folk and pop traditions, Fleet Foxes have successfully crafted the best album of 2008. "Fleet Foxes" possesses a rustic and weathered sound that defies the bands relative youth and inexperience. Standouts "Blue Ridge Mountains" and "White Winter Hymnal" are truly mesmerizing selections with innate timeless qualities to them. Quite simply, "Fleet Foxes" is a masterpiece, no matter what the year.

10. The Mars Volta – "The Bedlam in Goliath"

After bombing with last year's disastrously uneven "Amputechture" it was only right for America's reigning prog-rock outfit to come back and deliver. Steeped in bizarre imagery and haunting sound effects, the album loosely concerns The Mars Volta's battle with a possessed Ouija Board. Originally meant to be a present from guitarist Omar Rodriquez Lopez to lead singer Cedric Bixler Zavala, the board plagued the band with bad luck, flooding its recording studio and forcing the group to find a new drummer and cut short its tour. However, all that bad karma is channeled here by Lopez, who plays the guitar like a primal force while Zavala teeters back and forth between singing, wailing and speaking in tongues. Even if the album's back story is hoax, the real gift is this album.

9. My Morning Jacket – "Evil Urges"

Hailing from Kentucky, My Morning Jacket has inherited the long since abdicated throne of Southern rock, which makes it all the more surprising that its latest disc owed more to Prince than the Allman Brothers. However, at this stage in its career, MMJ has built itself the kind of following loyal enough for experimentation. And while its latest batch of sonic silly-putting cops more from old AM radio than 2005's Radiohead laundering Z, tracks like "Remnants," "Highly Suspicious," and "Touch Me I'm Going to Scream" bite hard enough to appease fans and lure new ones as well.

8. MGMT – "Oracular Spectacular"

Last January when Oracular Spectacular quietly made its way out radio speakers, it seemed unlikely that the band's synth-drenched techno pop would be enough to blast them into the stratosphere. Though, like so many other successes this year, MGMT's rise seemed at once unlikely and inevitable, ultimately brought on by a perfect storm of strong festival performances, danceable radio-friendly singles and hype that never seemed to subside. Songs like "Electric Feel" and "Kids" proved the band capable of churning out pop music that was as smart as it was catchy, while "Pieces of What" and "Of Moons, Birds & Monsters" showcased a desire to bend genres into spaced-out jams. For now, MGMT has all the momentum rolling its way, the group is young, ambitious, and according to Rolling Stone "The Band Everyone Wants to Be In." Now all it has to do is follow it up.

7. Beck – "Modern Guilt"

When Beck first announced he was going to be working with DJ Danger Mouse, the guru behind Gnarls Barkley, it seemed like a match preordained by the musical gods. A chance for Beck to regain his musical mojo after a few CDs were largely ignored by rock radio and greeted with skepticism from fans. And with Danger Mouse providing the right 60's influenced go-go dance party to back Beck's musings about middle-age and the end of the world, "Modern Guilt" delivers on those promises.

6. Okkervil River – "The Stand-Ins"

The second half to 2007's "The Stage Names," "The Stand-Ins" finishes off the band's concept album about the pressures of dealing with fame. Musically, the group's sound owes a large debt to British icons The Smiths, but with a decidedly American twist incorporating banjos and mandolins into hummable melodies. But Okkervil River has enough wit to set it apart, leading off with a riff ripped straight out of the early Who playbook, "Pop Lie" bangs with enough irony and propulsion to make you want to sing along and feel bad for it, while songs like "Starry Stairs" and "Singer Songwriter" soften the blows with narratives that are delivered with an author's precision.

5. The Hold Steady – "Stay Positive"

"Stay Positive," the Brooklyn band's fourth album, successfully extends The Hold Steady's established palette as much as it solidifies it. After developing its sound on critically acclaimed albums like 2005's "Separation Sunday" and 2006's "Boys and Girls in America," "Stay Positive" fleshes out its songs adding talk box solos and piano parts to the band's already established mix of Springsteen pop and bar-band grit. Craig Finn, the band's lead singer, covers much of the same terrain expanding on the characters and storylines that deal with summers of boredom, hanging with townies and other small town expanses. "Constructive Summer" even name checks Amherst, with lines about "climbing up on water-towers," while "Sequestered in Memphis" is the band's most polished single to date.

4. Vampire Weekend – "Vampire Weekend"

A year later, most of the hype surrounding these indie darlings has fallen off as the band earned spots on TRL and festivals like Coachella and Bonnaroo that found them riding the uneasy line between underground and mainstream – and it's easy to see why. The self-titled debut is one, smart pop album, melting down elements of African music, classical symphonies and indie pop, and forging the group into a slick, clearly defined sound ripe for endless summer playing. Now it seems the fans are in hibernation, but even after all the hype and backlash have cleared Vampire Weekend will still have one thing, a great debut album to stand on.

3. The Raconteurs – "Consolers of the Lonely"

"Consolers of the Lonely" was an important album for Jack White, turning what was once dubbed a mere side project into a heavyweight band. With its sophomore offering, The Raconteurs have succeeded at successfully cultivating its own sound, a bizarre alchemy that ranges from the garage rock stomp of "Consolers of the Lonely" to Dylan-esque ballads of murder and revenge, "Carolina Drama." Once more it proves that The Raconteurs can function with the sum of its parts rather than riding the coattails of White, whose established persona constantly threatens to overshadow the band.

2. Kings of Leon – "Only By the Night"

After floundering in obscurity at home and reveling in superstardom abroad, the Kings have finally found the right balance to conquer its homeland. Everything on the album is bigger and cleaner. Gone are the raspy vocals and the juvenile garage rock of its early albums, and in place everything is smoother, richer and more expansive. The lead single "Sex on Fire" pales in comparison to epic jams like "Closer" and "Crawl" which owe as much debt to new acts like The Strokes as they do to old bands like Led Zeppelin. "Use Somebody" showcases the King's pop smarts while backtracks like "I Want You" revel in the slow grooves that the band can unfurl on a whim. Look for this album to open up a lot of doors for the band this summer. It's a safe bet that after headlining festivals abroad, this is the album that finally earns the headlining slots at festivals closer to home.

1. TV on the Radio – "Dear Science"

Plain and simple, Brooklyn's TV on the Radio is such a unique band it seems unflattering to compare them to any other current band. How many other bands can shape-shift from the sparse five-minute violin tinged build of "Family Tree" to the experimental funk of "Red Dress?" As if this wasn't enough, despite the disparity of the songs offered on the album, "Dear Science" is a dense, cohesive work with clear thematic elements and ideas. Overall, this sophomore effort from a still developing band injects some much needed new life into rock's conventional formulas, adding dramatic harmonies and epic songs that range from jazz to techno and soul influences. With this album TV on the Radio has proven that it is no one-album wonder, but a band to expect even greater things to come.

Selected '08 records

Bon Iver's 2008 release, "For Emma, Forever Ago" echoes his heartbreak over a lost love, and was recorded while Iver was isolated in a cabin in the woods of Wisconsin. His lack of instrumental accompaniment makes the album more unique for listeners.

still somehow possesses an Americana appeal. "Ripecham" is an album that is best experienced with an open mind.

3. mr. Gnome – "Deliver This Creature"

For those with a taste for the experimental, this album delves effortlessly into genre bending depths.

"Deliver this Creature" features strong and often indistinguishable vocals from Nicole Bariffe, who also provides mind bending guitar riffs, all kept in rhythmic check by drummer Sam Meister. A notable departure from the commonplace, tracks like "Pirates" and "Night of the Crickets" possess hauntingly beautiful melodies, occasionally shredded by intensely complex guitar interruptions. It is difficult to pinpoint a singular influence for the band, with the album appealing to fans of everything from Fiona Apple to Nine Inch Nails to Yeah Yeah Yeahs.

The entire album has a distinctly "Alice and Wonderland" quality, however unintentional. Songs like "Deliver this Creature" fit this theme all too well, beginning with a distant harmony that immediately plunges into a harder, electric sound. From whatever perspective one chooses to view the album, there is always something new to hear.

2. Winterpills – "Central Chambers"

Winterpills' third full-length album, "Central Chambers" is an indirect reference to front man Phillip Price's recently diagnosed heart condition. Despite the heavy significance of the title, the album boasts airy male-female harmonies that support the band's brand of lively alternative rock tunes. "Beesting" comes as quite a departure for the hometown rockers, featuring a far more experimental, electronic sound than their fans are accustomed to. Of course, there is a fair share of chamber pop charm, including tunes like "You Don't Love Me Yet" and "Take Away the Words." Measured in sheer accessibility and enthusiasm, Winterpills deserve a good deal of recognition for its work on this album.

1. Bon Iver – "For Emma, Forever Ago"

Recorded in a cabin in the woods of Wisconsin, Bon Iver's debut was written, recorded and played almost entirely by singer and multi-instrumentalist Justin Vernon. Vernon, who centered the album around the termination of a long-term relationship, took to the cabin to isolate himself from the hassles of everyday life.

The record reflects this isolation beautifully, featuring folk rock tunes with the soul of something far greater. Tracks "Skinny Love" and "Flume" found their way to the Paste Magazine Music Sampler earlier this year. Sparse instrumentation and poignant lyrical poetics made for a truly minimalist album of monumental proportions. With a new EP due out in early 2009, there are great things to come from this backwoods crooner.

Lil' Wayne's album wins hearts of fans, new listeners alike

some of their more jarring work. Singer James Petralli's bluesy wail is superb and the guitar tones are distinct and massive – it's a wonder these guys haven't really caught on yet.

4. Excepter – "Debt Dept."

If it's ever necessary to throw a zombie dance party (no, not "Thriller"), Excepter could be your entire playlist.

The Brooklyn collective (who boasts consumerism-despising members with pseudonyms such as Zebrablood and Porkchop) molds malleable electronics and meaty percussion into groove-happy tribalism, utilizing drones, chants, bellows, shrieks and a nearly out of place dub influence to forge their own identity amongst the endless flow of acts coming out of the borough. First track "Entrance" breaths life into the dead, crawling at a funereal pace for six minutes before disintegrating into simple piano chords, while the last track "Burgers" consists of a burrowing bass line and warped vocals repeating "Flip those burgers, turn the patty over."

The best track is either the heavy "Any and Every" or the unsettling "Kill People." The former, riddled with layers of unintelligible, meandering vocal phrases, could easily find its hard-hitting beat remixed into a true club banger while the latter sounds as if it were lifted from a horror movie and sprinkled with the incantatory command "kill people" and the buzzwords "guns and roses." Excepter's aesthetic is pleasing yet makes one feel slightly uncomfortable, a cold sigh in the face of mainstream milieu.

3. Deerhunter – "Microcastle"

Atlanta's Bradford Cox is an endlessly interesting character, churning out new material so often it hurts. He released "Let the Blind Lead Those Who Can See But Cannot Feel" in February as well as multiple digital EPs over the course of the year, all under the Atlas Sound moniker. His band Deerhunter also released two full-lengths this year, "Microcastle" and its bonus disc "Weird Era Cont.," which was initially another album itself. Most, if not all of Cox's work is interesting, borrowing cues from guitar noise gods My Bloody Valentine and Goth songsters Echo & the Bunnymen to inform his sound.

Cox sings breathily, opting to alter his voice with echoed effects, while the band creates huge washes of sound with three guitars, plodding, progression-driven drumming, and upbeat bass lines. "Agoraphobia" documents the sad prospect of a life spent without stimulus, while "Little Kids" envies youths' misinformed ability to live in the moment and follow the leader. After some ambient-leaning, mid-album ditties, the record's shining moment rests in "Nothing Ever Happened," a swirling jam grounded in grungy guitars and progressive Krautrock layering.

The final track, "Twilight at Carbon Lake," rotates in circles like a classic 50s doo-wop hit before exploding into a million guitar shards. Cox has harnessed noise in the most triumphant manner – buried within the folds of a traditional pop song.

2. The Dodos – "Visiter"

One key attribute of a great album is relentlessness: How can an artist dole out song after song and fail to produce a dud?

San Francisco's Meric Long and Logan Kroeber do so through keen dynamics and appropriate pacing on "Visiter," allowing breathing room between onslaughts of loud songs.

The lighter fare act as introductions to more involved songs, most notably in the minute and a half long "It's That Time Again" preceding the six-minute twanging bombardment of "Paint the Rust," possibly the best song on the record. The first single "Fools" features the duo's infatuation with West African drumming, Kroeber's pounding rhythms enhancing Long's murderous strumming.

"Red and Purple" is gilded with toy piano and more interesting drum patterns while "Joe's Waltz" starts out lazy before giving way to the most frenetic, battering portion of the album. Above all else, melody comes easy to the Dodos, making for a lengthy, dense record which really never fails.

1. Lil Wayne – "Tha Carter III"

"Call Me What You Want, Bitch," implores Lil Wayne on "A Milli," and you can. He refers to himself as one of many appellations, including but not limited to Wayne, Mr. Carter, Young Weezy, Young Wayne, the self-censored Weezy F. Baby or more appropriately "the best rapper alive."

Well, not exactly, but he sure is the greatest rapper alive currently, embedded within the white mainstream, which shows in his eight Grammy nominations (leading all nominees). Formalities aside, Wayne is out of control ("tell the coppers 'ah ha ha ha'"). His flow is spectacular, jumping from strangled whimpers to high-pitched squeaks to more commanding tones. He's endlessly filthy, casually referring to sexual relations in the least printable of terms or nonchalantly describing murdering your grandmother.

He's got a vault full of references (most impressively the Adam Sandler "Click" line) and a tome of clever jabs ("I don't O.U. like two vowels"). With high-profile producers on his side, such as T-Pain, Kanye West, Swizz Beatz and David Banner, he is respectively producing some of the best rap songs of the year ("Got Money," "Let the Beat Build," "Dr. Carter," "I a La").

His sound jumps too, from sugary, urban radio hits ("Lollipop") to summery pop ("Mrs. Officer") to growling bass beasts ("A Milli") to weird concepts involving being an alien ("Phone Home"). He's a true chameleon, pleasing the long-time fan while refusing to be ignorable to anyone else. He rarely slips up, only really disappointing with "Tie My Hands" (most likely because of the presence of Robin Thicke).

What's most important is he's not done ("two words you never hear – 'Wayne quit'"), already releasing the "Dedication 3" Mixtape as well as providing guest vocals on endless singles. There's no way anyone halfway in touch with pop music will stop hearing from Wayne anytime soon.

New scoring trio at UMass

Mills, Rosanio and Tatham leading Minutewomen offense

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

With the departure of graduating seniors, Kate Mills, Pam Rosanio and Alisha Tatham, a new trio of scorers is beginning to emerge for the Massachusetts women's basketball team.

Senior Stefanie Gerardot (17.2 points per game), sophomores Gene Mosgrove (10.6 ppg) and Teya Wright (9.1 ppg) lead UMass (5-4) in scoring this season. After nine games, the three account for half of the season's scoring average for the Minutewomen.

UMass Basketball

Each player holds a top five position in three Atlantic 10 categories. Mosgrove is first in 3-point field goals made (28), Wright is third in offensive rebounds (29) and Gerardot ranks third overall scoring (155 points).

These skills were crucial for UMass in the past week alone.

In the Brown Bear Classic this past weekend, Wright's offensive rebounding down the stretch helped the Minutewomen down the Long Island Black Birds (4-4) to advance to the championship game, in which UMass beat host Brown (1-8) to win the tournament.

With the score tied, Wright recorded an offensive rebound that sealed the game and eventually fouled with an opportunity to put the game out of reach. She drained both attempts at the free-throw line to put the Maroon and White up for good, with a desperation shot by Providence missing before the final buzzer.

Mosgrove's deadly shooting from the 3-point range is very beneficial to UMass this season. She finished the weekend with seven shots from beyond-the-arc in the two-game classic.

In the championship game, Mosgrove was bested from 3-point land only by Gerardot, who sank a season-high six 3-pointers against Brown.

Gerardot's consistent scoring has kept the Minutewomen competitive in games all season. She is averaging 17.2 points per game and has led UMass in scoring in six of its first nine games this season.

At this point, the Minutewomen's season depends on the play of these three players to win games and teach their younger teammates how to perform successfully in collegiate basketball.

Unsung heroines

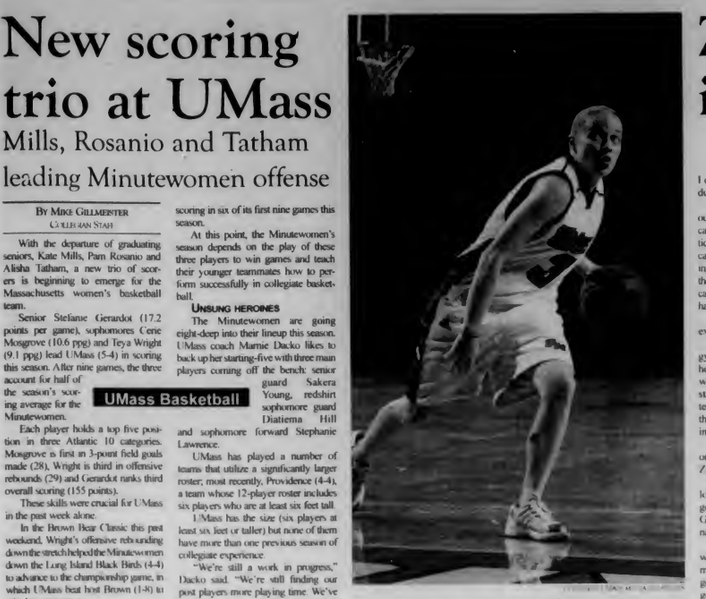
The Minutewomen are going eight-deep into their lineup this season. UMass coach Marnie Dacko likes to back up her starting-five with three main players coming off the bench: senior guard Sakera Young, redshirt sophomore guard Diatiema Hill and sophomore forward Stephanie Lawrence.

UMass has played a number of teams that utilize a significantly larger roster; most recently, Providence (4-4), a team whose 12-player roster includes six players who are at least six feet tall.

UMass has the size (six players at least six feet or taller) but none of them have more than one previous season of collegiate experience.



"We're still a work in progress," Dacko said. "We're still finding our post players more playing time. We've got to keep them out of foul trouble and keep them [playing with] some sort of rhythm."

Both Kristina Danella and Nicole Jones are freshmen post players with tremendous upside, however Dacko's inclusion of them in games depends not only on their play during games, but their effort during practice.

"I think practice is a good barometer [to show] whether or not an individual wants playing time," Dacko said of her philosophy towards the use of not only freshmen, but all of her players. "If you're not hungry in practice, you certainly aren't going to be able to turn it around in games."

Dacko hopes to use nine players on her roster instead of eight but that depends on who steps up in practice and proves that they're worthy of playing time.

Mike Gillmeister can be reached at mgillmei@student.umass.edu

In her freshmen year at North Carolina State, Megan Zullo averaged 3.4 points and 1.4 rebounds per game.

Zullo assisting in season off

I can," Zullo said of what she can do during her year off of the court.

"I'm trying to encourage and help out as much as I can. Even though I can't be on the court in games, in practice I'm going to push every player I can play both the point guard and shooting guard positions so I can help both the point guards and shooting guards, I can play defense on them, work them as hard as they need to be worked."

Zullo has already set a good example for her teammates.

According to Dacko, she is in the gym constantly, working to improve herself and make sure the year off won't dull her skills. She runs constantly and often she'll bring her teammates with her to workout so that they will get in the habit of improving themselves as well.

Senior guard Stefanie Gerardot is one of the players that have noticed Zullo's contributions to the team.

"She's someone who brings a lot of energy to practice and she's good for keeping everybody going," Gerardot said of Zullo's never-quit nature during practice.

"She's definitely a really hard worker. She was here during the summer with the freshmen and it was good to have her here. To have her guide the freshmen with her experience was really good for the starting of our program."

Gerardot says that Zullo is a naturally quiet person off the court and keeps to herself but is easily approachable when a younger teammate has any sort of question about what's going on in practice or if they just need someone to talk to.

Coming to a Northeastern school from North Carolina is a drastic change and Zullo, like any other college student, has her moments of homesickness. Yet she has already shown her commitment to the team and, in turn, the team has already embraced her as one of their own.

In terms of academics, Zullo doesn't falter there, either. She is a sport management major at one of the country's best schools for that program. She is always early to class and is on top of her studies whenever she isn't working with the team.

Zullo is a great 3-point shooter on an already potent team from beyond the arc. Her experience at NC State has made her a better player and her ability to cheer on her teammates from the bench this season will make her a better teammate. While she is a valued offensive commodity, her knowledge of the game will undoubtedly improve a young Minutewomen team.

When asked of how she fit into the fold of the system that Dacko has created, as well as the campus in Amherst, Zullo simply said, "This is where I belong."

Mike Gillmeister can be reached at mgillmei@student.umass.edu

Sophomore Stephanie Lawrence had a season-high 12 points in the Minutewomen's 75-63 loss to Providence last week.

Glass seeing significant time

M. BASKETBALL from page 10

A-10 tournament – that's what I keep telling our guys," Kellogg said. "When the Atlantic 10 season comes around, I don't want anybody in that league to think that we're some patsies, that we're an easy game.

"I want them to say, 'Oh no, here comes UMass – they're going to grind you out for 40 minutes on defense, they're going to try to jam it down your throat in transition on offense, and if it's not there they're going to move that ball freely from hand-to-hand and attack.'

"I think tonight was a great step towards that goal," he continued. "I think everybody in that arena tonight left saying, 'You know what? This team made strides; these guys are fighting and scrapping for everything.'"

Flashing a glimpse

Anthony Gurley's transfer to UMass before last season brought high expectations. The former Wake Forest guard played almost 15 minutes per game for the Demon Deacons during the 2006-07 season, squaring off against the likes of Duke and North Carolina in the Atlantic Coast Conference.

After sitting out last season at UMass, Gurley was expected be a major scoring threat to help out Harris and help negate the loss of Gary Forbes and Etienne Browder. Up until Saturday's game, Gurley wasn't living up to that expectation.

It can be difficult to get back into playing shape after a year on the sidelines, but Gurley feels he's coming around – especially after a 17-point performance against BC.

"I try to go out there and play as hard as I can for as long as I can," he said. "I just give the team all I have. I guess we just came up a little short [against BC]."

Building confidence

As a freshman last season, Matt Glass played 6.8 minutes per game. And for about 6.8 minutes per game, you could find Glass standing in the corner waiting for the ball to launch a 3-pointer.

He doesn't have that luxury this season. With injuries to big-men Luke Bonner and Matt Hill (out for season), Glass has seen his playing time and role drastically change.

The 6-foot-6 sophomore has seen increased minutes (13.7 per game; 32 against BC) in the paint, with the Minutemen needing some size in the middle. It hasn't been an easy transition, but Kellogg has seen improvement.

"He's been thrown into the fire a little bit, and he's responded fairly well," Kellogg said. "This has been a learning experience for him and now he's settled into a little comfort zone."

Glass had three points and four rebounds against the Eagles.

Preaching from the bench

Kellogg has mentioned several times this season how his team struggles defensively when he can't direct them on the sidelines.

"I love having the defense in front of our bench, because those guys are still learning how I want to play defense at UMass so when it's in front of the bench we can help them through some things," he said. "When they go on the other end it's on them a little bit. So I'm trying to get them to communicate more."

Eli Rosenwaike can be reached at erosenwa@dailycollegian.com

Senior Chris Lowe looks for an open teammate Saturday night against Boston College. The guard had eight points and 11 assists in the loss.

Hockey East coaches utilizing two goalies

Huskies strong in conference, Fighting Irish remain No. 1

By Joe Meloni
Collegian Staff

Early in the season, it's normal for coaches to tinker with their goaltending situation. Thus far, most Hockey East teams have utilized the two-goaltender system in order to keep both rested for the second-half stretch run, but also to figure out who the eventual No. 1 will be.

It seems that Boston University coach Jack Parker has made his decision. In both games this weekend against rival Boston College, freshman goaltender Kieran Millan made the start for the Terriers. The teams played to a 1-1 tie on Friday, and BU defeated BC, 3-1, Saturday night.

Millan and fellow rookie Grant Rollheiser split time for most of the season, but Millan started BU's last three games – a win over Saint Lawrence and the pair with Boston College. Rollheiser is nursing a groin pull, but the Terriers' record in Millan's starts (7-1-1) is much more impressive than their mark in Rollheiser's (3-3-0).

Against BC this weekend, Millan made 21 saves in Friday's 1-1 tie at Agganis Arena and 18 saves Saturday in the Terriers 3-1 win.

"It's great to see [Millan] doing well," BU senior, Brandon Yip, told The Daily Free Press, BU's student newspaper, after Saturday's win. "He was pretty comfortable in net there. He made a lot of key saves. When you've got a good goalie behind you, it makes everyone more comfortable."

The games were the first two between the Eagles and the Terriers, and Millan's steady presence allowed BU to pick up three crucial conference points. The win on the road will also aid BU's case for an at-large bid to the NCAA tournament should they lose in the Hockey East tournament.

Hockey East

No timetable for a Rollheiser return has been given; with the holiday break coming following BU's matchup with UMass-Lowell Friday, he should be ready for action once play resumes after Christmas.

Huskies still on top

Rarely does one team sit atop the Hockey East table for the entire season, but Northeastern's first half has made a wire-to-wire leader a realistic possibility.

The Huskies' most recent victory, a 3-2 overtime win against Maine, gave them 17 points in conference play. They have not lost a Hockey East game since Nov. 16, a 3-0 defeat at Boston University.

NU doesn't play again until Jan. 2 against Western Michigan as part of the Dodge Holiday Classic in St. Paul, Minn. NU's first-half dominance lifted them as a high as No. 4 in the USCHO/CBS College Sports Division I men's poll. A loss to Princeton, a team which has ranked in the top 10 for most of this season, turned Northeastern into something of a question mark. Within Hockey East, though, the Huskies have continued to display their dominance over the league.

Almost yearly, however, one team beyond the four primary Eastern powerhouses – BC, BU, Maine and New Hampshire – challenges for the league's regular season championship but never succeeds in the end.

The parity in the league this season has led most coaches around the league to believe that the separation between each seed will be as little as a single point. At the moment, only No. 9 Merrimack and No. 10 Providence are separated by more than three points. The Friars have earned one point through their first nine games of the Hockey East season, so they're essentially a lock to finish in the league's cellar.

The league's quality of play has been a talking point for most of the season, even starting with the Icebreaker Invitational in early October. Hockey East went 3-1-0 in its four games against Michigan State of the Central Collegiate Athletic Association and North Dakota of the Western Collegiate Athletic Association. Overall, Hockey East is 30-14-4 in non-conference games, only Providence is under-.500 at 2-4-0.

This week's Top 20

Notre Dame remained atop the weekly poll. The Fighting Irish haven't lost since Oct. 25 when Miami beat them for the second consecutive time – they are 10-0-2 in that stretch. BC fell from its spot at No. 2 to No. 7 after BU's sweep; the Terriers, meanwhile, moved from No. 7 to No. 4.

Northeastern earned the No. 5 spot in the poll, moving up one spot from No. 6. Vermont also jumped one spot from No. 12 to No. 11.

UNH jumped from No. 19 to No. 15 after its weekend sweep of UML. The River Hawks fell out of the poll completely.

The Wildcats won their first consecutive games since Oct. 17 and 19, and yet are still ranked. Obviously strong programs receive reputation votes from pollsters, but the Wildcats haven't earned their No. 15 ranking by any stretch.

UML, Maine and Massachusetts are all just outside of the top 20 earning 40, 35 and 23 votes respectively.

Ice shavings

Barring injury, BC goaltender John Muse will likely play every minute of every game for the Eagles this season. He has played 917 minutes, 35 seconds this season ... NU defenseman Louis Liotti earned the Reebok Player of the Week Award for his pair of goals against Maine ... BU freshman Chris Connolly's penalty-shot gamewinner against BC at The Heights on Saturday night earned him the Pro Ambitions Rookie of the Week Award ... Millan and UNH's Brian Foster shared the Pure Hockey Defensive Player of the Week Award. Foster made 48 saves in UNH's sweep over UMass-Lowell.

Material from personal interviews, other beat writers, wire services and league and team sources was used in this report.

Joe Meloni can be reached at managingeditor@dailycollegian.com

Boston University coach Jack Parker has let freshmen Grant Rollheiser and Kieran Millan split time in net so far this season. But with Rollheiser dealing with an injury, Millan has taken advantage of his time in goal.

Maroon and White struggle to finish in close contests

one of the nation's best at the beginning of the season has once again fallen off after its two goal performance against then- No. 13 Vermont.

That is not to say they have not scored with a man in the box, though. In the last two games, UMass has scored more goals shorthanded than with the man advantage, 2-0.

Putting in the dagger

After two one goal losses (St. Lawrence and Vermont) and a one goal win over Boston College, the Minutemen showed that they could fight hard against any opponent, but can't put together an entire game as of late.

But with Friday's 5-1 win over UConn, UMass showed that it could put a team away for good, something the team has struggled with recently. This was no more evident than in the Minutemen's 3-2 overtime loss to Vermont. UMass held a 2-0 lead late in the second period, only to squander it after failing to respond to two goals by the Catamounts.

When the Minutemen have won this season, it has been by nature of a blowout or a one goal win.

To the team's credit, blowouts have been commonplace. Of its seven victories this season, five came from games where UMass outscored its opponent by at least four goals. The team's other two wins – decided by a one goal margin – were two of the team's biggest wins (North Dakota and BC).

Other than its blowout of BU, UMass has yet to put together a solid win over a top team and cannot expect to do so in a blowout. Hockey East is too strong of a conference for that.

On the other hand, if the Minutemen blew out all the top teams, they would not be heading towards winter break with a .500 record.

Pocket aces

In Hockey East, a division so largely driven by play in goal, it's vital to have a solid netminder. But for UMass, that position has talent and depth.

Sophomore Paul Dainton and junior Dan Meyers are playing injury-free and have performed exceptionally well for the Minutemen. Dainton has retained his form from last year, improving his goals against average to 1.83, good for third in Hockey East. Meanwhile, Meyers has played beyond expectations, improving upon his career average of 2.73 goals per game to 2.30.

While Dainton is third in Hockey East with a .930 save percentage, Meyers' .925 average gives UMass two of the top five goaltenders.

Meyers, who made his most recent start against Vermont, performed well, stopping 28 shots. However, his efforts were squandered as 13 third period shots, along with no late push from his offense, led to the team's overtime defeat.

Dainton, meanwhile, has been playing solid, as usual. In his most recent outing against UConn, Dainton made 20 stops. He shut-out the Huskies for the final two periods as the Minutemen pulled away with the win.

Nick O'Malley can be reached at nomalley@student.umass.edu

Senior Chris Davis has scored six goals and assisted on four others for a total of 10 points. The winger has played in all 15 games for the Minutemen this season.

Zullo follows in the footsteps of late aunt

Guard finds home after transfer to UMass

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

Just because you have the physical ability to play for one of the most prestigious basketball programs in the country doesn't mean that it's your best option.

Megan Zullo of the Massachusetts women's basketball team had all the tools to play for North Carolina State, the program that recruited her out of Greenville, N.C. However, it was not what she expected.

While she was playing for a perennial powerhouse in the Wolfpack, she misunderstood her role in the coaching system of NC State coach Kay Yow.

Zullo is a point guard who can shoot as well as a shooting guard. In fact, her shooting was so prolific that Yow gave her playing time at the shooting guard position. She averaged 3.4 points and 1.4 rebounds per game in her freshman season, until Zullo missed the final 27 games of the season with a stress-fracture in her leg.

She earned a medical redshirt that season and returned to the court the next offseason for workouts. At that point, Yow decided to play Zullo exclusively at shooting guard.

"Basically all I did was run up and down the court and all they wanted me to do was stand out and shoot 3-pointers. That's not really my game so I was kind of frustrated about that," Zullo says. "I like being in charge. I like the ball in my hands. I like to create for others and that's what I play off of, starting the offense and giving other people an opportunity to score."

UMass coach Marnie Ducko recognized this as well when assistant coach Jada Pierce got word of Zullo from a colleague.

Ducko sent someone to take a look at Zullo on the court during a tournament and called her shortly thereafter to see if she would like to visit the UMass campus. After Zullo signed her release from NC State, she came to Amherst and practiced with some of the Minutewomen. She immediately felt the connection that brought her late aunt Christel to UMass in the mid-1980s.

Christel Zullo was a pure scorer whose legacy is as decorated as any point guard in UMass history. She also was a prolific passer – her 15 assists against Temple on Feb. 14, 1986 is a record that remains untouched in the UMass record books. Zullo's three single-season assist marks of 162, 143 and 136 rank third, sixth and eighth, respectively at UMass. She is second all-time with a total of 533 career assists.

Her defense was tenacious as well. Her 186 career steals is the fifth-highest total in school history.

Zullo passed away in February 2007 due to cancer. Yet her influence on Minutewoman basketball was so inspiring that the team created the Christel Zullo Spirit Award, an award given to a player on the team who best exemplifies Zullo's energy, dedication and enthusiasm for the game.

Alisha Tatham was the award's inaugural recipient, in April 2008.

Megan didn't know her aunt very well and therefore, had little to comment on the situation. However, she feels as though she is the same kind of player as her late aunt once was and that she can help this Minutewoman team when she becomes eligible at the start of next season.

Because Zullo transferred from NC State, she loses a year of eligibility, per NCAA regulations. However, she gains another year because of her medical redshirt in her first year with the Wolfpack. This season, she can't play in a game, dress for a game or even travel with the team for away games.

This is a tough thing for a player to do when they are trying to establish continuity with the team, but Zullo will do what she can to improve her new team.

During practice, Zullo is like another coach on the court.

Coming from a system at NC State coached by the legendary Yow, she's learned a lot about the game of basketball and frequently imparts her knowledge to younger teammates.

"I would say that I'm trying to be a leader in any way

See ZULLO on page 8

After a year of not playing much at North Carolina State, Megan Zullo decided to transfer to UMass. While sitting out due to the transfer, Zullo has led by example for the Minutewomen.

Kellogg shoots for Atlantic 10s

By Eli Rosenbaike
Collegian Staff

There is no more doubting Tony Gaffney.

After averaging 3.2 points and 4.8 rebounds per game last season off the bench, Gaffney's reliability as a strong low-post presence was a question mark entering this season.

Question answered.

But with six consecutive losses, the new-look Massachusetts men's basketball team has more questions now than it did entering the 2008-09 season.

Gaffney, one of three UMass senior captains, remains confident that the Minutemen are close to turning things around.

"We know what we're capable of doing. Obviously everyone is doubting us right now but as a team we've stuck together this whole time and we know what we're capable of," Gaffney said after Saturday night's overtime loss to Boston College. "We knew we would be in this game at the end, so I wouldn't say we're more confident now, just more hungry I think you could say."

First-year coach Derek Kellogg saw signs of major improvement with his team in the tough loss to the Eagles.

"There were a ton of good things out there," he said after the game, referring mostly to Ricky Harris' 35 points and Gaffney's effort. "I think they're getting closer to realize how hard you have to play to win … that you have to do all the little things down the stretch to win."

"I thought they played the way they wanted to play, and I think that's important," Boston College coach and former UMass basketball star Al Skinner said. "[Kellogg] obviously has their attention and it seems like the guys are saying the right things, hanging in there, sticking together. It looks like they're definitely headed in the right direction."

UMass Basketball

SHIFTING FOCUS

After the game Kellogg stressed the importance of getting his team concentrated and ready for Atlantic 10 Conference play, which begins on Jan. 10, 2009.

UM struggles to find stride

Lack offensive consistency, have depth and talent in net

By Nick O'Malley
Collegian Staff

As its 4-4-1 conference record indicates, the Massachusetts hockey team is a group that has not yet found its stride. However, as a recent venture outside the confines of Hockey East has shown, the Minutemen's inconsistencies are coming from more than their strong conference schedule.

To date, the Minutemen have posted a 3-2-0 non-conference record. After starting the season with a loss against then-No. 12 Michigan State, UMass rallied back-to-back wins against then-No. 4 North Dakota and Rensselaer.

After a 4-3 loss to St. Lawrence (Nov. 28) and a 5-1 win against Connecticut (Dec. 5), the question that has been raised all season is which UMass team will show up on a given night.

After opening up the 2008-09 season with a 4-1-1 record, there didn't seem to be many questions. The team's opening stretch included a win over North Dakota and a tie against then-No. 4 New Hampshire.

Incidentally, the Minutemen have faced the No. 4 team in the country four times, going 2-1-1 against those teams by a combined score of 8-8.

It seemed that a stunning 3-1 loss to Merrimack (Nov. 8) would derail UMass' season. But, with a win against then-No. 1 Boston University (Nov. 14), the team looked to have shifted gears immediately.

The loss seemed to be the more telling game, however, as the Minutemen have gone 4-2 since knocking off the top team in the country.

UMass Hockey

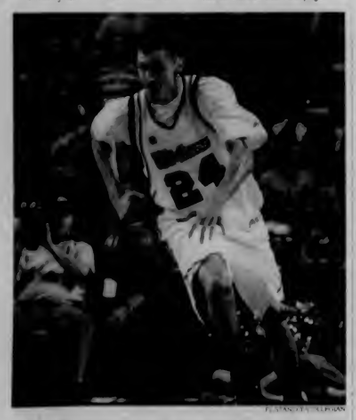
UMass coach Don Cahoon's team has played the parts of Jekyll and Hyde all season, looking like the class of Hockey East one game and basement-dwellers the next.

Nothing has been more schizophrenic than the team's offense. The Mass Attack has looked magnificent at points during the season, especially during its 9-4 win over Providence and 5-1 over BU.



However, that same offense was shut out on back-to-back nights immediately following the BU game.

The power-play unit that was

See HOCKEY on page 8

Junior Will Ortiz has contributed to the Minutemen's offense with one goal and one assist in 10 games so far this season.

Senior Tony Gaffney currently ranks third in the nation in rebounds per game (13.1) and tied for second with blocks per game (5).

Minutewomen fall to NU

By Kyle Predki
Collegian Staff

As the men of the No. 9 Massachusetts swimming team took a break this weekend for its annual Maroon and White scrimmage, the No.19 Minutewomen faced Northeastern in a duel meet this weekend.

After placing right behind Northeastern in the Terrier Invitational, UMass was again defeated by the Huskies, 161.5-138.5, and fell to 2-2 in this season's duel meets.

The 400-yard freestyle relay team, consisting of Christa Narus, Jennifer Corriveau, Elizabeth Walsh and Kathryne Chalikis, finished first (3 minutes, 36.06 seconds) in the event but only by less than a second.

In individual events, Narus earned a first place win in the 200-yard butterfly (2:08.20). The senior captain also earned points by finishing second in both the 100-yard free (59.04) and the 200-yard free (1:55.87).

Walsh keeps adding to her outstanding performances as she claimed the top spot in the 200-yard freestyle (1:55.67) while Chalikis put up points by finishing second in the 50-yard freestyle (24.61) and third in the 100-yard freestyle (53.90).

Corriveau would be the one to outrace Chalikis for first in the 100 free (53.54) but would finish third, right behind Chalikis, in the 50 free (24.95).

A few of the freshman swimmers posted a few top three finishes of their own. Chelsea Downing finished third in the 500-yard freestyle (5:17.87) and second in 1000-yard freestyle (10:47.54). Molly Papish rounded out the 1000 free behind Downing for third (11:04.26).

Jessica Starosielic notched points for UMass with a couple second-place finishes in the 100-yard breaststroke (1:07.50) and the 200-yard breaststroke (2:25.12). Starosielic, along with Walsh, Chalikis and Corriveau, swam for a close second place in the 200-yard medley relay.

Both Massachusetts' swimming and diving teams will have a much needed break for finals and return to action at the end of December for the Loyola Invitational in Puerto Rico.

Kyle Predki can be reached at kpredki@student.umass.edu.

Senior captain Christa Narus currently holds the record for the 100-butterfly (56.69) and 200-butterfly (2:03.14) at UMass.

Desmond to chair higher ed

By Dominic Poli
Collegian Staff

Gov. Deval Patrick appointed, on Dec. 4, the former University of Massachusetts Boston administrator Charles Desmond as the chair of the Board of Higher Education, according to a statement from the Governor's Office.

Desmond replaced Frederick W. Clark, Jr., whose resignation took effect Dec. 5.

Clark, an executive at a real estate development firm in Easton, served as chairman for the past 15 months and helped manage the search for a new commissioner for the Department of Higher Education.

"Fred Clark performed a tremendous service in his role and I thank him for his commitment to public higher education and his enduring support for students," Patrick said in the statement before acknowledging his new appointment.

"I am pleased to appoint Charlie Desmond as chair of the Board of Higher Education. His background in public higher education, his many years of service at the University of Massachusetts and his passion for ensuring the success of all students will guide his important work," he said.

According to the statement, Desmond is the executive vice president of the Treffer Foundation, a nonprofit organization dedicated to increasing educational opportunities for Boston's urban youth.

He previously worked at UMass Boston for 30 years, at various times, as associate chancellor for School/Community Collaboration, vice chancellor for Student Affairs, dean of the College of Public and Community Service, and project director for Upward Bound and director of Pre-freshman Programs. He was appointed to the Board of Higher Education in September.

Nancy Hoffman was also appointed by Patrick to the board, the statement said. The vice president at Jobs for the Future (JFF), Hoffman directs its Youth Cluster, a group that plans activities and projects, the Early College High School Initiative and efforts to make college affordable.

JFF, according to its Web site, is a "partnership that aims to accelerate opportunities for people in education and careers." Its Early College High School Initiative is a program, funded by the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation, that combines high school and college to shorten the time it takes for a student to earn a high school diploma and complete two years of college.

Hoffman has held positions at institutions of higher education such as UMass Boston, Brown University, Temple University and Harvard Graduate School of Education.

"Nancy has worked hard over the years to make sure students from across the state have the access and the support they need to be fully engaged and successful learners who emerge from their higher education experience prepared to make a differ-

Man struck by Amtrak train

By Matt Rocheleau
Collegian Staff

A man was struck by an Amtrak passenger train while crossing the tracks somewhere between Bridge and Pine streets in Amherst around 4:30 p.m. yesterday, according to witnesses.

Town resident Titus Neigens said he witnessed an adult male cross the tracks while the red railroad warning lights were blinking as the train approached.

"At that point the train passed and no one was there," Neigens said.

The train stopped after the alleged incident.

After hearing police sirens, Miguel Reda, a nearby Amherst resident, walked to the scene to see what had happened. He said he could see what appeared to be a sheet covering a body near the tracks.

Officials used caution tape to keep onlookers away.

Emily Nuzzo, a manager at Cushman's, said she heard from a witness that the man was wearing a white T-shirt.

Police arrived on the scene around 5 p.m., she said.

"I heard the regular sound of the train coming and then I heard it slowing down," said Nuzzo, who graduated from the University of Massachusetts in May.

Officials declined to comment on the incident because it is still under investigation.

Neigens said he was picking up his son at nearby Cushman Market and Cafe. He said he gave his number to police in case they wanted to ask him any questions about what he saw.

Autism, from the sibling's view

By Lucas Correia
Collegian Staff

In recent years, the autism spectrum has become a widely-known topic of research, debate and concern.

However, there is one often-overlooked aspect of a journey through life with autism – the experience that "neuro-typical" siblings of autistic individuals are faced with.

While introducing her son Jace King's film "The Sandwich Kid," Keri Bowers, mother of two (one son with autism, and another unaffected), from Thousand Oaks, Calif., informs viewers that there are roughly 650 million people in the world who have a disability, ranging from mild to severe, and that the number of siblings is incalculable.

These are the kids who spend more time than usual in therapy waiting rooms. They're the ones who at times have put up with confusing, embarrassing and sometimes violent behavior. In some cases, the neuro-typical siblings are also the ones who receive less attention from their parents, who need to focus on the issues at hand with their disabled child.

"They're the kids who take the back seat," said Bowers, "but tend to transcend their circumstances and become the caretakers."

Kate Dansereau, 34, of Fairhaven, who has an autistic twin sister, Julie, recalls her story of transcendence. She's now an autism consultant for Community Autism Resources (CAR), based in Swansea.

"As I got older … and 'fitting in' became more important, it was extremely difficult. I was often embarrassed by her and concerned of my own image and what other people would think," said Dansereau. "After high school there was a shift in my attitude and I became much more accepting

UM hosts Holy Cross

UMass junior guard Ricky Harris scored a career-high 35 points against Boston College Saturday. UMass faces Holy Cross tonight.

By Jeffrey R. Larnard
Collegian Staff

The last time the Massachusetts men's basketball team defeated Holy Cross, Derek Kellogg called the shots – not as a coach but as a junior-captain point guard.

That was in 1993 when the Minutemen won 97-80, the fourth game in row they had taken over the Crusaders. Since then, the two schools have met twice, with HC coming out on top in 2000 and 2001.

Tonight when the two play at 7 p.m. on the Mullins Center court, it will renew a rivalry that has been off and on since 1908. Three months ago, UMass (1-6) and HC (3-6) agreed to play each other for the next three seasons, with next year's contest being played at the DCU Center in Worcester.

As well as renewing the in-state rivalry, Kellogg is excited about the chance for UMass to play all across the state as well as bring more fans to the Mullins Center.

"UMass is the state school and I wanted to be able to take our team across the state on occasion, from Springfield to Worcester to Boston," Kellogg said. "To get a team like Holy Cross to come to the Mullins Center is a great draw as well. There are a lot of people in this area who have Holy Cross ties or interest, and a lot of people wanted to see that game."

When the Crusaders take the court tonight, they look to win their second in a row after six straight losses. On the other hand, UMass will be looking to end its current six-game losing streak.

Holy Cross has a strong inside game, with senior center Greg McCarthy (7.6 points and 4 rebounds per game) standing at 6-foot-11 and junior forward Eric Meister (6.6 points and 6.2 rebounds per game) coming in at 6-foot-8. The two may give the Minutemen a challenge with their lack of height and depth due to injuries. With Luke Bonner out – he is expected to play a few minutes Saturday against Kansas – the tallest player for UMass is 6-foot-9 true freshman Tyrell Lynch.

On offense, Kellogg says the Minutemen need to stay aggressive, just as they were against Boston College, especially with the defense the Crusaders play.

ence in our community," said Patrick.

Massachusetts Education Secretary Paul Reville said he was pleased with the governor's appointments.

"Charlie and Nancy bring not only deep expertise but many years of dedicated service to students. We look forward to working closely with them as we improve our 29 campuses," he said in the statement.

The office of UMass President Jack Wilson could not be reached for comment before deadline yesterday.

After a search for a new commissioner, the Board voted unanimously Friday to send the recommendation of former Northeastern University President Richard Freedland to Secretary Paul Reville, who will approve or reject it within a couple of weeks, according to Jonathan Palumbo, the communications director for the Executive Office of Education.

According to the statement, the 13-member Board includes the chair as well as eight additional gubernatorial appointments, the secretary of education and segmental representatives for the University, the state colleges and the community colleges.

San Jose creates virtual school

By Corinne Speckert
SPARTAN DAILY (SAN JOSE STATE U.)

Students may not be familiar with San Jose State University's school of library and information science because there is no physical building.

There is, however, a virtual one.

Anthony Bernier, an assistant professor for the school, said students don't need to commute or move to receive the benefits of the program because all courses, lectures and seminars are available online through course management systems, where students can log in to watch videotaped lectures.

"We have students who are all over the country – in fact, all over the world," he said.

This school, which is primarily online, gives graduate students an American Librarian Association accredited degree in librarianship upon graduation.

Dale David, an instructional technology assistant for the library program, said the school is about 95 percent online, and is represented in at least 10 states and six to 10 countries. He said a lot of their students aren't based in San Jose, which is why they started working with online education in 2000.

"It's an online system, so it allows us to experiment and we kind of do everything in-house," he said. "We don't rely on a lot of the university-level services, so it's pretty much a home-grown and home-maintained program."

Jeremy Kemp, a lecturer of the school, said it has had students involved in distance education for about a decade and has multiple online resources to accommodate different students' learning preferences.

"We use all these different tools, and they all get mixed into the pot of distance education tools," he said. "Each one of these tools has different methods and a different set of people it serves."

Bernier said the school looks for new ways to technically reach students, which is why two years ago they used a $30,000 grant from the George Soros Foundation to create its own college on an island in Second Life. Second Life is a 3-D, virtual world used as a social network by its users.

"Most of us never see our students physically, face to face, except maybe at graduation. But otherwise, Second Life is an example of an immersive environment," he said.

Bernier said Second Life offers students the personal interaction absent in online courses because they can virtually attend seminars when the professors are actually giving them. Students create their own avatars, or virtual students, which attend classes and school functions in Second Life.

"We were the first library school in the country to have our own island on Second Life," Bernier said. "We had a Halloween party that drew 250 people."

Short on cash, not giving, this season

By Kate DeVane

Despite economic hardship, holiday generosity is alive and well in the Pioneer Valley.

Local pastors have reported higher numbers of people requesting financial help as they struggle to make ends meet this winter.

Reverend Peter Kakos of Northampton's Edwards Church, whose congregation helps sponsor a free meals program, is looking to expand his church's involvement in the community.

"Thankfully, hope and love are not market-driven or subject to recession," said Kakos.

A number of organizations on and around the University of Massachusetts campus are also looking for ways to help, organizing charity events aimed at making the holiday season a little more joyful for those who otherwise might not have much reason to celebrate.

Two student organizations are working together to collect toys for needy children through Toys for Tots: the Veterans and Service Members Association (VASMA) and Alphi Phi Omega (APO), a co-ed community service fraternity.

"[We are] an RSO that helps to facilitate the transition from the military to the academic environment, by performing community service, social networking, and awareness and advocacy," said VASMA president Andrews Masciola.

"Every year, Lee Forester, a retired Marine who works at the Physical Plant, organizes the Toys for Tots drive with the local Marine unit at Westover," said Masciola. "Toys for Tots is a great program sponsored by the Marine Corps Reserve that helps to put presents under the Christmas trees of needy children."

Volunteers have been collecting toys at a table in the Campus Center concourse.

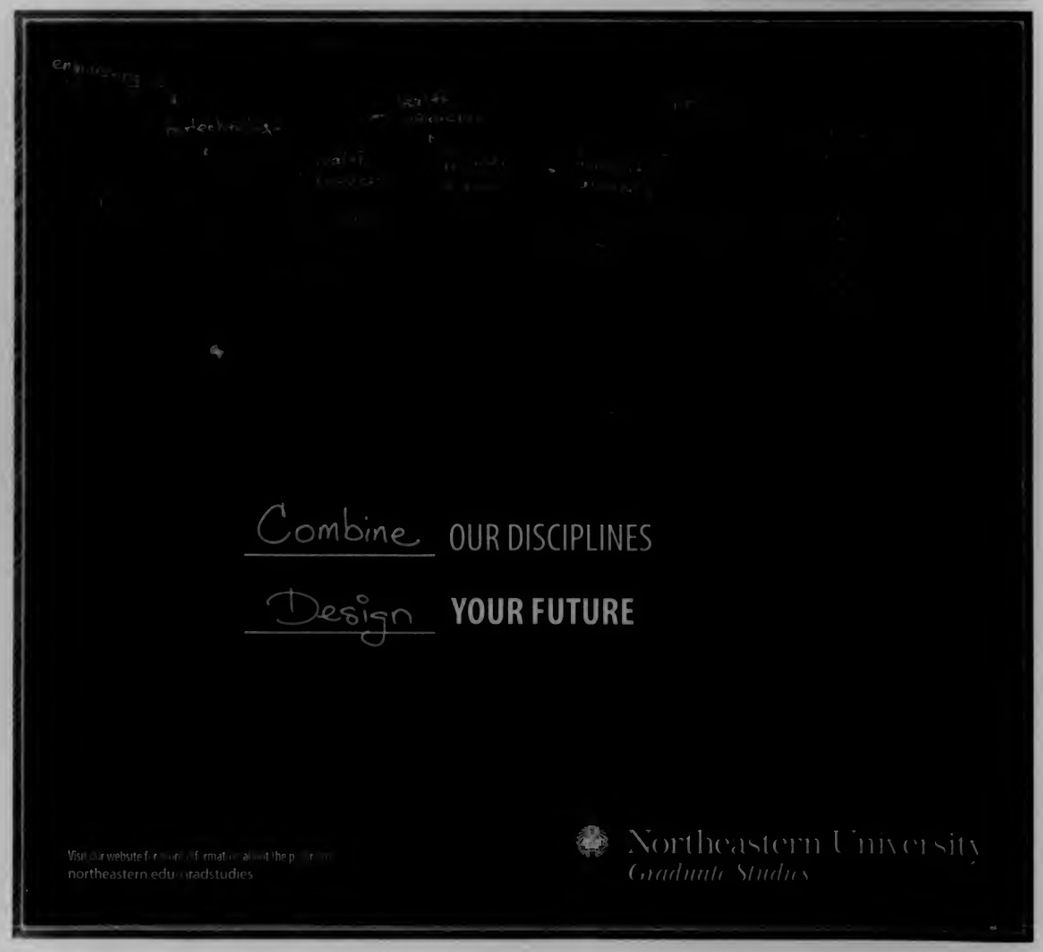
"We're going until Wednesday [today]," said APO Service Vice President Heather Forte. "We have someone from VASMA or APO there at all times [during the day]. We have a box where you can leave your toys or whatever your gift is."

"This is VASMA's third year participating, and we hope to continue in the future," added Masciola. "We enjoy doing community service projects like Toys for Tots as a way to give back to the community."

"It's pretty exciting to have it happen," said Forte. "We're hoping each year it will get bigger and bigger and that it will turn into an annual event for the campus."

The Pioneer Valley Transit Authority (PVTA) is also getting involved and will holding a food drive on December 19, from 9 to 3, at the Stop and Shop on King Street in Northampton.

"We're going to have a PVTA van there, and we're going to try to fill the van with food," said Jill Holliday, the PVTA's Director of Marketing. "All of the donations stay in the area and help people locally. We're grateful that Stop and Shop has allowed us to use their parking lot [for the event]."



Donations will go to the Northampton Survival Center, a local non-profit run largely by volunteers.

"We're an emergency food pantry that provides low-income residents of Hampshire county with free food, clothing and other household items," said Heidi Nortonsmith, the Survival Center's executive director. "We serve about 4,000 people and [give out] over $10,000 pounds of food a year. That's about 2,000 pounds a day."

Food collection boxes can also be spotted on busses in the UMass area, but those are not related to the Survival Center food drive, said Holliday. "I believe the UMass people [working for the PVTA] are doing that on their own."

A 'neuro-typical' way to cope

of her differences, and felt the rest of the world should be too."

For many siblings, the first step in the process is gaining a sense of understanding. When siblings realize why their brother or sister's behavior stands out, they begin to accept the responsibility of helping to guide them through a world that can often be frightening and very confusing for them.

"When I was about seven, I didn't really like him [Taylor] very much because I felt like he was mean," said 13-year-old Jace King, whose 20 -year-old brother, Taylor Cross, is autistic. "My mom explained to me that he was different and that he had some special talents, as well as some things that he wasn't so great at, and that was because of his autism."

"At first it didn't really register, because I was young and didn't really understand what autism was," continued King. "As I grew older we had more in common and we liked each other more, and I was able to understand how it affected him and how it made him a better person."

Hilary Snyder, 21, of Seekonk, whose brother Jeffrey is now 19 and has Asperger's syndrome, a mild form of autism, agreed.

"I really recognized he had a disability when he would act out on me and rip my hair out and he disruptive in the house," said Snyder. "I was about seven or eight when that started to happen, and I knew that it wasn't all because of him acting that way on purpose, he had reasons he was acting that way. I definitely grew up knowing that was his condition, and he acted a certain way because of it."

In this difficult setting, the siblings are often the ones who do what they can to be the good kids in order to tone down the amount of stress in the house. They try their best to make things less difficult for their parents.

"I became a super-achiever," said 55-year-old Beverly Horne of North Attleboro, who is now taking care of her 50-year-old autistic brother, Edward. "My way of getting my share of attention was to do well in school and in sports, and to be comical – that's how I coped."

Horne went on to explain that she tried her hardest to be nice to everyone she knew, in fear that otherwise people might make fun of her brother. She recalled always going to her friends' houses to play as a child, and not inviting friends to her house in case her brother created an uncomfortable situation.

"Some research indicates that if parents tell the siblings things such as 'don't worry … we'll take care of it,' that's not really a good thing to do," said Dr. Barry Prizant, director of Childhood Communication Services in Cranston, R.I., and an adjunct professor for the Center for the Study of Human Development at Brown University.

"On the other extreme, if they're told that essentially they have to be a third parent… that's not a good thing either," said Prizant. His research indicates that the best thing for parents to do is find a balance where siblings are given some age-appropriate responsibilities, but still recognize that siblings have lives of their own.

It's also become common knowledge that over time, as King and Bowers mentioned in their film, siblings tend to mature faster than children who do not have an autistic sibling. They tend to develop more compassionate qualities, and not to be as judgmental of other people.

"I've gained a sense of understanding and knowledge," said King. "When I look at people, instead of asking myself, 'what's wrong with them?' I ask myself, 'how can I help them?'"

Snyder is also able to reflect on what she has gained from having a sibling on the autism spectrum.

"A lot of my compassionate tendencies really come from the fact that I've had my brother my whole life," said Snyder. "Just from the fact that he's different and it's not his fault, and he needs to be accepted, and I try to spread that sentiment when I get the chance."

Republicans question automobile bailout

By David Lightman
(MCT)

WASHINGTON — Efforts to craft a $15 billion auto industry rescue plan stalled Tuesday as key Republican lawmakers raised serious questions about the package, but Democrats remained optimistic that they could get an agreement soon.

Democratic congressional leaders are pushing legislation to provide immediate help for General Motors Corp., Chrysler LLC and, potentially, Ford Motor Co., and to create a "car czar" with broad authority over how the money is spent and the companies are revamped.

A final agreement proved elusive, however, as Republicans raised questions about the extent of the overseer's authority and insisted on stronger action against car companies that get the money but still don't regain long-term financial health.

The Democratic plan "fails to achieve our goal of securing the long-term viability of ailing auto companies," said Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky.

All sides agreed on key principles. There appeared to be little dispute over creating an industry overseer or restricting executives' pay, curbing dividends and insisting that taxpayers be repaid first.

GM and Chrysler, which face bankruptcy, would get the aid immediately; Ford has said it doesn't need the money right away.

McConnell, who voiced his concerns in a Senate floor speech, and others wanted precise assurances that strong car companies would emerge from the effort.

McConnell said he couldn't back legislation "that provides the patient with taxpayer dollars yet doesn't (include) the commitment that the patient will change its ways so that future help isn't needed."

Sen. John Ensign, R-Nev., went further, saying that he was prepared to use procedural maneuvers to block the legislation if necessary. Such moves could mean that 60 Senate votes would be needed for action, which could

The developments were another bump in what's become a rocky road for Detroit's Big Three. They initially sought $25 billion in emergency aid last month; a plan that collapsed because members of Congress found that the Detroit executives lacked specific answers as to what they'd do with the money, and because they flew private jets to Washington to seek a bailout from stressed taxpayers.

The executives returned last week, this time asking for $34 billion and armed with detailed restructuring plans.

Democrats said Tuesday that their $15 billion plan continued to have some momentum, though they were growing frustrated.

"We cannot let a few people stop doing the people's business," Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., warned after his prediction Tuesday morning of an agreement "in the next few hours" proved to be wrong.

The White House sounded a similarly hopeful but cautious note. Spokeswoman Dana Perino praised "cooperation in spirit," but also said that Democrats must remember "our insistence that long-term viability be reflected in the legislation … (it) is something that we have held very strong feelings about, and that has not changed."

Harvard freezes staff hiring, salaries

By Christian B. Flow
The Harvard Crimson

A freeze on salary raises for all faculty and non-union staff members, as well as a hold on most searches for tenure-track and tenured faculty are among the cost-cutting measures announced Monday at Harvard University's Faculty of Arts and Sciences.

The measures were announced in a letter circulated to department chairs. It was signed by the top deans, and it also put forward a new, more restrictive set of guidelines for what sort of candidates will be considered for "essential" instructorships and visiting faculty positions.

The new policy marks a considerable departure from the stance outlined by FAS Dean Michael D. Smith at a Faculty meeting in November, when he told department leaders to go ahead with all current searches if applicant pools remained as strong as anticipated.

Citing a projected 30 percent drop in the university's endowment value this year, the deans wrote that the cost-cutting measures followed from a need to reduce the budget for the next fiscal year to levels at least $105 million below the current year's budget. The Faculty's budget for the fiscal year beginning on July 1, 2009 is set to be completed by March.

Department leaders were urged to keep news of the cuts quiet and withhold the information from colleagues until an official announcement at today's Faculty meeting. A copy of the letter was obtained by The Crimson yesterday evening.

The deans' letter re-confirmed Smith's earlier commitment to maintaining a system of tenure-track promotion, and left open the possibility for a "small number of exceptions" to the ruling against tenure-track searches – a hint of flexibility that some professors said was encouraging.

"Frankly, if the university were to shut down all expansion, all hiring, it would be a huge mistake in times like these, precisely when you need to be making smart investments and changing the university so that we're stronger," said biomedical engineering professor David A. Edwards.

Several professors, including Edwards, indicated yesterday that they had not yet read the letter, but that they were not taken aback by the measures it outlined, given the extent of the financial crisis.

"How could it be a surprise?" said comparative literature professor Ruth R. Wisse. "If there is a real budgetary slash, then obviously everybody has to bear their share of it in some way."

"The easiest thing to do is to stop making new hires rather than to try and fire people," she said.

In recognition of the difficult job market facing current graduate students, the deans also mentioned plans yesterday to develop a new position "akin to a teaching post-doc" for the university's crop of newly-minted Doctorate recipients. The deans also asked that recent Doctorate recipients, along with faculty from local institutions, be favored in situations where searches for non-ladder faculty instructors and visiting faculty are authorized as essential.

When asked why the deans requested that the news of the cuts be kept quiet until today, Smith wrote in an e-mailed statement, "I prefer to communicate directly with my faculty."

"The Faculty Meeting gives me that opportunity. It also allows them to ask questions and offer comments," Smith said.

Harvard's endowment – the largest in higher education – fell 22 percent in four months from its June 30 value of $36.9 billion, trumping the previous record loss of 12.4 percent in 1974, according to a letter from University President Drew G. Faust last week.

It was unclear yesterday how many faculty searches were pending and would be affected by the new policy. Faculty hiring has been in a "pause" period since April, when Smith informed professors that he was slowing down hiring to give FAS administrators a chance to take stock of how to move forward with their priorities.

Smith grounded staff hiring in late November, setting administrators the task of finding what "critical" positions would still be filled.

The FAS leader wrote yesterday that he planned to comment more extensively on the letter's policies in tomorrow's Faculty meeting.

"This must be a nightmare for people who have to make these decisions," said math professor Wilfried Schmid.

Talking to terrorists

Adam McGillen

To ensure the safety of our nation moving forward, Barack Obama will need the support of the American people on a divisive issue: speaking with nations known for harboring terrorists.

The election demonstrated how divided we are on this issue, with many claiming – with reason – that speaking to leaders like Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad equates to negotiating with terrorists, a policy that America rightly proposes to never adopt.

I stand whole-heartedly behind a policy of never negotiating with terrorists. Any attempt at debate would be foolish, for a terrorist possesses no reason and seeks only to silence opposing ideas through violence. The true terrorist, committed to an extreme doctrine, is quite devoid of humanity, and in fact resembles more of a parasite than a person. Unable to reason with an entity solely intent on destroying us, we have only one decision to make: kill or be killed. That is really no decision at all.

Yet, we must learn to distinguish the terrorist parasite from the host body of a nation where terrorists reside. Certain nations like Iran, Iraq and Pakistan possess ideal environmental conditions for the proliferation of the terrorist virus, but terrorists themselves exist as rogues. They carry only the flag of fear and violence.

To deal with the problem, we must be sure to separate the host body from the parasite within in our future dealings. The leaders of nations where terrorists live may not be the biggest fans of America, and to expect the world to love us entirely is childish, but we can never hope to win over their sympathy for the war on terror by simply using our military might recklessly.

The American involvement in Iraq demonstrates what an assault on a nation can cause when the real target is a rogue enemy. We need to be more delicate in our approach to the war on terror from here on out.

We must reserve military action to direct attacks on terror cells, avoiding costly and reckless invasions of entire nations. We must address such nations, sick with the terror parasite, with heavy doses of diplomacy. Yes, America needs to sit down with nations like Iran and demonstrate that all of humanity has a stake in eliminating organizations that resort to violence alone to achieve their ends.

Simply engaging in wars against entire nations undermines our ability to dismantle organizations like Al-Qaeda. Invasions, occupations and civilian casualties only breed anti-American sentiments and in fact boost terrorist ranks.

Unable to reason with an entity solely intent on destroying us, we have only one decision to make: kill or be killed.

By speaking to nations where terrorists reside, we can simultaneously improve our global image, garner cooperation in the elimination of true extremists, and demonstrate a real interest in peace. At best, diplomacy will open up doors that allow our forces to cross borders once locked to us and pinpoint attacks on terror cells untiringly committed to the destruction of America and the harming of civilians. At the very least, diplomacy will help soothe the hostile environment that breeds terrorist extremists.

The War on Terror is ultimately a war on an idea, and so must be fought with thoughtfulness. A bullet is a terrifying thing, and we will never defeat terrorism if our primary means reflects our enemy more than ourselves.

It's a fine line to walk, for I recognize the terrorist enemy's relentlessness and the necessity for armed combat to fend off those who will stop at nothing to destroy us. But, we must understand that bullets can kill terrible men, but they will never destroy the terrorist mentality.

The War on Terror possesses two fronts: a direct assault on the parasite of terrorist cells like Al-Qaeda, and a diplomatic soothing of environments where feverish anti-Americanism fosters terrorist ranks.

To successfully win this War on Terror, we need to present a unity of purpose on both fronts. We must support our troops in direct actions against the terrorists who would seek to recreate the horrific events of 9-11, and we must support our new President who has promised to open relations with nations we have not spoken with for some time. Locking out countries like Iran has done little to improve our situation. Entering a reasonable debate with nations like Iran will provide America with a stronger means to wage war on the idea of terrorism, the root from which extremists spring.

Like any argument, a unity of voice and body is necessary to achieve victory. If the body of the American people remains divided, Obama will enter relations with an empty voice. What good will his arguments be if the opposition can point to the people he represents, and demonstrate their unwillingness to pursue peace through diplomacy?

Terror is the common enemy of the world. To inspire a unity unafraid of terrorism in our world, we must begin by standing united within these states.

Talkin' 'bout my (e)generation

Katherine Marr

This past weekend, Amherst had its first snowfall of the season. In the good old days, students might have run up and down the dorm hallways, rounding up teams for a rousing snowball fight in the quad.

But what showed enormous popularity when the first flurries began falling was Facebook's "Snowball Wars!" Simply accept the Facebook application and, with the click of your mouse, you can send snowballs flying through cyberspace toward your "Friends."

I'll admit that there is a bonus to virtual snowballs – nobody ends up with ice melting down the inside of their jacket. Yet the very notion that we respond to actual snowfall with virtual snowball fights reflects the extent to which technology has changed how we think and associate with others.

In the past, concern about the effects of technology on young people was attributed largely to psychologists and parents. Psychologists focus on the ever-questionable link between violence and the media. And from the time that we were young children who sat inside on sunny days watching Nickelodeon, parents ordered, "Go outside and get some fresh air."

But now a prominent concern is technology's effect on everyday social interaction, and it's scientists who are doing the worrying.

The current generation of college students is a technologically-savvy bunch. After all, we aren't called the "digital natives" for nothing. We are never without our iPods, we alternate between updating our Facebook and MySpace pages, we kill time watching YouTube videos and we voice our opinions through online blogs.

Unlike older generations, also known as the "digital immigrants," we understand the allure of clicking through Facebook profiles, mesmerized with every new posting and picture. We can move our thumbs at warp-speed to dash off a text message. We may love technology, but it's not all fun and games.

We understand the allure of clicking through Facebook profiles, mesmerized with every new posting and picture.

Recent research indicates that heavy usage of digital technology has biological effects on the brain, which affect our social behaviors. Dr. Gary Small, a psychiatrist at UCLA, suggests that when our brains focus on more technologically-oriented tasks than face-to-face human interactions, our social skills take a nosedive.

Essentially, "real life" turns awkward. People become more comfortable with texting a friend in their hallway than walking two-doors down to talk in-person. When they do put down their phones and hang out together, they struggle to relate to one another or even read body language correctly. Sure, we can deftly decipher a colon and closed parenthesis as a smiley face, but interpret the facial expression of the person standing next to us? Technology may be clouding our judgments.

As if our relationships aren't enough, the extent to which we have integrated technology into our daily lives also affects how we learn, both independently and in the classroom. For instance, we do a lot of online reading. At first glance, it seems efficient enough – scroll down the page, scan your eyes across the glowing screen and you're good to go. Yet experts claim that online reading is "all about speed, gathering a lot of superficial information fast." How much do we really understand and absorb from scrolling through an online news blog versus reading a print newspaper, or using Britannica Online versus checking-out an encyclopedia from the library?

It should be no surprise that these personal habits seep into the classroom, and any educator who teaches sans a computer may very well be accused of living in the Stone Age. From junior high school to college, educators are discovering the necessity of integrating technology into lesson plans.

Now, technological aids are all well and good, but has it gone too far when technology is seemingly mandatory to get the attention and understanding of today's students? Even student tactics for eluding lectures are technologically-based; no longer are professors reprimanding students for staring blankly into space or whispering to friends, but rather for texting in class or using their laptops for Facebook versus Microsoft Word.

Naturally, there are people who glorify our reliance on technology, claiming that even our obsession with Facebook has its benefits. A recent study at the University of California, Irvine, determined that online social networking helps teens "learn valuable skills they'll need to use at work and socially in the digital age."

Examples given include understanding privacy online, what constitutes appropriate postings and the creation of a home page. Personally, I'm lacking confidence in this argument, considering A) users frequently log-onto and alter friends' profiles as a joke, B) Wall postings with correct capitalization and punctuation are rare and C) there is no shortage of unflattering and potentially compromising pictures on Facebook. I think we still have a ways to go.

Since the holiday season is in full-swing, many of us have wish lists that include something technologically-related – whether an iPhone, new computer or Wii game – that has potential to further isolate us from society. But maybe we should add a hat and gloves to that list, so at least we can enter civilization for a snowball fight or two.

Athletics and acceptance, win or lose

Matt Kushi

As Christmas draws near, it only seems fitting that this column be about a topic that we can draw inspiration from and learn from – a topic that can unite us with love rather than divide us with division.

We see many inspiring stories in the news every day, whether they be about a firefighter risking his life running into a burning building, or a police officer helping to protect a lost little kid. We see acts of humanity, such as someone raising money for a cancer foundation. There is another inspiring story that I would like to tell you about.

This story is one that is inspiring to all, as well. It is a feel good story that is really happening. The organization that I would like to bring to your attention is one that almost everyone has heard of: Special Olympics.

For those of you out there who don't know what Special Olympics is, it is an international non-profit organization founded in 1968 by Eunice Kennedy Shriver. It is an organization that allows people with intellectual disabilities to compete athletically in a way that is welcoming to them.

In this athletic atmosphere, winning is not the main objective. Simply being able to compete is enough for many of these kids. That mantra is portrayed in Special Olympics' motto, which reads, "Let me win, but if I cannot win, let me be brave in the attempt."

While Special Olympics may use sports as the basis of its program, it is so much more than athletics. It is a call to allow people with intellectual disabilities to lead a normal life. It makes it so that they are not looked at as different ,but rather as human. In the end, this story and this organization are not about sports; they are about a humanitarian cause and doing the right and decent thing in this world.

This story and this organization ... are about a humanitarian cause and doing the right and decent thing in this world.

What makes Special Olympics so inspiring is the fact that it opens a whole new world to those that may have had that door of hope shut on them previously due to who they were.

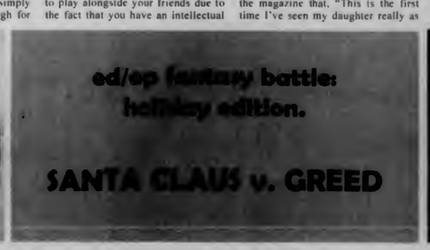
Put yourself in another person's shoes for a moment. Think about it. Imagine that you are a little boy or a little girl. You love the game of haskethall. Yet you are not allowed to play alongside your friends due to the fact that you have an intellectual disability. How would this make you feel? Pretty lousy, I'll bet.

What Special Olympics does is allow these kids to experience that thrill that their peers are able to take for granted. Here, within this organization, can someone experience the thrill of hitting a winning basket at the buzzer or emerging the victor at some game. Here they can take pride in throwing a perfect spiral in football or feeling the tingle in their foot after kicking a soccer ball. Here they can experience the simple thrill of the sound of a round ball striking a round bat and here they can experience the camaraderie with their fellow peers.

This joy is not only limited to the participant. Friends and family are deeply affected to this as well. In the latest edition of Sports Illustrated, there is an article about the Special Olympics. It is this article that inspired me to write these very words that you are now reading. Within this article there is a quote from a man who has just watched his daughter in athletic competition. This proud father told the magazine that, "This is the first time I've seen my daughter really as my daughter."

While that line may seem cruel, it is a line that takes some understanding to understand. When you know someone with an intellectual disability, you not only have to see them as a human, but you also see them as someone that depends on you for their care. You wish that they could do the things that you think they would want to do but they cannot.

I wish that there was an easy way to explain this, but there is not. Though I am part of such a situation, I simply cannot put it into words. Fortunately, in my case, I have always been able to see my brother as my brother and have him as one of my best friends but I also understand what this man is saying about his daughter.



While Special Olympics is, and always will be, a strong organization, it can always use your help. Many celebrities have donated their time, energy, and money into this cause. On top of all of the volunteers, people like Michael Phelps have worked with Special Olympics to help enhance the lives of some very special kids.

So in this time of thanks and of giving, give your thanks to those that help make this world a better place. So we give thanks to all of you who may not always win but are heroes to show the world that you are brave enough to try.

Boston Ballet carries on tradition

The Boston Ballet will perform "The Nutcracker" at The Opera House in Boston through the end of December. The ballet has been gaining increasing acclaim while becoming a tradition among people of all ages, many of whom attend the performance annually.

By Rebecca Babin
Collegian Staff

The holidays season is a time unlike any other of the year. People are a little more giving, a bit more cheerful, and some, a little more stressed.

It is the traditions that people share during the holidays that make it such a special time. For some, it is decorating the tree and fighting over who gets to place the Father Christmas or Angel at the very top. For others, tradition may mean building that first snowman with the whole family on the front lawn.

Meanwhile, for many, it is going to see "The Nutcracker" that rings in the holiday season.

There are some people out there who equate "The Nutcracker" with childhood memories of being stuffed into stockings and a puffy dress or miniature suit and tie, and being forced out into the cold to go sit in a theatre.

But the magic created after the lights go down makes it all worth it. As a child, this tradition is one that was believed and long looked forward to. As you got older, however, and stopped feeling the magic, became too busy, too cool, or grew tired of it, the tradition was eventually abandoned.

This year, the Boston Ballet has created the spark that not only children can enjoy, but people from every walk of life.

This year is the year to reconnect with "The Nutcracker" tradition.

The outside of the Boston Opera House, home to the Boston Ballet this season, is deceptive, due to the immense construction next door, but parading through the doors, one comes to realize that it is the most ideal location for "The Nutcracker".

The Opera House is reminiscent of another time, with high and ornate ceilings, embellished with gold moldings, lined with crimson, both rich and festive, and seats of plush red velvet, perfect for the Victorian setting of "The Nutcracker".

An accommodating usher guides audience members to their seats, where they sit in anticipation, skimming their programs and listening to the ballet's overture.

The audience was diverse in age, full of the usual parents or grandparents with children and ballet teachers with their students, but looking around, it comes as a surprise to see teenagers and college students, some with their friends and some obviously on a very special date.

Anyone wearing jeans is sure to be underdressed as the ballet's patrons are commonly adorned in stylish cocktail dresses and smart suits. The room is alive with excitement as the lights dim, the live orchestra winds up, and the curtain rises.

Unveiled is the inside of a Victorian party room of the Silberhaus' and their two children, Fritz and Clara.

Complete with furniture and a gigantic Christmas tree, the set is nothing short of realistic and beautiful.

As characters flood the stage and the party begins, spectators become captivated by the striking colors of the sets, the vivid images of fellow audience members, and the voluminous costumes of the young women that billowed around them with every twirl.

In comes the mysterious Uncle Drosselmeir with presents and entertainment for all. Dressed outrageously in a purple suit and eye patch, he commands the attention of the audience with his animation.

He first brought in life-size boy and girl dolls, who perform as if they have been wound up like real dolls just before being carried onstage.

Then an enormous stuffed bear bounces around the stage with ease and Drosselmeir shows his niece Clara what is truly in store for her. He presents her with a small wooden nutcracker. Little did she know, she would be taken on a trip of her dreams.

As guests departed and the party drew to a close, Clara fell asleep next to her toy nutcracker – and it was then that the real magic began.

As the toys from her party spring to life, so does her imagination. The typical sets are replaced with a distorted and grandiose version of the living room, where life-size toy soldiers and mice battle to the death.

As the music blares and pace increases, the dream that is being created seems to spin out of control.

Before blinking an eye, Clara's nutcracker came to life and whisked her away from the inside of her living room to a snowy forest.

The snow scene is absolutely flawless.

The costumes are perfectly designed to create the mood of swirling snow as the Corps de Ballet dance across the stage.

Both the Snow Queen's tutu and her performance sparkle as every pirouette and arabesque go off without a hitch.

As the music speeds up and the snow falls faster, so does the footwork of the dancers, which remain polished and graceful.

As tutus swirl like a tury of snow, a boy art balloon arrives to bring Clara to the Land of Sweets, and thus comes the end of the first act.

Amidst years of seeing and dancing "The Nutcracker" never does one experience such an engaging first act.

In many versions, it is basically acted, based with very little dancing. The emphasis is on the story, which is very important, but it sometimes translates into borderline uninteresting.

The Boston Ballet not only expertly portrays the story but does so with grace while engaging the audience.

Party adults and children alike who have stood like statues on the stage in other versions, whip around the stage while show-me-up their unbelievable skill.

There are comedic characters, like a confused pair of grandparents, who have the audience laughing – a rare sound at the ballet.

The Boston Ballet implemented many creative solutions and alternatives to make a classic something shiny and new for someone who has experienced the show a hundred times over.

As intermission came and went, the audience found itself wondering if the second act could match the first – and of course it did.

In the Land of Sweets that any child would dream of, animated characters grow. Clara and performed for her.

A Spanish trio of two male dancers and their senorita fly around the stage lively and energetically. Their jumps have amazing height and are full of fun.

Next, the lights dim to set the mood for an Arabian Pa De Deux (dance of two). Usually the least favorite of the second act, the dance took practically everyone's breath away.

The pair's strength and flexibility is truly remarkable. It is sleek, sensual, and seductive, making it impossible to take your eyes away from the stage for a single second.

They are followed by an impossibly fast version of a Chinese Pa De Deux. The pair is accompanied by a fleet of Boston Ballet School children dancing with authentic umbrellas.

The children of the Boston Ballet School were fantastic – not only in this piece but throughout the show. They demonstrate their excellent training and technique while having fun.

Two female shepardesses and a male shepard dance a playful Pastorale like they have just left the fields with their sheep.

A black sheep among the five white sheep keep the audience laughing. The interchange is delightful and breezy, something hard to accomplish while dancing this long piece.

Next three Russians leave jaws on the floor and have the audience blown away with their shows, gigantic jumps and quick turns.

It is the lead Russian dancer who commands the attention of the room as he seems to spring off a trampoline with each jump off the floor.

Throughout the show, the women of the Boston Ballet were far outperforming the men in technique, but it was these men that were the exception.

A sea of flowers grace the stage in costumes fashioned like green stems and pink petals. Flowers, with gorgeous music and an outstanding ballerina as the Dewdrop Fairy, are a simple and elegant way to lead up to the Grand Pa de Deux to follow it.

The Boston Ballet reordered the second act by putting the Sugar Plum Fairy after the Grand Pa de Deux, instead of its usual spot at the start of Act II.

As a dancer, one is astonished that Lia Cirio, who danced the part, could even breath, let alone point her feet by the end of the series.

After the immensely taxing Grand Pa that was full of captivating lifts, top-like turns and movements that attested to her strength, it was so surprising to see her come back out onstage to dance the exasperating Sugar Plum Fairy just moments later.

She pulled off this death combination flawlessly, taking each step with ease, something unbelievable hard to accomplish.

As all dreams must end, so must a ballet. When it did, the audience was left feeling overwhelmed by the beauty and creativity of the Boston Ballet. Feelings of nostalgia were also rendered as the tradition of seeing "The Nutcracker" had passed for the year, and die-hard fans will have to endure another year before seeing it again.

To those who think "The Nutcracker" is only for children and dancers, be advised that this is one of the most unlikely experiences to have in college, which makes it so amazing.

Take the opportunity to get dressed up, have fun, and appreciate the artistry of Boston Ballet's Nutcracker this year.

Countdown of year's finest in music world

By Haley Navarro
Collegian Staff

Like all years in music, there were hits and there were misses. While most of the hits were mainstream albums, it doesn't mean that there weren't honorable mentions in the lesser-known alternative.

As we progress in technology, most artists are getting more creative and record companies seem to be supporting this. As 2008 comes to a close, it will be interesting to see what the New Year will seek out next.

1.) Lil' Wayne - "The Carter III"

Even those who are not fans of Dwayne Michael Carter Jr. have to admit: the man is crafty. After 2005's "The Carter II," Lil' Wayne only released mixtapes and did guest vocals for other artist's songs. "The Carter III" was supposed to be released in 2007, but after it was leaked online, Lil' Wayne went back to the drawing board and created an entirely new album.

With producers such as Cool & Dre, Rohin Thicke, Kanye West and Bangladesh and guest vocals from Jay-Z, T-Pain and Babyface, this album was set up for nothing but success.

And success it was: "The Carter III" sold over a million copies in its first week, and for a struggling industry, this was a big deal. The album spawned such singles as "A Milli," "Mr. Carter" and "Got Money," which were all well-received by the public. Wayne also showed off his lyrical skills: "Got summer hatin' on me 'cause I'm hotter than the sun/Got spring hatin' on me 'cause I ain't never sprung."

And as always, Lil' Wayne speaks about issues such as 'syrup', having money, and women. Though some of the topics may be new, he keeps the same attitude throughout the entire album. "Long hair, don't care."

2.) Lady GaGa - "The Fame"

When Lady GaGa seemed to burst onto the pop music scene with her waist-long, platinum blonde hair and cat suits, the public welcomed her with open arms. She originally got into the music business by performing in dance clubs in New York City and was discovered when she was nineteen years old.

Lady GaGa, whose real name is Joanne Stefani Germanotta, is a stage name which is an ode to Queen, tread: Radio Ga-ga-a) Lady GaGa is probably most famous for her single, "Just Dance" which really is just a club song about getting drunk and loving things, such as your shirt.

In the bigger picture, "Just Dance" has a good beat, addicting hook and background vocals from Akon. Internationally, it's a hit, so nobody can really argue with that. Lady GaGa is also notable for her singles "Poker Face" and "Beautiful Dirty Rich." "Poker Face" is a clever homage to putting up a front while in love; "And after he's been hooked/I'll play the one that's on his heart." Also a songwriter, Lady GaGa has written for Britney Spears' latest album and Interscope label-mates, New Kids on the Block. As someone who refers to songs as "records" and designs most of her attire, there is seemingly a bright future for Lady GaGa.

3.) Cansei de Ser Sexy - "Donkey"

With a band name that means "tired of being sexy" in Portuguese, labeling this band as "fun" is an understatement. "Donkey" is the sophomore follow-up to their self titled CD, which had the single "Music is my hot, hot sex" in an iTunes commercial.

At a concert in Boston in August 2008, Lovefoxxx, the lead singer, announced to the crowd "This is the iTunes music!" before beginning their well-known single.

"Donkey" is a little bit more serious piece of music than their first release. Topics in the songs include love and spousal abuse, whereas before it was mainly about partying.

And though they might be taking a more 'serious' look into their music, they still managed to create a very listenable dance album. Hailing from Brazil, CSS is mostly popular in America. Notable tracks on the album include "I left Behind" and "Believe Achieve."

4.) Kanye West - "808's and Heartbreak"

After 2007's "Graduation," Kanye West had many of expectations to surpass.

His latest album is primarily about – you guessed it – a break-up. The numbers in the title, "808" refers to a synthesizer, (Roland TR-808 drum machine.) This album is a little bit darker than his previous work and takes a couple listens.

The first single "Love Lockdown" isn't the best representation of the album as a whole, but the second single, "Heartless" can define every other song in just a few minutes. "See You in My Nightmares" is undoubtedly the best track on the album, with a little help from guest vocals from Lil' Wayne. Since everything else on the album is electronic, Kanye West decided to match his voice to fit the music. He uses auto-tune to make his singing voice electronic, a technique made popular by T-Pain and Peter Frampton. For the most part, Kanye barely raps on this album and dedicates most of his vocals to singing. While this is a new and different approach, one can only hope that Mr. West soon returns to rapping.

Lil' Wayne had an impressive year with the release of his latest album, "The Carter III," which rendered hit songs like "Mr. Carter" and "Got Money."

Winter fashion guide: from A to Z

By Rebecca Babin, Julie Holbrook, Ellie Rulon-Miller, and Heather Waxman
Collegian Staff

Accents from the attic

Back in your elementary days, the thought of resembling great grandma Rose would have sent you running for cover. This holiday season, however, feel free to take some liberties. If it's to grandmother's house you go, poke around in her closet or long-forsaken junk trunk in the attic. You'll be pleasantly surprised at the one-of-a-kind fashion artifacts you'll discover!

Boho Inflections

While the bohemian look has certainly had its ups-and-downs throughout the past few seasons, it has recently settled into a more subdued position. Feather-stamped wrap-around headbands, billowy tops, or extra-long-and-layered necklaces are all you need to spice up an otherwise bland outfit!

Colorful tights

Yes, it seems as though these beauties are here to stay – and it's a good thing! Want to prolong your favorite summer dress through the winter months? Slap on an extra-long cardigan and a pair of brightly colored tights and your wishes will come true! Head on over to A.P.C. or Express and you can find an endless selection of them at a penny-pinching deal.

Drop and Give Me 20!

We first saw menswear inch its way into women's wardrobes via tuxedo-inspired vests throughout summer and transitioning into fall. Now that wintertime is in full swing, we can look forward to more of it in the form of military-style blazers and pea coats. They tend to speak volumes on their own, so pair sparingly with sleek black trousers and a pair of calf-hugging boots.

Egging You On

Jewel tone hues effortlessly carry over into the icy cold months. Eggplant's dark, rich color goes well with all skin tones, and its sultry nature makes it a cinch to dress up a pair of dark denim jeans. Whether it's a billowy top, a small clutch, or an oversized ring, make sure to rock just one eggplant item so the hue can make its own statement.

Feathers

We're not sure how long this trend will stick around, but for now, it's passing with flying colors. Whether they're hand-sewn on a small purse, perched atop a headband, dangling from a long necklace or suspending from a pair of earrings, feathers are causing quite a breeze. They are a great way to get a touch of bohemian flare.

Boho accents like this headband add style to any outfit.

Gloss Yourself!

Sparkle and shine seems to keep reinventing itself with the progression of each season, and this winter has proved to be no different. A smooth, metallic sheen on a holiday mini dress, biker jacket, or pair of leggings gives your outfit a subtle, extra dose of zest. Pair grey with silver metallic and brown with gold metallic for the guaranteed attention you deserve!

Headbands for the Holidays

Try having some fun with your hair this winter. It's boring to leave it hanging straight! Jazz it up with an embellished headband. Whether beaded, jeweled, feathered, or adorned with a bow, headbands take any style from drab to fab. Pair a headband with a curled pony tail, teased up-do or braids. No matter what you choose, your hair will become instantly trendy with the addition of practical headgear.

Plaid dresses, shirts, and jackets are rocking this winter.

"Influence"

This new book, courtesy of Mary-Kate and Ashley Olsen, should be a must-have for every girl. The now-older and more mature Olsen twins interview some of the world's most influential designers, including Diane von Furstenburg. The book avoids cliché questions and gets down to the dirt of fashion. If you appreciate fashion, photography, and culture, this the perfect winter read for you!

JCPenney

This department store has really been stepping up their game lately by trying to market to a penny-pinching, fashion-forward crowd looking for chic additions to their wardrobe. I "Heart" Ronson, by world-renowned Charlotte Ronson is set to debut in spring 2009. The line has everything a girl needs including blouses, knits, jeans, tees, dress, skirts, jackets, and belts. The collection is very feminine with Ronson's signature vintage flair. Not to mention every piece is under $65!

Katie Holmes

Sweet to sexy and all done stylishly. Motherhood surely suits Katie. She is more glamorous now then ever before, and has quickly taken her place as a style icon. Her edgy haircuts are a quick copy for women everywhere; as are the trends she creates, like her jeans-only attitude while she parades the streets of NYC. With a different pair every day, ranging from boyfriend to skinny, she knows how to rock denim like no other.

Leather Rocks!

Punk rock, biker chic – whichever style you choose - leather jackets of all types and colors have become a staple this season. Paired with a cocktail dress, you're ready for a holiday party. Accompanied by a pair straight leg denim jeans, a t-shirt, and metallic heels, you're ready for a night on the town.

Make-up on the Mind

What's hot for make-up trends this winter? Smoky eyes and glowing skin! Smoky eyes are easy to accomplish if you pick up an eye shadow pallet like Cover Girl's four-colored one, for a measly $5, which yields Chanel-worthy results! A pallet with predetermined colors will take the guesswork out of it. Even though a sun kissed look is months away, brighten your complexion by investing in a good bronzer and blush combination. Try Physician's Formula for $13 – it lasts for months!

Night and Day

Look sharp in black and white by rocking the hot tuxedo look. The penguin suit is back this winter and it couldn't come at a better time, considering the first snow just hit the ground. Whether as a clutch, on your shoes, as a sexy halter top, a cocktail dress, or pants suit, there is no way to look more classic and fashion forward than by capturing this sharp look.

Off-the-Shoulder

A simple, off-the-shoulder line is not only flattering to your limbs, but the collar bones too. Try amping it up with a stud-lined t-shirt, often seen on celebrities like Hills' hottie Lauren Conrad! Pair an off-the-shoulder, boyfriend fit sweater with skinny jeans and peep-toe heels and you've just created the perfect winter look!

Plaid

Plaid is back with a major vengeance this season – particularly in winter jackets. It's also famous in flannel, another staple in the cold seasons. What's great is that it comes in a variety of colors, though red plaid is the most popular. It goes well with just about anything, and looks fierce with a killer pair of boots!

Question

Do these alphabet-themed fashion items look cute on me?"

Reinvent

Don't have enough money to buy that oh-so-trendy North Face fleece? No worries, you can still rock last season's stylish items by putting your own creative twist on them. Not only will you save what money you have, but you'll be drowning in compliments on your unique style while everyone else follows your lead!

Scarves

Never before have scarves been such a major part of a person's wardrobe. This season, the most popular are afghan-inspired ones, worn loosely around the neck. Though most often paired with a peacoat, the afghan scarf goes well with almost anything. They also come in a variety of styles and colors, and it's easy to find inexpensive ones. Try Newbury Comics for scarves to match your alternative style, or even Target for something a little more practical.

Katie Holmes' style is one to keep an eye on this winter.

Tim Gunn

Host of successful television shows like "Project Runway" and most notably "Tim Gunn's Guide to Style," Mr. Gunn is easily the most stylish gentleman in the public eye – and the most knowledgeable when it comes to fashion. He's charming and intelligent, like the well-dressed uncle you wish you had. His natural eye for style has brought him to the top in the world of fashion, and he's one of the most credible voices on all things involving personal style.

Un Chapeau

Oh yes! Berets – the most famous of all French apparel – are a must-have accessory for the winter months. Nothing gives an outdoor winter outfit such sophistication as a beret, and they're available in all colors, designs and materials and can be worn in an endless number of ways. Whether you want to keep your head warm or just look super stylish and chic, the beret is the perfect accessory!

Vroom Vroom!

Tired of your old, boring leather jacket? Lucky for you, the biker look is a huge trend for the winter months – minus the huge shoulder pads. Up do any leather, whether it be jackets or gloves with some great strap and buckles. And it doesn't stop there. Biker boots can give any ensemble that perfect edgy-ness you're looking for.

What Not To Wear

This TLC program is a must-see for fashionistas. Fashion gurus Stacy London and Clinton Kelly take one ensemble-challenged person and turn them into a portrait of style and sophistication. They teach give the viewers and contestants some vital fashion pointers like dressing for your body type, what colors work for your skin tone, and how to rock a look with confidence. Catch it Friday nights at 9 p.m. on TLC

Xgfashion.com

This website is the best place to get the perfect accessory for the winter months. They have a great variety of DY Touch Handbags and wallets, and elegant charms. You can even add that perfect pizzazz to your purchase with their customizing option. This is best place for gifts for friends or something special for yourself.

Yarn

It's not just for your grandmother's needle point anymore. Knitwear is one of the trendiest and most practical ways to keep yourself warm through the winter months. Knits can be anything from sweaters to dresses to scarves to hats.

Zebra Stripes

A huge trend for winter fashion is the zebra stripe and the print can be seen on almost anything. shirts, purses, jackets, and even shoes. Don't opt for the typical black and white – do it up with some brightly colored zebra stripes. And it doesn't stop at just fashion – zebra striped cell phone cases are out there, too!

Ask Gwen: your exclusive advice authority

Hello, readers!

It's the holiday season once again and, for a lot of us, that means finals, parties and shopping!

I know many of our wallets have been hurting this year, but that doesn't mean we should forego the shopping fun altogether. After all, that is the best part, right?

Finding the best bargains on beauty products can be tricky, and you have to know where to look. Sometimes you just need a little push in the right direction – and that's where I come in!

I decided to put together a little budget beauty guide for you, my precious penny pinchers!

Whether you're searching for the perfect gift for your mother or your best friend (even a little something for yourself!), this guide will give you some great ideas – all without breaking the bank!

There is this long-standing rumor out there that beauty products are only good if they're expensive. This one is false on so many levels, and I'm here to prove it!

Recently, while shopping at a department store cosmetics counter, the sales lady informed me that the L'Oreal brand, commonly found in any drugstore, is just as good as the premium products she was selling. I found this to be a bit odd, considering she was telling me this while I was sampling her company's makeup. I ended up buying her products anyway – so, perhaps it was a very sly sales technique! Either way, I learned that price is not indicative of quality.

So, what are some of the best drugstore brands when it comes to cosmetics? As previously mentioned, heading the pack is L'Oreal – especially when it comes to foundation. It rivals any of the major department store cosmetics for a fraction of the cost.

Rimmel is another brand making a lot of waves lately. It is just as hip and cutting-edge as brands like M.A.C. and Urban Decay, but without the higher price tag. Not only does Rimmel make great products, but their website is definitely worth checking out. The Virtual Makeover Tool allows you to try out different looks. So, go to www.rimmellondon.com and check out what looks best on you!

So, what if you are satisfied with your own makeup brands, but you are still searching for that perfect gift? Beauty-inspired bundles will make that special someone happy.

Check out Benefit cosmetics for their special gift sets, all perfectly priced for the budget conscious! Is there a woman in your life who is obsessed with lip gloss? Then why not satisfy her craving with Benefit's Peace, Love & Glossiness Lip Gloss set? It comes with six glosses in this season's most popular colors – all for only $26.

What about that friend who is a freelancer with eye shadow, always going for that one-of-a-kind look? Grab the Benefit Limited Edition Primpcess Eye Primping Kit for only $34! This special kit includes products to conceal, line, contour and brighten those pretty peepers. It also comes with multiple brushes and a step-by-step instruction guide! Benefit cosmetics can be found at your local Sephora or Macy's.

Still need ideas? The Bath & Body Works brand has long been the "go-to" for last-minute, frustrated gift givers. This year, why not make it your first stop and relieve the stress?

Spa comforts abound at Bath & Body Works this year, with the introduction of the new Shea Cashmere, part of the True Blue Spa line.

Check out the True Blue Spa Pampering Foot Set, which includes Shea Cashmere Foot Cream and Perfect Blend Knit Socks, with a price tag of only $25. Your feet – or that special someone's feet – will be thanking you all season long. Oh, why not? Buy a set for yourself, too!

What about a product that helps heal dry hands and restore them to their natural beauty? The Beauty Queen Wave moisturizing gel gloves from True Blue Spa work wonders, especially when used in conjunction with the Look Ma, New Hands Lotion. Wear overnight or for a quick 20-minute spa treatment. Both products are found at Bath & Body Works for less than $25.

Hopefully, you are now bursting with perfect present ideas, so I will just leave you with this until next semester: Happy Holidays and Have a BEAUTY-ful New Year!

Ten best records of the year

5.) Chromeo - "Fancy Footwork: Deluxe Edition"

A re-release of their 2007 CD "Fancy Footwork," the deluxe edition has all of the original songs as before, except with 10 remixes of those songs. The delightfully electronic album, which is reminiscent of the 80's in most of the songs, is a plus with all of the remixed songs. The MSTRKRFT remix of "Tenderoni" is the best of all the remixes. As for the original songs, they are fine as is, the remixes only provide a reiteration of them to begin with. "Bonafied Lovin' (Tough Guys)," "Call me Up" and "Momma's Boy" are highlights of the album.

6.) The Cool Kids - "The Bake Sale"

After releasing many mixtapes and LPs, Chuck Inglish and Mikey Rocks (nee Antoine Reed and Evan Ingersoll,) released their first full-lenth LP under Chocolate Industries.

The songs, which were mostly released on their mixtapes and the internet, have been re-mastered for a cleaner, fuller effect. In "Mikey Rocks," the bass line originally is harsh and too loud, but on the new release, it was re-designed to be just as the artists intended it to be, but with a smoother feel. The duo's most known single "Black Mags" is also present on the CD. It's best known for being alongside Sara Bareilles' "Love Song" in a Rhapsody commercial.

Overall, the 10-song LP is a firm representation of the hip-hop duo, and offers a glimpse into what kinds of music is to come from them.

7.) Jack's Mannequin - "The Glass Passenger"

Jack's Mannequin, with members formerly of Something Corporate, has delivered another diverse album. As previously mentioned, their first single, "The Resolution" did well in terms of radio play and promotion, with the video partially directed by Stephenie Meyer of the Twilight franchise. The remainder of the album is extremely listenable piano rock, and mostly upbeat songs. This album could be described as relaxing or driving music. Highlights include "What Gets You Off," "Bloodshot" and "Annie Use Your Telescope." At times, Andrew McMahon's voice does tend to be a little overbearing in relation to the sometimes-tranquil music, but all in all, the album proves to be the one to sing along to in your car.

8.) MGMT - "Oracular Spectacular"

Most journalists refer to MGMT's musical styling as psychedelic or having to do with drugs.

MGMT in theory did create a "psychedelic" album, but for the most part, it's highly marketable and infectious. Their two most successful singles, "Kids" and "Electric Feel" have been covered by various other artists such as Katy Perry. The remainder of the album could be alternatively subjective: either dance-y or background music. And while all music is subjective, listeners should just take MGMT with a grain of salt and disregard any of the labels to just enjoy the music.

And for those who are wondering, their band name is pronounced "Management."

9.) Santogold - "Santogold"

Santi White could best be described as the American M.I.A., just as Yelle was dubbed the French version.

With such similarities to the Sri-Lanken rapper as wardrobe taste and production, (Diplo,) it's easy for fans of M.I.A. to easily adjust to Santogold. Her music has been featured on Converse commercials and Gossip Girl, so there's no turning back. She's an opening act for Coldplay's "Viva La Vida" tour. Deceptively, Santogold is 32 years old, which makes her listeners wonder what her music would've been like at an earlier age.

But with age comes wisdom, and her debut album is widely received. Her singles "Creater" and "L.E.S. Artistes" offer a good introduction to the latest Diplo dub.

10.) Natalie Portman's Shaved Head - "Glistening Pleasure"

Don't let the band's name mislead you – they actually make really fun dance music.

While their name could imply metal music, they are just the opposite. With electronic background music that's comparable to Gravy Train!!!!, it's hard to get some of these songs out of your head.

However, this band keeps it a little more PG-13. In addition to being fun, this band is also sarcastic. With songs like "Me + Your Daughter," "Sophisticated Side Ponytail" and "Beard Lust," listeners really can't go wrong. Unless they don't like dance music.

Signed to Sup Pop labels, Natalie Portman's Shaved Head fits right in with their label mates, which include CSS, The Go! Team and Flight of the Conchords.

Going green: Campus initiatives lead way for greener communities

In an effort to conserve energy, college students are urging people to go green by encouraging such practices as the use of fluorescent light bulbs.

By Carrie Wells
Mc Carthy-Tr

In a little more than a year, Carly Queen's organization has succeeded in digging a community garden, gathering professors to lecture about sustainability and holding a sustainable fashion show featuring recycled clothes.

Queen, the president and founder of Students Organizing for Sustainability at Georgia Tech University, is a part of a rapidly growing movement for clean energy and sustainable practices that has taken hold on college campuses. Colleges and universities are often the leaders and innovators in the fight against climate change, and the movement often unites students, professors and administrators.

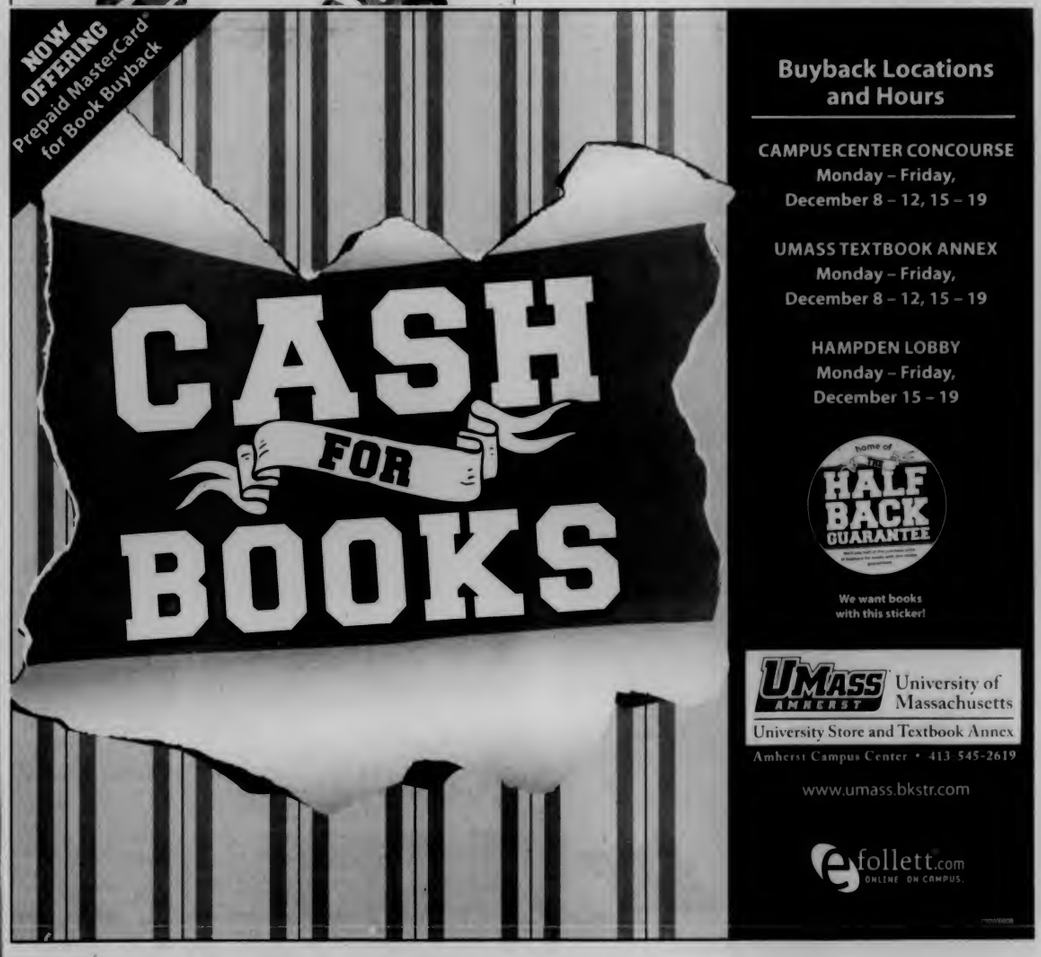
"I am an optimist because I believe that there is still time to change the future," Queen said. "I believe life on earth in the next 50 years can be much better than it is now, for everyone. I do know that I could not live with myself if I didn't feel that I was having a positive impact in some meaningful way."

The ways in which universities, communities raise awareness or reduce their carbon footprint are often creative. Students at the University of Mississippi erected 30 nine-foot-tall windmills on the campus before it hosted the first presidential debate. Getting rid of trays in dining halls – also becoming popular. Wartburg College in Waverly, Iowa saved 99 pounds of solid food, 20 gallons of liquid and 289 pounds of total product in one day by getting rid of trays.

Some universities, including Harvard, are offering classes in sustainable building or policy making. Dickinson College is investing in green and community development funds. Colorado State University has a "biomass boiler" that, by burning woodchips, uses half the energy of natural gas.

Kassie Rohrbach, the co-director of operations and co-founder of Power Vote, a green-minded group, said young people were the first cheerleaders and the movement is growing rapidly.

"The youth climate movement has been building for the last eight years and it's the largest it's ever been," Rohrbach said. "Young people have known it's an important issue for a number of years now and now public awareness is becoming broader."



The College Sustainability Report Card, released in September, surveyed 300 schools nationwide and identified 15 schools whose efforts earned an "A+". The Sustainable Endowments Institute, the report card's publisher, attributed improving scores to student activism and student activism.

"I really feel that the youth needs to be seen as a valid constituency with real concerns," said Cheryl Klarer, an organizer from the Power Action Coalition and a recent Southern Illinois University-Carbondale graduate. "We make up 20 percent of the electorate, if not more, and hope to get in office and be successful we need to pay attention to the youth."

Klarer, 23, works with students in southern Illinois, western Kentucky and southeastern Indiana, helping them to form groups, register to vote and pressure their local councils to act.

"All throughout our lives, we as boys and girls, people are so apathetic. But it's actually very far from the truth," said Klarer.

The Campus Environmental Report Card, which surveyed 10 schools nationwide on April, found many universities were doing admirable things and many were receiving. said Kevin Tuerff, a spokesman for the schools that responded. "I believe and their technology departments were the primary [schools] for other areas," said Tuerff.

Strong future ahead for Sowry, UMass

The 2008 Massachusetts field hockey team was not supposed to be this good. Not yet, at least.

The program, which had been the class of the Atlantic 10 for years, was going through a rough spot when UMass coach Justine Sowry was brought in during 2007 to replace coach Patty Shea.

Coming in, Sowry knew that it would take time to rebuild the program at UMass and start going back to what it was used to doing: winning A-10 championships.

The team was prepared for a transition period. It lasted one game.

After losing the season opener, the Minutewomen tallied three consecutive wins en route to capturing the A-10 crown and reaching the NCAA tournament.

It was a fairy tale season.

But as soon as the Cinderellas got comfortable in their glass slippers, it seemed like the clock struck midnight on their newfound success. The majority of the team's defenders, the backbone of the team, graduated, leaving the team with only three seniors and a lot of unanswered questions.

Nick O'Malley

Will the defense be able to recover? Will the offense be able to pick up the slack? Will the young team be able to keep its composure?

The team was prepared for a transition period, again. It lasted one game, again.

After losing the season opener (again), the Minutewomen tallied three consecutive wins (again) en route to capturing the A-10 crown (again) and reaching the NCAA tournament (again).

It was a young, talented powerhouse that every team in the conference saw coming, but couldn't stop.

The defense, which was expected to be a shadow of itself a year ago, not only maintained its level of play, but improved, albeit slightly. UMass, which gave up 1.08 goals per game in 2007, surrendered only 1.04 per game in its 2008 campaign.

After so much turnover, it seemed as though every player on the defense had a breakout season. The Minutewomen featured a new starting goalkeeper and three new starters among the defensive back. What they got by season's end were and All-American, two All-Conference rookies and an A-10 tournament MVP.

Sophomore Jaime Bouzarovis was the team's only returning defensive starter from 2007. As to who would join her as the team's new backbone, coach Sowry turned to three players that weren't even in the conversation a year ago: a transfer, a freshman and a former forward.

A sophomore transfer from Delaware, Jackie Tait quickly distinguished herself as one of the most intelligent defenders on the team. Meanwhile, junior Christine Rodgers quietly worked her way into a key defender on the team, playing almost every minute of regulation in every game for the Minutewomen. However, it took freshman Nikki Panciocco until the fourth game of the season to work her way into a staring role. Once there, though, it became apparent that Panciocco was going to be an integral part of the UMass defense.

Meanwhile, in goal, it quickly became apparent that incumbent junior goalkeeper Sarah Williams was going to have to compete with highly touted recruit Alesha Widdall for playing time.

Widdall, a veteran of international competition, quickly emerged as the team's top choice in goal, starting UMass' season opener against Boston College. As the season progressed, Widdall developed as one of the top goalkeepers in the country, earning second team All-American honors at season's end.

With four new starters and no seniors among them, the defense was expected to show signs of its youth early on: defensive breakdowns, mental mistakes, and getting overwhelmed by superior opponents, to name a few.

Understanding the adjustments that her young players must make, Sowry waited for her young players to display some growing pains early on in the season.

She waited after the recorded two shutouts in their first three games, they were talented after all. She waited until they gave up nine goals in the first nine games. She waited, and waited, and waited until, after shutting out its opponents in the A-10 tournament and in the NCAA play-in game, the team was going back to the NCAA tournament.

Just as concerns were raised over the team's young defense early on in the season, concerns emerged over whether or not the offense would be able to develop from the unspectacular unit from the 2007 squad.

Entering 2008, the offense had no identity. Leading scorer Cher King was the team's primary option, but the team lacked to ability to work cohesively as a unit. Sowry did not know what to expect from her forward line.

What she got, however, was an offense that burst out of its shell in 2008. Sowry's forward line was the beneficiary of a premier transfer in former Rhode Island forward Jill Powers and breakout seasons from sophomore Katie Kelly and senior Katelyn Orlando.

The addition of Orlando, Kelly and Powers allowed the Minutewomen to establish an offense that was multi-dimensional and could get production from different players. No longer, did Sowry have to rely on King to create plays. Instead, the offense was able to feed off of each other, whether they were attacking the net directly or working off of penalty corners.

The offense, which produced a pedestrian 1.51 goals per game a year ago exploded in 2008, increasing its goal output by over a goal per game (2.55).

Senior captain Erin Parker had a tremendous career at UMass, playing under both Patty Shea and Justine Sowry. The latter coach has turned the program around, making the Minutewomen a yearly threat.

Bringing all of it together for the Minutewomen, though, was the team's midfield unit. Featuring the team's three captains, sophomore Makaela Potts and seniors Mary Shea and Erin Parker, the midfield was the team's foundation.

Potts helped anchor the defense while Parker added another level to the team's offense. Shea, meanwhile, could be found everywhere on the field, helping stop the ball at midfield and helping to penetrate opposing defenses.

UMass' strong midfield was what allowed the team's youth to grow so well. With the team's best players having the ability to lend support on both sides of the ball, the midfield covered up for the forward and the back line's weaknesses and amplified the team's strengths.

The Minutewomen, with an invigorated offense and unyielding defense, entered the '08 season as heavy favorites, rather than the underdogs they were a year ago. They were not going to sneak up on anyone two years in a row.

It didn't have to.

UMass beat all the teams it was supposed to. Except for a meaningless game at the end of the regular season against Providence, the Minutewomen did not lose to an unranked team. In fact, once the team had hit its stride, it became apparent that the team's only weakness was top-5 teams, which is a problem most teams would love to have.

Against even their top opponents, the Minutewomen played well, as they were on the cusp of beating the likes of UConn and Syracuse all season long.

UMass was the epitome of consistency this season. Even in their losses, the Minutewomen played well, as their five defeats were all by a one-goal margin.

With it first national ranking since 2001 and back-to-back NCAA tournament appearances, Sowry's team looks to have established itself as one of the up-and-coming programs in the country and looks to break into the circle of the country's elite teams.

And with only three starters leaving, it looks like the Minutewomen are prepared to bust down the door.

Kellogg keeping team focused

"[Holy Cross] is going to play their match-up zone, which is a tough defense to score on and I don't want our guys to be confused," Kellogg said before Tuesday's practice. "I want them to make sure they attack and go after it."

Kellogg remembers back to the early '90s when he led the charge against the Crusaders. Even though UMass' was a nationally-ranked program, HC always would put up a fight.

"You remember the rivalry, and they were always a tough, well-coached team with kids who played basketball the right way with a good style," Kellogg said. "It is always going to be a great game no matter who they play. If they play Duke, they would always compete and give them a battle."

But with the Crusaders fighting all game, Kellogg hopes his team will continue to learn and get better late in games.

"I'm expecting a hard-fought battle and probably a game that comes down to the last couple of minutes and hopefully we're learning each time out how to win games in the last minute," Kellogg said. "Or last second for that matter."

GAME NOTES

Tonight's 7 p.m. tip-off marks the second game of a UMass basketball doubleheader at the Mullins Center. The women's team hosts Delaware at 5 p.m.

Holy Cross leads the all-time series between the schools 36-17.

In the first meeting between UMass and Holy Cross in 1908, the Crusaders won 51-4.

They have met on Dec. 10 once before, a 68-62 Holy Cross win in 1974.

UMass hasn't faced a Patriot League opponent since 2002, when UMass lost to Lafayette.

Collegian beat writers wrap up 2008 men's soccer season

UMass came out with urgency and dominated play throughout the contest. UMass outshot Richmond 9-1 at the half and controlled the tempo the entire game. Yet after 82 minutes, the game was still tied 0-0. Suddenly, a Richmond player took a shot that redirected off a Minutemen defender and into the goal.

UMass found itself down 1-0 with eight minutes left. But with two minutes remaining, Mark DeSantis scored a game-tying goal to send the game to overtime. In overtime Chris Rowsess scored his first-career goal and UMass won the game. It was the start of a seven-game win streak that got the Minutemen into the NCAA tournament.

TURTINEN: TURNING POINT: UMASS 4, ST. BONAVENTURE 1

Oct. 17 against St. Bonaventure was the turning point in UMass' season. The Minutemen were coming off a 1-0 loss to Richmond and they hadn't won in seven games (0-5-2), the last win was a 1-0 victory over Siena at home on Sept. 6. But, against the Bonnies, the Minutemen did something everyone had been waiting for, they scored a goal. In fact, they scored four, beating them 4-1. That was the first time they had scored in four games and prior to the match the Minutemen had scored seven goals – in just four of their previous 10 games.

UMass saw two goals from junior Mark DeSantis, who was one of UMass' leading scorers from the 2007-08 season. DeSantis had yet to score in the season, but after getting the weight off his shoulders he played a crucial part in UMass' offense for the rest of the season.

FELDMAN: MOST IMPROVED PLAYER: CHRIS ROSWESS

I know he's a freshman, but I feel that over the course of the season no one improved as much as Rowsess. He spent the first 10 games coming off the bench playing spot duty at forward. He earned his first start Sept. 28 against Vermont and became a regular in the starting lineup Oct. 17 against St. Bonaventure. UMass went on a nine-game unbeaten streak once he became a regular.

Could be a coincidence, but more likely the forward's speed and play-making ability helped snapped the Minutemen out of their scoring slump. He only scored four points, but he created dozens and chances and forced opponents to have to deal with a deadly rotation of Bryan Hogan, Mark DeSantis, Rowsess, and Prince Ofori-Nti. Not too many teams could handle that much scoring ability.

TURTINEN: MOST IMPROVED PLAYER: STUART THOMSON

Junior Stuart Thomson came into this season filling a large and questionable hole at defense, and there were doubts at how he would perform. But, Thomson picked up his game and by the middle of the season he was a strong, or the strongest force protecting Simmons in goal. Thomson, with Chris Brown, Dan Lepone and Andrew Henshaw, created a strong back four that led to numerous shutouts or single-goal losses for UMass. Thomson also played a role offensively on set pieces, scoring one goal.

This was Thomson first season as a starter and he took it in stride, continuing to improve each and every game. He still has aspects of his game that need to get better, but the advancements he made this season contributed to the late success of the Minutemen. Thomson's maturity and new found leadership in the back will contribute to the team for the 2009-10 season.

FELDMAN: UNSUNG HERO: CHRIS BROWN

Brown never received a great deal of publicity this season because it is so difficult to quantify an individual defender's impact. There are no stats that track when a player heads a ball out of trouble, or intercepts a pass, or makes a perfect slide tackle or any individual play. However, anyone who watched Brown play knew that he was a major reason for UMass' success on defense.

Brown has been the rock of the defense throughout his career starting all 86 games he has been eligible for. He doesn't make flashy plays and or get really creative with his ball handling, but somehow he his always in the right place at the right time on defense and almost never was beaten by a forward. The fact that he often goes unnoticed is a testament to how rarely he makes a mistake and why he is a true unsung hero.

TURTINEN: UNSUNG HERO: MIKE DESANTIS

Senior Mike DeSantis isn't one of the flashiest players on the team, but when he plays his game, which is every time he steps on the field, there isn't much he can't do. DeSantis shared the center midfield position with Arikian and together they were unstoppable. Arikian stood out more as the star in the middle because he dribbled around players and earned more points on the season. But DeSantis' quiet leadership and game experience led the Minutemen to success in his four years. His positioning was nearly perfect and his game sense was spot on.

FELDMAN: BEST KOCH QUOTE: CHRISTMAS SHOPPING

"We were very disappointed. Everybody was hoping to get started on their Christmas shopping, but I guess we're going to have to postpone that," Koch said.

Most coaches would say, "Oh we're very excited," or "It's great news" and put me to sleep. Not Koch, he was always there to keep me on my toes (and make fun of my hair).

TURTINEN: BEST KOCH QUOTE: OH CANADA

If had to pick my favorite Koch quote, because he said one nearly every interview and when you talk to someone at least twice a week the quotes start to pile up. I chose one from Oct. 1 in an interview with Koch a few days before UMass hosted the Winstars Soccer Academy from Canada in a midseason exhibition game.

"We're trying to work on our U.S.-Canadian relations. A lot of times Americans just aren't very nice to them. With the dollar being the way it is, we figure we should make sure our relations are better and this is one way I thought I could do my part for the country, especially in an election year."

FINAL THOUGHTS:

With two straight NCAA tournament appearances, the Minutemen have raised the standards for the program. The team will lose some extremely talented seniors such as Brown and Simmons, however the freshmen class the Minutemen will get should be of a higher quality thanks to their recent success. It will be interesting to see how Koch replaces the lost leadership while working in his new recruits in the 2009 season. How he answers these challenges will determine the future of UMass soccer.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS WEDNESDAY

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 10, 2008 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

If you ask UMass coach Derek Kellogg, his Minutemen are the best 1-6 team in the country. If you really look into the matter, the first-year coach may just be on to something.

Is UMass the best 1-6 team in the country?

Eli Rosenswaike

Coaches are known for their hyperbole.

So when Massachusetts men's basketball coach Derek Kellogg told the media the Minutemen are the best 1-6 team in the country, I took it as just another coach being, well, a coach.

"I think we're the best 1-6 team in the country, with the best attitude of a 1-6 team in the country," Kellogg said before practice Tuesday. "I wonder how many teams are actually 1-6, but that's besides the point."

Oh, but it is the point. I did the research. Of the 347 schools in Division I college basketball, there are 13 teams with a 1-6 mark.

So, how do the Minutemen stack up?

WINSTON-SALEM (RATINGS PERCENTAGE INDEX: 217; STRENGTH OF SCHEDULE 125)
Lone victory: 68-65 over South Carolina State

FAIRLEIGH DICKINSON (RPI: 218; S.O.S.: 106)
Lone victory: 71-67 over Monmouth

PENNSYLVANIA (RPI: 222; S.O.S.: 157)
Lone victory: 83-62 over Monmouth

COASTAL CAROLINA (RPI: 229; S.O.S.: 112)
Lone victory: 69-60 over Western Illinois

UC IRVINE (RPI: 262; S.O.S.: 168)
Lone victory: 71-63 over Pepperdine

BRYANT UNIVERSITY (RPI: 271; S.O.S.: 153)
Lone victory: 59-50 over Quinnipiac

UMASS (RPI: 297; S.O.S.: 124)
Lone victory: 90-71 over Arkansas-Monticello (Div. II)

HOWARD (RPI: 299; S.O.S.: 178)
Lone victory: 47-45 over Oregon State

YOUNGSTOWN STATE (RPI: 302; S.O.S.: 135)
Lone victory: 96-59 over Allegheny (Div. III)

FORDHAM (RPI: 309; S.O.S.: 199)
Lone victory: 79-58 over Lafayette

CAL ST. NORTHRIDGE (RPI: 313; S.O.S.: 159)
Lone victory: 73-62 over Cal Lutheran (Div. II)

FURMAN (RPI: 324; S.O.S.: 212)
Lone victory: 67-51 over Emory (Div. III)

SACRAMENTO STATE (RPI: 328; S.O.S.: 294)
Lone victory: 82-70 over UC Davis

So, how should we figure this out? Well, Furman and Youngstown State could only beat Division III teams, so they're out. Both Fairleigh Dickinson and Pennsylvania beat Monmouth, so that must make Monmouth the worst 1-9 team in the country, so they're out, too.

Sacramento State is out, it has with the worst RPI and S.O.S of all the teams on the list. UMass is in for now, while Fordham is out – even Rams coach Dereck Whittenburg would concede that UMass has a better team than he has.

Bryant is out, because apparently Max Groebe isn't good enough to play for UMass but he is for the Bulldogs. Howard is out, they have the worst S.O.S remaining and the second-worse RPI. And no dice for Cal St. Northridge, with that putrid 313 RPI and lowly 11-point win over a Division II opponent.

That leaves four teams: UMass, Coastal Carolina, UC Irvine and Winston-Salem. I propose a four-team tournament to decide this epic title of best 1-6 team in the country!

These four teams should consider themselves lucky, though, because when I started this column Bucknell (RPI 230; S.O.S. 72) was also 1-6 – but they won late Tuesday night.

Those pesky Bison would wipe the floor with all of them.

Strong year for Koch and Co.

Between my partner Melissa Turtinen and I (Scott Feldman), we have seen more than 20 hours of Massachusetts men's soccer games, conducted over 6 hours of interviews and laughed at dozens of Sam Koch one-liners. Here are our observations on what we felt were the biggest storylines of the season. Not that we agreed on anything, but we'll leave it you to decide who is right.

FELDMAN: TEAM MVP: ZACK SIMMONS

Scott Feldman

Melissa Turtinen

This season Simmons continued to prove he was one of the best goalkeepers in the country. In 21 games, Simmons allowed two goals four times and not once did any team score more than that. He allowed one goal in 10 games along with seven shutouts for a .81 goals against average.

This pick isn't only for his abilities on the pitch, but for his leadership off it. Simmons was always the player to lead the practices, set an examples with his work ethic, and the guy Coach Koch counted on to keep the team focused even when things seemed grim. Shane Curran-Hays has some big shoes to fill next year when Simmons graduates.

TURTINEN: MVP: BEN ARIKIAN

The obvious choice would be senior goalkeeper Zack Simmons. If UMass' defense couldn't stop its opponents' offense Simmons would. But, I decided to pick someone who wasn't such a shoe in. I mean Simmons has clinched nearly every UMass record so I decided to give the title to someone else. And that someone else deserves it. Sophomore midfielder Ben Arikian is by far one of the most valuable players on the team.

Arikian was, overall, the most skilled and diverse player for UMass. His ability to play both defense and offense has contributed to the Minutemen's success the last two seasons. He was involved with nearly every play. He played an integral role on set pieces, taking corner kicks and free kicks, creating numerous offensive chances for his team.

He tallied four goals and seven assists to lead the team in points (15), including a team leading three game-winning goals. His footwork and game sense allowed him to not only make precise passes, but if there wasn't an option he would carry the ball to open space creating opportunities. Arikian is the ideal playmaker and will continue to help the Minutemen be productive in years to come.

Blue Hens come to Amherst

By David Brinch
Collegian Staff

After back-to-back victories in the Brown Classic last weekend, the Massachusetts women's basketball team hopes to make it three in a row when it takes on its first Colonial Athletic Association team of the season.

The Minutewomen will host Delaware tonight at the Mullins Center with tip-off coming at 5 p.m.

"They play a two-three zone, and will probably play that against us," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "I think we need to be on the attack and move the ball up and down the floor."

After a narrow victory over Long Island on Saturday, the Minutewomen (6-3) were able to get off to a quicker start on the court Sunday and shoot 63.2 percent in the second half en route to defeating Brown, 64-41.

"We struggled a little bit on Saturday, but we were fortunate to get a win from it," Dacko said after the tournament. "I am pleased with the way we came out, especially in the second half against Brown."

Senior guard Stephanie Gerardot had 22 points while sophomore guard Cerie Mosgrove added 12 points, with both being named to the All-Tournament team. It was Gerardot's third 20-point game of the season, while going 6-10 from three-point range. The two offensive threats must continue their hot streak against a Blue Hen (4-3) team that allows 51.7 points per game.

"It was nice to see," Dacko said of Gerardot and Mosgrove's performances in the tournament.

"They're a great scoring punch, and I would also like to see Kristina Danella get in there."

Danella, a freshman forward, has been seeing some time when Valerie Avebe and Teya Wright need a break from game action, but averages just 2.9 points per game.

With three probable starters over six feet, the Maroon and White will need to show up defensively and not get into foul trouble early on in the game. They will also need to shoot from the perimeter, with the Blue Hens averaging 3.6 blocks a game, compared to the Minutewomen's 1.4 blocks a game. Shooting from outside might pay dividends for UMass. The Minutewomen have a higher three-point percentage (32.7) as well as field goal percentage (38.4) than the Blue Hens.

The Delaware front court features two underclassmen in sophomore Ariene Jenkins (6'1") and freshman Danielle Parker (6'2").

Jenkins leads the Blue Hens in rebounds per game (8.1), while Parker is fourth on the team in scoring (7.6 points per game).

Both schools have met three times previous to this evening's match-up, with the Blue Hens coming into tonight's game undefeated in the all-time series.

The first meeting was on Dec. 8, 1990, with the Blue Hens defeating UMass, 66-59, in a tournament game at Princeton.

They wouldn't meet again for another 15 years, in the 2005-2006 season-opener for the Blue Hens, which had four scorers in double-figures on its way to a 71-44 rout of the Minutewomen.

With a six point lead with less than five minutes ago, Blue Hen's forward Chrissy Fisher hit the game winning shot with 14 seconds left in regulation to win the game for Delaware, 63-62. This was the last meeting between the two teams, which was during the 2006-2007 campaign in Amherst.

This is not the Blue Hen's first opponent from up north this season. Maine, a team that UMass fell to back on Nov. 23 by a score of 54-45, traveled to Newark last Sunday, as Jenkins notched her first career double-double for the Blue Hens.

The forward had 12 points and 13 rebounds, as the team forced the Black Bears to commit 28 turnovers.

Stefanie Gerardot and the Minutewomen won both of their games this weekend in Rhode Island to improve their record to 5-4.

Sophomore Ben Arikian helped lead a talented UMass team to the NCAA Tournament for the second straight season.

UM developing offensively

Mosgrove, Wright stepping up to compliment Gerardot

By Nick O'Malley
Collegian Staff

With 17.2 points per game, Stefanie Gerardot is the unquestioned leader on offense for the Massachusetts women's basketball team. Nine games into the season, though, the rest of the team is beginning to develop an offensive identity.

Starting with two of the team's sophomores, guard Cerie Mosgrove and forward Teya Wright, some of the team's young talent has grown into strong roles on offense.

"We've got some scoring threats, I think we've just got to use them, as far as managing the players," said UMass coach Marnie Dacko.

Mosgrove, who average only 2.6 points per game a year ago, has emerged as the team's second option on offense. Putting up 10.6 points per game thus far, the sophomore has benefitted greatly from her ability to shoot from long range.

By going 28-71 from 3-point range this season, Mosgrove has already surpassed the team-high mark of 26 3-pointers from last year that was set by Gerardot.

While Mosgrove has established a presence on the perimeter, Wright has established herself as the predominant post presence on the team. Third on the team in scoring (9.1 points per game) and first in rebounds (7.6 per game), she is the team's leader in the middle, but has been inconsistent and has gotten into frequent foul trouble.

"She's got to make moved to the bucket. She's got to battle," Dacko said. "She's still learning. She's somebody who was in an inordinate amount of foul trouble last year. We're going to work with her and she'll get better and better as she gains confidence.

"Right now, she has to gain confidence and the only way she'll gain confidence is by going to the next practice. With her, it's being able to go inside and defend without fouling," Dacko said.

Benefiting from Wright in the middle are the team's two veteran points guards, senior Sakera Young and Kim Benton. While the two have to ability to run the offense and distribute the ball they are also capable of slashing inside on defenses.

Young, one the team's best athletes, blows past most defenders and has tremendous leaping ability to create plays. Benton, meanwhile, is the team's smallest player a 5-foot-5.

Dacko, however, has no doubts about her undersized guard's abilities.

"Kim Benton, at any time, can turn it on and light it up when she's got a hot hand. So you've got to look at her for scoring as well," Dacko said.

While Benton, Young, Mosgrove and Wright have become the offensive additions they were expected to be, Dacko has taken note of players that have made substantial progress this season on offense.

"I think you have to add [freshman forward] Kristina Danella in there. She's someone who's capable of putting up a lot of points inside and out," Dacko said. She's a Tony Gaffney-like player with a better jump shot. And I think Tony would agree with me on that."

Dacko also praised the contributions of versatile forward Stephanie Lawrence. The sophomore has proven herself as a multidimensional offensive threat, playing inside and shooting from behind the arc for the Minutewomen.

"She's been up and down as minutes go, but she also gets to the foul line and she's not a bad defender," Dacko said.

Holiday help from campus

RSOs collect food and clothes in community outreach effort

By Kate DeVane
Collegian Correspondent

As the semester draws to a close and the holidays approach, several groups on campus are sponsoring community outreach events to help provide local families with food and clothing.

Students Helping Area Reach-Out Efforts (SHARE), a student-run community service organization, is sponsoring a campus-wide food drive.

"We've been an RSO [Registered Student Organization] for around 15 years," said Kate Schaefer, a SHARE member who is helping to run the event. "And it's always been an outreach opportunity for kids at UMass to do community service projects. Some of our things are just fund-raising. A lot of events are going off campus, but we do things on campus as well. It just depends on what's needed."

The UMass Republican Club is also involved with the event, Schaefer said, making fliers and helping manage an informational table.

Tiffany Stahl, who is spearheading the project, said SHARE is collecting food in "all of the dorms on campus except for two that are running their own food drives. We have boxes and fliers in a lot of other buildings [as well]."

Donations will be given to the Amherst Survival Center, and possibly other organizations as well, depending on how much is collected, Schaefer said.

The group said it will box the donations and load them into a truck donated by U-Haul. This event will be taking place on the lawn in front of the W.E.B. Du Bois Library on Friday, Dec. 12, from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m.

SHARE said it has collected seven large boxes of food so far and hopes to raise more awareness of the event over the next few days.

"We have some good loud tablers," said Bonnie Glover, another SHARE member. "So we're hoping we can get some attention that way."

SHARE will have a table with information in the Campus Center today and on the library lawn on Friday.

The event organizers are happy with the response they have received so far. "It's nice that those other buildings are helping, that it's not just students," Schaefer said. "A lot of people get excited about it."

"This is the first one we're doing," said Stahl. "Hopefully it will turn into an annual event."

The Newman Catholic Center, located on North Pleasant Street on the UMass Campus, is sponsoring the Giving Tree Project, which provides clothing as Christmas gifts for local children.

Participants are asked to choose an ornament with a child's name and a clothing wish list totaling around $25.

"I know a lot of organizations do toys, so we wanted to do something different," said Jo-Ann Konieczny, the organizer of the event.

The Newman Center is working with over 20 different agencies in western Massachusetts to sponsor around 600 children this Christmas. Konieczny said the Giving Tree Project, which has been held annually for about seven years, brings members of the UMass community together.

"We get a lot of students, the alumni and development offices participate each year, athletic teams participate, and a lot of professors," said Konieczny. "In the past we've had fraternities and sororities. Our students really give of themselves at UMass."

Those interesting in donating still have several days to purchase a gift. "We're hoping to have all gifts back this Sunday," Konieczny said. "There are about 100 names left on the tree. If the building's open you can come and take a tag."

Unwrapped clothing in gift bags is preferred because volunteers may need to check over the items before giving them to the children.

Konieczny said she was aware that college students often do not have a lot of money and that any kind of donation was appreciated.

"We also do a hat, mitten and sock drive if people can't afford to do an ornament," she said.

She also said participants were welcome to purchase a gift card if they did not have time to go shopping before this weekend.

The Giving Tree Project is an important part of her Christmas celebration, said Konieczny. "It just amazes me every year, how people come together – seeing all the gifts together and knowing that many people did something for someone else."

Students weigh in on budget

By Michael Fox
Collegian Staff

Malcolm Chu and Lindsey McCluskey are on Chancellor Holub's budget task force representing students.

University of Massachusetts students discussed and debated ways for the student body to approach the school's current budget crisis during a town hall style meeting held at Earthfoods Café Tuesday night.

The meeting was sponsored by the Student Government Association and facilitated by SGA President Malcolm Chu and Student Trustee Lindsay McCluskey.

They began by identifying the night's goals as educating students about the school's budget task force meetings, giving the background and context for the current budget crisis and hearing student's ideas and concerns relating to the budget.

The crisis entails an anticipated $38 million deficit facing the University next year. The deficit comprises of a $20 million cut of state funding, an anticipated $2 million for the operations of the new recreational center, $3 million spent on fringe benefits for University employees and $6.5 million from a decline in investment income.

The task force organized by the University, which was formed to make recommendations to Chancellor Robert Holub, consists of members of the school faculty, staff, administration, as well as Chu and McCluskey.

The focus throughout the meeting was on how students want to see the school cut programs seen as wasteful and adopt cost-saving practices, such as minor environmental improvements.

The discussion also touched on the possibility of the school accepting more out-of-state students to make up for the deficit and the opposition of some students to the idea.

The most controversial measure discussed was the possibility of fee and tuition hikes.

During the meeting, students came to the consensus that the school should take measures that would guarantee financial well-being in the long term rather than quick fixes like raising the cost of attending the school.

Chu and McCluskey ended the conversation emphasizing that all students need to get organized and involved for there to be positive progress.

"Now, more than ever, it is critical that students across the state pressure the state legislature to make higher public education a priority," McCluskey said.

Students who attended the meeting left it with a mix of new information and a desire for action.

"I thought it was a great opportunity for people of different backgrounds and concerns to be educated on this topic," said junior Jasmin Torreyes.

"I think that we were able to realize a collective concept of what our priorities need to be and how to move forward during a unique period of time," said junior Heather McCormack.

"I think that we need to make the student body realize that this affects them in ways that will continue to worsen unless they get involved," said junior William Sydor.

Chu said he felt the meeting accomplished its goals and that it "starts a conversation about the situation and hopefully those here will help spread it."

Pulitzer poet comes to Memorial Hall tonight

By Zachary Fischer
Collegian Correspondent

Franz Wright, renowned poet and a 2004 winner of the Pulitzer Prize, will speak this evening in Memorial Hall at the University of Massachusetts.

Wright is being brought to UMass as a part of the Visiting Writers' Series, sponsored by the MFA Program for Poets and Writers and the Juniper Initiative.

Called both "offhand and comic" and "intense and searching" in the same New York Times book review, his poems can be light as well as painfully intense, mixing the tones in a thoughtful and declarative manner.

His Pulitzer Prize-winning collection, "Walking to Martha's Vineyard," is mostly about his famous, late father James Wright – who also won the Pulitzer, 32 years earlier.

Newer works, such as "God's Silence Poems," focus on the relationship between one man, his world and an estranged god.

Lisa Olstein, associate director of the MFA Program for Poets, said hearing poetry, any poetry, read aloud "enriches our relationship to it. The private experience of reading is complemented by the tone and music that come alive in the poet's voice. Franz Wright is known for giving great readings."

Denise Warren, a graduate student in the MFA program for Poets, said she is not familiar with Wright's work – something not unheard of – but plans to go anyway.

"One of the great things about the series, you get inspired to look up [new artists'] work," she said.

The MFA program is renowned for bringing in big-name authors. This year, it has hosted Heidi Julavits, Gillian Conoley and John Ashbery, an author of more than 30 publications since 1953.

This is largely due to the prestige associated with the MFA program, one of the oldest creative writing programs in America and one that has held the series for several years.

"We're extremely fortunate that this reputation and authors' generosity allow us to have such a wonderful line-up each year," Olstein said.

The Visiting Writer's series takes place on selected Thursdays in Memorial Hall.

Interns feeling effects of recession

By Desai Gomes
Collegian Staff

For students looking to land co-op and internship assignments, the recession is making the search for work experience a lot tougher.

As the unemployment rate rises upward of 6.5 percent nationwide, companies are trying to keep their heads above water by limiting the number of student workers they hire.

The decision could cut off a valuable asset to students, since co-ops and internships provide ways for students to gain valuable work experience, help pay for education and explore possible career choices.

Some, however, believe the decline in the economy might actually be beneficial for students, since undergraduate interns often do not work full time and can be paid lesser wages.

But these opportunities are limited, so colleges, families and students are facing difficulties finding good internships and co-ops. More importantly, students will have to present standout credentials rather than average qualifications as the competition for the same internship or co-op opportunities is expected to increase greatly.

"I think it will be extremely difficult for students looking to get an internship to get one," said UMass student, Mark Fitzgerald.

Many co-op and internship programs already in place at colleges are already feeling the impact of the failing economy.

Richard Newrock, dean of the College of Applied Science at the University of Cincinnati, which has a mandatory co-op program, said the school is having a difficult time placing students in the program.

UMass, however, is experiencing the opposite problem.

"There are tons of opportunities but not enough students are taking advantage of the internships and co-ops available at this school," said Jeffrey Silver, the associate director for field experience.

He said companies are begging more students to apply, as very few students are currently seeking out such opportunities.

While most students look for summer internships and co-ops, those slots are the most competitive and difficult to get. Finding them during the school year is much

Adderall misused by a quarter of students

BY JESSICA FRYMAN
SAGEBRUSH (U. NEVADA-RENO)

RENO, Nev. — Studies show that up to 25 percent of college students misuse Adderall to help them cram for exams, a short-term benefit that comes with the risks of being charged with a felony and detrimental health consequences.

The "study drug" is prescribed to people with Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder to help them focus and stay calm, said Ole Thienhaus, dean of the University of Nevada School of Medicine. It's a stimulant, classified as an amphetamine and Class II drug the same category as cocaine.

Studies vary, stating that 8 to 25 percent of college students use Adderall, but reports show increases in prescriptions for Adderall and students say the trend is widespread.

For students that use the University of Nevada-Reno (UNR) Counseling Services for Substance Abuse, alcohol and marijuana are the most common misused drugs, said Garry Rubinstein, coordinator of the program. Of those students, about 8 percent said they have also abused Adderall.

He is treating four students for Adderall abuse this semester. But not everyone who uses Adderall visits counseling services.

"Students I see come in because something went wrong enough for them to call up for help," he said.

Rubinstein said abusing Adderall is "not a new phenomenon," but he has no official numbers to compare this semester to the past.

One UNR junior who uses Adderall to help him study, said he thinks students are more likely to take Adderall than they are to smoke marijuana.

"People are more willing to do Adderall than anything else," the 20-year-old business major said. "More people are doing Adderall than you think."

He added that many students don't consider Adderall a drug because it's easily accessible through friends' prescriptions at an average price of $3 per 15 milligram pill.

ADHD is more commonly diagnosed in young children, but has been increasingly found in adults throughout the past few decades, Thienhaus said.

Almost half of students that use the Disability Resource Center have a psychological condition, center's 2007-08 report.

Prescriptions for ADHD medication increased 369 percent between 1992 and 2002, according to a National Center for Addiction and Substance Abuse report.

Thienhaus said he thinks the disorder is overdiagnosed because there are only symptoms and no scientific tests to make the diagnosis.

"In borderline cases, it's difficult and almost impossible," he said. "We have to be careful about it."

Because Adderall is also used as a street drug, pharmacists and doctors watch for red flags of abuse, like when people try to fill the same prescription twice or have prescriptions from multiple doctors, Thienhaus said.

Students said the college trend to use Adderall is fueled by results.

One UNR freshman, said he considers himself to have ADD, but has never been diagnosed. During study time, he often finds himself surfing the Web because he's easily distracted, he said.

When he was a junior in high school, his friend offered him Adderall to help him stay more focused. He said he used the pill most often when studying for his Advanced Placement biology class.

Before tests, he'd break the time capsule on the pill to make the effects kick in more quickly, he said.

The freshman said he hasn't taken the pill since he started taking classes at UNR because he hasn't needed to. If that changes, he said he would use Adderall again because it works.

He studied for three exams, finished two presentations, completed regular homework assignments and cleaned his room and kitchen — a to-do list he said he couldn't have accomplished without using Adderall.

"You can cram very well and ace the test, but we know you are supposed to learn not for the next test but as a subject matter that you are supposed to retain," Thienhaus said.

The pill can suppress appetite, cause insomnia, dry mouth, paranoia, shortness of breath and emotional overreactions, according to the UNR pharmacy.

But possibly the most harmful effect is that it's addictive, doctors said.

"The risk of getting hooked is tremendous," said Thienhaus, who has been working with ADHD patients for 20 years.

It takes larger doses to feel the effects, the more often someone uses Adderall, which can lead to addiction. The average dose for someone who is prescribed the pill is from 20 to 60 milligrams per day, Thienhaus said.

easier and advantageous because there are a greater number of openings during that time. Students also have the ability to choose whether they want to work while earning at least 15 credits. In the summer many kids end up taking a job that is not their first, or even second choice.

According to Silver, the reason other schools might be seeing a shortage in available internships and co-ops while UMass is not, is because of the school's well-established Field Experience Program and connections with businesses and companies nationwide.

The program updates a database of more than 1,000 positions and offers numerous workshops, two of which are scheduled to be held next week: one on Monday in Goodell 508, the other on Tuesday in Goodell 419. Both are set to begin at 3 p.m.

U. Maryland prof. invents audio camera

BY CHRIS YU
THE DIAMONDBACK (U. MARYLAND)

COLLEGE PARK, Md. — Superman has superhuman hearing, Spiderman has his spider senses, Daredevil has sensitive hearing radar and University of Maryland computer science professor Ramani Duraiswami has a small plastic ball that can see sound to get the bad guys.

Duraiswami and his colleagues are developing an audio camera that can detect where sound is coming from. It could help police find the location of a sniper based on the sound of gunfire. The audio camera could also help architects design concert halls with better sound quality and allow automakers to build quieter cabins for their vehicles.

"In the long term, this will change the way we view sound," Duraiswami said.

The audio camera is a small plastic ball with 64 holes spread across the surface, said Adam O'Donovan, a graduate student working on the project. Under each hole is an individual microphone. Because the microphones are in a spherical arrangement, O'Donovan said they are able to detect sound coming from just about any direction, all at the same time.

When a sound is detected, it is represented as a splash of colors on a computer screen. Red represents the most intense sound, while blue is the least intense, O'Donovan said.

The audio camera could help police find a sniper because it not only detects where a shot is coming from, it also isolates the gunshot sound from all other sounds in the area, Duraiswami said. This way, police can pinpoint exactly where the shooter is hiding.

This ability to isolate one sound out of many could also be useful during teleconferences, Duraiswami said. When more than one person is talking and it is difficult to hear what each is saying, the audio camera can separate the commotion into comprehensible dialogue.

The audio camera could help architects design concert halls, O'Donovan said. In order for the audience to get a rich, full sound from the performance they are watching, sound from the stage must bounce off the walls throughout the building. The audio camera allows architects to see which parts of the concert hall are not getting enough of that bounce, O'Donovan said.

Enabling automakers to build quieter cabins for vehicles is also within the audio camera's capabilities, because the device pinpoints exactly where sounds are leaking in, O'Donovan added.

UMPD Crime Log Dec. 2 – Dec. 8

Tuesday

David W. Jankowski, 25, of 354 Balcom St. Mansfield, Mass., was arrested in Lot 22 at 3:07 p.m. He had two outstanding warrants and was charged with operating a motor vehicle with a suspended license. Jankowski was arrested after a suspicious vehicle call was made to UMass police.

Thursday

Anton M. Broekman, 30, of 45 Fort Hill Terrace Northampton, Mass., was arrested as a result of a traffic stop on Campus Center Way at 9:02 a.m. He was charged with operating a motor vehicle with a suspended license and not having an inspection sticker.

Friday

William L. Biscaia, 19, of 163 North St. Norfolk, Mass., was arrested in Gorman dormitory at 12:42 a.m. and charged with possession of marijuana, possession with intent to distribute a Class D drug and possession of liquor while under the age of 21.

"We got an initial report of a verbal altercation at Gorman and an officer responded to the area where the supposed altercation was taking place," said University of Massachusetts Police Department Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald.

Once police arrived, drugs were also discovered.

"There was a strong odor of marijuana coming from the suspect who was reported to be involved in the argument," he added.

After Biscaia was read his rights and agreed to talk, a female entered the hallway with some pot.

"She had a container with her that officers could see contained baggies that they believed contained marijuana," Archbald said. "They admitted the marijuana was his [Biscaia] and the female gave a statement saying he had instructed her on what to do with it," he said.

According to police, Biscaia told her that "the cops won't look in there," referring to the container and the room.

Pejmon Ayandeh, 20, of 134 Kenney Ln. Concord, Mass., was arrested in North Hall A at 1:52 a.m. and charged with assault and battery with a dangerous weapon (a shoe.)

"We dispatched an officer to investigate an on-going domestic [disturbance call] in North Residence Building A. We were given a room number and we identified a male and a female there," said Archbald.

After the parties were interviewed it was determined that they were dating and during an argument an assault had taken place.

"There had been a physical strike by a male assaulting the female," Archbald said. "Apparently he hit her once with an open hand and then struck her while wearing a shoe. In Massachusetts anything can be considered a dangerous weapon if it's used to assault someone.

Megan McGowan, 20, of 79 Crestwood Dr. Northborough, Mass., was arrested in Chadbourne dormitory at 11:11 a.m., when police executed a warrant.

"We were attempting to serve an arrest warrant – not a room search warrant – when two officers went to the residence in Chadbourne, at which point she was not there," said Archbald.

The police received information that McGowan could be at Brown dormitory.

"Officers encountered her in Brown in a hallway and she was then placed under arrest," he said. "During handcuffing her she became obstinate and struggled with officers," he added. Commenting on why she was not charged with resisting arrest, Archbald said that it was a "little bit of a struggle."

Saturday

Stencia Jovain, 20, of 16 Hiawatha Road, Mattapan, Mass., was arrested in North Hall D at 1:33 a.m. and charged with assault.

Eddie Chang, 24, of 19 Clarendon Road, Belmont, Mass., was arrested as a result of a traffic stop on North Pleasant Street at 2:48 a.m. and charged with two warrants and failure to stop/yield.

Thomas Krarup, 18, of 26 Keith Haven Ln. Columbus, N.C. was arrested in Thatcher dormitory at 3:26 a.m. and charged with possession of a Class D drug.

Sunday

Alexander Maxwell Payne, 19, of 40 Rochelle St. West Springfield Mass., was arrested in Lot 49 at 3:55 a.m. and charged with an OUI greater than reasonable and proper speed and obstructing traffic on a roadway. An officer first observed the Ford Ranger when it was operating on Orchard Hill Way.

"The vehicle stopped in the middle of the roadway, blocking both lanes of traffic and straddling the middle of the road," said Archbald.

When the officer stopped to approach the driver the vehicle allegedly took off.

"It accelerated rapidly and traveled south on Orchard Hill Way and the officer estimated it was traveling greater than the speed limit," he added.

Once the time he stop the officer allegedly smelled an odor of alcohol and further signs Payne was intoxicated were seeing.

"He had glassy, bloodshot eyes and failed field sobriety tests," said Archbald.

Christopher M. Houlihan, 19, of 18 Gloria Road, West Roxbury, Mass., was arrested in Lot 64 (UMPD's back parking lot,) at 4:48 a.m. and charged with an OUI and having no inspection sticker.

"One of our dispatchers informed units that a vehicle had pulled into our back parking lot at a high rate of speed and parked in a reserved parking space," said Archbald.

Lot 64 is restricted parking all year long.

"A crowd of people were in the suspect's car and when officers responded, the operator was identified to have glossy, blood-shot eyes and a strong odor of alcohol coming from him," he added.

Houlihan allegedly failed four field sobriety tests and said that he went to the station to bail out a friend.

"When we further investigated who his friend was, it was determined his friend was not here," said Archbald.

YouTube cracks down on more content

By David Sarno
Los Angeles Times

On some bright, parched morning back in the Old West, folks must have heard grumbling as a boy nailed a list of new town laws to the wall of the saloon. And when they saw the sheriff and his fresh-faced deputies looking on with a satisfied grin, that's probably when they knew the West wasn't going to be so wild anymore.

A similar scene has been playing out digitally at YouTube, the Internet's video town square. In addition to its long-standing campaign to crack down on illegally copied material, in September the site outlawed videos depicting drug abuse and last week tightened its guidelines further to restrict profanity and sexually suggestive content. In other words, before the money wagons roll in, some law and order needs to be imposed.

The 4-year-old site, long a cultural frontier complete with virtual vice and chicanery, is growing up. TV shows and feature films have arrived, and so even has the president-elect, who now uploads his fireside video blogs every week.

"In the last six months, we've been iterating very, very quickly," said YouTube spokesman Ricardo Reyes, adding that as the site becomes more sophisticated, the potential to boost advertising grows too.

YouTube, which costs nothing to use, boasts hundreds of millions of visitors every month, and the Google-owned company has been working to translate more of that activity into profit. "I think that generally people understand that we have to find a way to pay for the service," Reyes said.

Videos that YouTube considers objectionable no longer will qualify for its daily honor roll pages, where the most widely viewed clips are showcased. These "browse" pages often act as a kind of viral launch pad, from which many of the Web's most-watched videos blast off. Exile from these areas, while not explicit censorship, cuts deeply into a video's chances to get noticed. Reese Leysen, a member of iPower, a YouTube filmmaking group, noticed that his videos were disappearing last week from the browse pages – and he wasn't sure why.

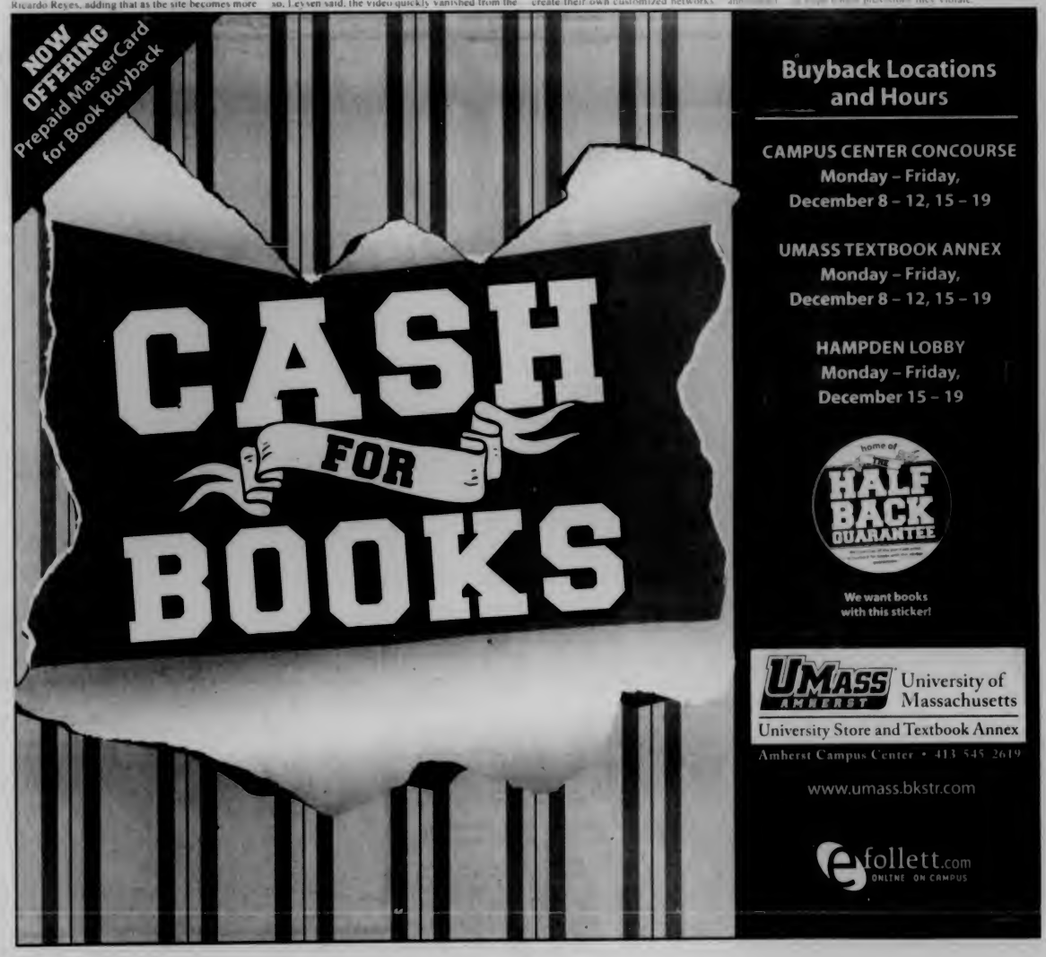
One of the group's successful tricks has been to use racy video titles and preview images to tempt potential viewers.

But a recent effort featured no worse than the group's leading lady, Tanya Derveaux, in a low-cut top suitable for wearing to the grocery store. Even so, Leysen said, the video quickly vanished from the most-viewed area despite having earned more views than many of the day's top videos. A second iPower video was marked unsuitable for minors. This time it was Derveaux in form-fitting workout clothing.

YouTube's new policing highlights the tension between large and vibrant online communities and the businesses that own them. That companies are charged with making judgments about politics and artistic speech can be problematic, said Lawrence Lessig, a law professor at Stanford University and author of "Remix," a new book that looks for a balance between art and commerce.

"I think it risks a significant animosity and hypocrisy," Lessig said. "The whole excitement about the place is that we can see what the public is watching, what the public likes, what's important."

For its part, YouTube believes that the stricter rules will boost the quality and relevance of the most visible videos by trimming undesirable clutter and less desirable material. "There's definitely the obligation we have to allow people to actually find what they're looking for," Reyes said.



Other social sites are tightening the reins on borderline content as well. Last week, the social networking service Ning, which allows users to create their own customized networks, announced it would no longer support any of the adult-oriented networks that had cropped up on the site, even though the company's rules had never forbidden pornographic material.

YouTube's approach to defining profanity and sexually suggestive content shows the mixed aspect of making such rule changes. In the case of profanity, it gives no definition at all, leading users to wonder if even one instance of cursing might trigger demotion.

In evaluating sexually suggestive content, the site includes a list of elements that could get a video flagged, including when "the subject is depicted in a pose that is intended to sexually arouse the viewer."

Creating a layer of murkiness is just how YouTube plans to enforce such slippery rules on the thousands of videos it gets every day. The site says videos that violate its new content guidelines will be "algorithmically demoted," suggesting the implausible idea that a computer would be able to determine, for example, if a video was intended to arouse, to educate or to make an artistic statement.

Users are not notified when their videos are demoted, and the site does not explain its rulings or even which provisions they violate.

A fee increase

S.P. Sullivan

Twelve million dollars seems like a lot of money if you don't have it. But it seems like even more money if you planned on having it and don't anymore.

Not long ago, University of Massachusetts Chancellor Robert C. Holub formed a task force consisting of faculty, staff and student representatives to assess the implementation of cuts in the University following the national economic crisis.

In October, Gov. Deval Patrick slashed the state budget by $1 billion – $12 million of which came from UMass Amherst.

At a town hall-style meeting in Earth Foods Café Tuesday organized to bring students up to speed on the process, Student Government Association President Malcolm Chu and Trustee Lindsay McCluskey said that the University is expecting a $38 million deficit by next year.

That's a deficit of roughly 4,903,226 YCMP swipes, in case you were wondering.

Right now I have a surplus of 11, but I don't think it'll last.

UMass journalism professor Ralph Whitehead, a member of the Faculty Senate rules committee and the task force, said the panel is looking into ways the University can generate revenue and cut costs to try to soften the blow inflicted by the financial downturn. He said this semester's $12 million in cuts "were deep, but not painfully deep."

"Now we're beginning to think through what will be the painful cuts," he said. "And it may become a way of life for the next few years."

He said to prevent further cuts the task force has focused on ways to generate more revenue for the school – among them, an increased focus on online education and drawing in out-of-state students, who can pay an upward of $10,000 a year more in tuition and fees.

But what the task force says and what the University does are two different things.

"The only thing the task force can do is to urge the University to increase it, the way we would urge on the New England Patriots in the middle of the season," he said.

Then there's the inevitable fee increase.

Student demands for a rollback of student fees that were the rallying cry of last year's strike can just about be forgotten. Everyone, from Chu to Holub to Whitehead, is anticipating a fee increase, though Whitehead said the task force has been adamant about ensuring that another fee increase won't close the doors to low-income students.

Student demands for a rollback of student fees that were the rallying cry of last year's strike can just about be forgotten.

"If there were a fee increase, some of that money would be put into financial aid and need-based grant for low-income students," Whitehead said.

He also said that UMass economics professor Robert Pollin, also on the task force, has advocated setting some of the money aside, "so moderate-need students are also protected."

I think Barack Obama got in trouble for calling that "spreading the wealth around a little."

It's good to see that if a fee increase is inevitable, it's at least being cushioned so it doesn't become more of a barrier to entry. But students at Tuesday's town hall meeting—and across campus – are not very happy about another proposed increase.

"You can't solve this by raising fees," said sophomore Zac Bissonnette. "Fees get raised every year, and it doesn't solve the problem. You have to stop growing your bureaucracy."

I called Bissonnette to get his take on the current financial situation. He's just like any other UMass student who blogs for TheDailyBeast.com and recently landed a book deal.

"That was through my agent," he said. He wasn't kidding.

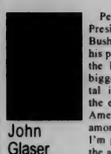
Bissonnette has been blogging about finance since he was in high school, and he recently used the money he earned from free-lancing to buy some real estate. He knows a little bit more about finances than my friends who budget their underwent because they spent their laundry money on beer.

I asked him how he thinks the budget cuts will impact the University and what he thinks the task force ought to do.

"Meetings are great, task forces are great, but eventually you just have to start firing people," he said. "That's how you cut your budget: you cut the fat."

"Google 'Long lines and red tape,'" Bissonnette said. "UMass is the first thing to come up."

Check it out yourself. Bloggers know how to google.



Whitehead said that an awful lot of "fat" is going to be cut, including teaching positions in all departments and colleges and positions in every nook and cranny across campus.

"If there's something that's considered off limits to cuts, I haven't been made aware of it," he said. "It's very important that the sacrifice be shared. Everybody's got to contribute a pint of blood."

But my colleague Ben Williams has a suggestion to generate revenue for a cash-strapped learning institution: Instead of stocking up on Odwalla bars in the Blue Wall this week, donate your extra YCMP swipes to the University.

A tale of two GOPs

John Glaser

People wonder what President George W. Bush's legacy will be; his post-9/11 manifest, the Iraq war and the biggest governmental interventions into the economy in all of American history, are among the cursory list. I'm partial to none of the above.

George Bush and his reign will likely be looked upon by history as having ushered in the total destruction of the Republican Party. In the ways that it has been known for decades, the Grand Old Party is on the cusp either of termination or of a transformation so fundamental it will cease to resemble its precursor.

With historically low approval ratings and the rejection by many leading conservatives, some argue this prediction is erroneous because Bush does not and has not represented the party duly, thus will its prominence endure.

Others blame his party's dire state on "unavoidable" happenings of chance in the period of his presidency. Still others cite political trends as the cause of the sweeping Democratic victory this past election, like Reagan's defeat of Carter as a demonstrable repudiation of failed Democratic policies.

The un-Republican-like Bushisms of these past eight years is what I think has triggered the beginning of the end of the Republican Party: big (and growing) government, the expansion of social programs, distrust of markets, needless and unprovoked war, bailouts and the failure to uphold the values that religious conservatives prize are all hallmarks of Bush's presidency and all departures from traditional conservatism.

Republicans now stand for nothing, due precisely to the past eight years of embracing anything Bush's erratic, impulsive exploits decreed indispensable.

Religious fundamentalists in America's heartland who have advocated constitutional amendments for abortion and marriage and harbor a much different interpretation of the church and state clause than most mainstream Americans have been placated by Bush and his cronies and are disillusioned.

The fiscally responsible, limited-government arm of the party whose existence was rejuvenated and salvaged by Reagan's ultimately empty rhetoric has also been abandoned. Hardly any Republican even pays lip service to this thwarted group thanks to Bush's leadership towards the opposite ideal.

And then the war-mongering foreign policy hawks overwhelmed the traditional conservatives, historically wary of military intervention, and hijacked the party, thus leaving all the aforementioned principles of Republicanism to drift wherever the tides would take them, which have turned out to be toward incongruous rapids.

The deterioration of Republicanism was facilitated by Bush's abandonment of it.

How could one administration take over an entire political idea? There exists tremendous pressure, the submission to which is unforgivable, to follow the president as the party leader, to toe the party line despite its deviations from orthodoxy.

This loyalty to Bush, who has proven to be neither Republican nor Democrat, liberal nor conservative, but just a new breed of wrong, has left the whole of the party confused, disillusioned and dumbstruck at the prospect of proceeding along these new ideological trajectories.

Republicans still occasionally regurgitate trite party rhetoric, but as they do so their eyes gloss over, seeming pitifully lost and detached and even less genuine than average politicians. Without a stable and defined political leadership to set the agenda, they have but nothing for which to stand.

Gallup has been tracking the declining percentage of the electorate that consider themselves strictly Republican; in mid-November it was at 26 percent. They've abandoned their party label, which Bush has usurped and laid claim to without their permission. The key here is that voters tend to stray away from that sort of soulless desperation, that sort of lost aim of any perceived noble objective.

This was evident in Obama's campaign; people responded to ambition, clarity of purpose and direction, conviction (despite, of course, Obama's subsequent hurried attempts to temper supporters' expectations and modulate his ideological bent).

Republicans now stand for nothing, due precisely to the past eight years of embracing anything Bush's erratic, impulsive exploits decreed indispensable. Unless their recent defeats ignite a reactionary restoration of the movement's fundamental pillars, it will mean ultimate ruin for the party America has recognized for decades.

If the Republican Party simply transforms into a separate dominant faction of Bush-like ideologues (despite the near impossibility of defining just what that ideology is) and somehow garner a revolutionized major voting constituency, America's salvation will be nearly unreachable. But if it breaks up and members and voters alike initiate something America has lacked for decades – an authentic difference in what the major parties offer – we could now be on the brink of a new beginning.

It almost pains me to say it, but in this way, Bush's legacy still has the potential to induce positive change for the future.

Great misconceptions

Zamil Akhtar

Exactly 60 years ago today, the Universal Declaration for Human Rights (UDHR) was adopted by the United Nations General Assembly. It was "the first universal statement on the basic principles of inalienable human rights," containing within it articles that define the equality of humanity, and the right to life and liberty that each human is entitled to.

Two weeks ago today, the world witnessed a sickening transgression of human rights, in the city of Mumbai, India. Ten gunmen rampaged through the city, killing people en masse, as if no one had any right to life and peace.

They didn't stop until 188 people had been killed, and many more had been injured, giving up their own lives to bathe the city in blood. They butchered so many human beings in the name of their religion, in the name of Islam.

These teachings are the reasons why Muslims stand firm on their faith, even after such grotesque attacks have been committed in its name.

As people who believe in the human rights enshrined by the UDHR, we question: why? Why does Islam fuel such behavior? Why do more than a billion people believe in a religion that has inspired such atrocities? Why not instead believe in something that is tolerant, non-violent and humane? The answer is found in studying what the religion actually teaches.

Fourteen-hundred years before the existence of the UDHR, the Prophet Muhammad taught people how to treat each other.

"All creatures are God's children, and those dearest to God are those who treat His children kindly," he said.

This wasn't limited to mere philosophy. During 23 years of struggle to establish Islam, Muhammad showed his followers how to live this teaching by word and deed. Muslims were taught their rights and responsibilities in every field of life, from marriage to warfare. In the Quran, it was revealed, "Fight in the way of God against those who fight you, but begin not hostilities. Lo! God loveth not the aggressors."

Wars were fought in self-defense, but even when engaged in warfare, strict limits were imposed.

"Do not mutilate dead bodies; neither kill a child, nor a woman, nor an aged man; bring no harm to trees; do not slay the enemies' flock, leave alone people engaged in worship," were among the tenets commanded by the first Caliph of Islam when he directed his generals.

The prohibition against killing innocents is especially serious. The Quran says, "If anyone killed a person - unless it was retaliation for murder or for spreading mischief in the land – it would be as if he killed all mankind. If anyone saves a life, it is as if he has saved all mankind."

Once after a battle, Muhammad saw a woman, of the enemy side, dead on the battlefield. He angrily objected, saying, "This woman was not fighting," and forbade the killing of noncombatants – reaffirming the inviolability of life in Islam.

But the terrorists who rampaged through the streets of Mumbai showed no regard for this. No matter how many times they chanted "Allahu akbar" (or "God is great"), their actions were in direct opposition to the teaching of the Prophet Muhammad.

Of the 188 people they murdered, 40 were Muslim, double the number of Westerners killed. We mustn't give credence to their claim that they were fighting for Islam by labeling them as "Islamic," when they were the farthest thing from it.

The Quran describes those who are truly righteous: "They give sustenance to the indigent, the orphan and the prisoner. (Saying) we feed you for the sake of God alone. No reward do we desire from you, nor thanks."

One prisoner said about his treatment by the early Muslims, "Whenever they had lunch or dinner, they used to give me preference by providing me with bread while they'd eat only dates, in compliance with the Prophet's order to treat prisoners well." This is the selflessness that defined the mission of the Prophet, in contrast to the senselessness we witnessed in Mumbai.

The Prophet said, "He who harms a non-Muslim, with whom there is peace, it is as if he has harmed me." No doubt, those who kill innocents in the name of Islam have harmed the Prophet by distorting his teachings. The terrorists in Mumbai were indiscriminate, seemingly killing everyone in sight, and discriminate at the same time, targeting Westerners and Jews specifically.

All life is sacred – the Prophet said, in his most famous sermon, "All mankind is from Adam and Eve. An Arab has no superiority over a non-Arab, nor does a non-Arab have any superiority over an Arab; white has no superiority over black, nor does a black have any superiority over white; [none have superiority over another] except by piety and good action."

These teachings are the reasons why Muslims stand firm on their faith, even after such grotesque attacks have been committed in its name.

It's startling to note that conversion to Islam surged after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. Such incidents bring the religion to scrutiny, and those who take the time to learn its reality will realize that the Prophet brought a creed of mercy and compassion, enshrining human rights over a thousand years before its time.

Perils of socialist professors

Jon Peterson

Proponents of Marxism often talk about how much better the world could be if it were to take their economic system up. Disparities in income prove that government control over wages and prices are necessary.

Socialist governments are also able to give their citizens things, like health care, and this proves that they are more generous and moral than their American counterparts. It's when points like these, from extreme and vocal professors, become common that popular perception shifts more toward socialism to try to find a moderate stance between the sides.

While such views are easy enough to talk about and theorize, there tends to be little done to analyze what has come from places where these stances are not theory, but reality.

The old saying goes that "those who can, do; those who can't, teach." While the majority of UMass' professors, and professors elsewhere, have spent lifetimes working professions that contribute and give worth to society as a whole – as business people, scientists, politicians and whatnot – there are also those who have spent their lives talking, rather than doing.

This is why to some, socialism sounds so good in theory, but why it is so dead wrong in reality: millions died of famine in Russia when price controls were enacted to control the cost of the food.

Price controls of Boston's apartments in the '70s similarly tried to make it easier for people to afford housing. However, the increased demand due to lower prices with a constant supply made one of the worst housing shortages in the city's history. Availability was generally around 4 percent, and it was nearly impossible to get a new apartment.

Canada is commonly seen as superior to the United States in terms of its health coverage. Government subsidized health care is abound, and people talk about going there to get lower priced medications. The grass seems greener on the other side of the border however, and while medications cost less to buy in Canada, studies have shown that it can take months to have simple procedures performed.

Most people would enjoy better lighting and carpets, but no one wants to pay higher taxes.

Because the people paid the same in taxes whether or not they used the services, their willingness to use the services became greater than if they were paying for them out of their own pockets.

When a person has a headache, they won't generally go first thing to the hospital – it's not a proportional response, as the risks associated with having a headache generally wouldn't be considered great enough to schedule an MRI or a PET scan.

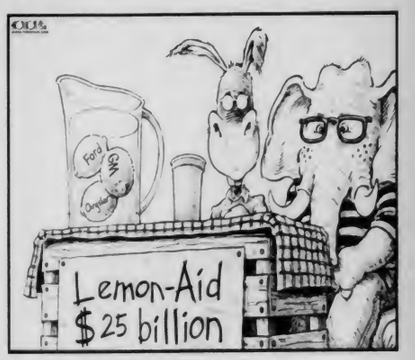
When people talk about socialism as being something to attain, they will talk about it as an ideal. Voltaire said that "the best is the enemy of the good," and when professors spend their time bashing business, Wall Street banks and hospitals, the things that give true value to our country, it becomes increasingly apparent that their theories may be somewhat out of touch with reality.

The recent Wall Street fiasco spurned our very own professor, Richard Wolff of the UMass economics department, to write and give his speech, "The Crisis of Capitalism, and a Socialist Response."

In what he described as his most popular speech of the past two decades, the professor states that he wants to "develop a socialist response to it. I just don't want to do it in theory I want to do it in actuality and the best way I know how to do that is to use the most highly developed theories for doing such things, which is Marxist theories."

Ironically enough, he begins his speech by thanking people for coming, and that among other things he wished it was "better lit, that the carpet didn't look like a barn, but then again, this is a public institution, and we're lucky that we have any lights at all, and probably in a couple months we won't have any lights at all."

If it were up to the professor, the schools may very well be better funded by the taxpayers, but where could the line be drawn?



Most people would enjoy better lighting and carpets, but no one wants to pay higher taxes. Economics is based on the principle of unlimited want and needs, but with limited resources to satisfy. We would all like to trade in our small, somewhat hard mattresses for king-size foam mattresses, but not everyone wants to pay that much for one.

The presentation continues with the professor describing how international bankers and business people have conspired for decades to create an international debt machine, tying people to the businesses they have worked for, lending and collecting money back from people.

"The business community has spent the last 50 years perfecting every technique there is known to turn the population against regulation as its enemy, and they are going to go right to work doing again, what they have not learned to do, and they will do it better and they will do it faster. They are experts at it. So to set up a new regime of regulation is to set up something that will be real easy to knock down."

This all goes to question though, how great is the value in such people striving toward their ideals as the professor does with socialism? It depends on how much good can come of the striving, but when there is the possibility of people dying in famines, waiting months for a checkup, or creating what he himself describes as a "regime of regulation," it seems more likely that they are too wound up in theory, and again, out of touch with reality.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Editorial@DailyCollegian.com

RIGHT TO MARRY

Dear Editor

(Re: "Love, protest and Proposition 8," Ben Moriarty, Editorial, Nov 24)

I wanted to voice an issue that I found with Mr. Moriarty's article 'Love,' protest and Proposition 8. I find it interesting that he claims that the LDS Church "are acting out of love."

That may very well, in fact, be the case, regardless of the "what you do is wrong" rhetoric of this and numerous other Christian anti-gay rights churches.

However, the problem with this argument is the presupposition that it is right for one group to assume they have the correct ideology and thus use any means necessary to affect change over others.

I could care less what the LDS Church thinks about homosexuality, or for that matter African-Americans, who they have been historically racist against, but refuse to be subject to their religious fervor and self-righteousness.

Furthermore, as marriage is a legal union, upon which are hedged numerous benefits both civilly and in the abstract, the church, any church, has no place in the governmental realm.

Thus to this end, I fully support the protests outside of the LDS Churches through out the country. It is my hope that a sleeping dragon, that of the gay rights movement, has been awakened and galvanized.

Furthermore, I think that his choice of words here – "hijack the concept of 'love'" – is ridiculously alarmist. Let's not forget which group's "concept of 'love'" is the dominant one.

Speaking of love, he claims that the members of the Mormon Church are the ones acting out of it in this case because "they know they will be called bigots and hateful nuts by following their consciences to do what they believe is best."

According to that logic, then you could also claim that gay people are acting out of love since we are "following our consciences" even though we know that our actions will invite all manner of name-calling. And many of the names that we are called are far worse than "hateful nuts."

Whether or not he supports same-sex marriage is beside the point, and I'm not writing to convince him of the "rightness" or "wrongness" of his political opinions.

Rather, I am asking him to reflect on the way he views gay people. We are not a monolithic group. Nor are Mormons for that matter. As a writing teacher and as a person who is affected by the things he have written, I urge him to avoid falling back on stereotypes when he constructs an argument.

I also urge him – both in writing and in life – not to base his conclusions about a group on the words of one Web site, one person, or one organization. Not only are such moves unduly harmful to the larger group he is writing about, they also suggest that his argument lacks substance and credibility.

Finally, I'd appreciate it if he didn't refer to us as "the gays." We're not an athletic team. And we may be gay, but we are plenty of other things too.

Michael Tsapatsaris
UMass student

Dear Editor:

I recently read Ben Moriarty's editorial in The Daily Collegian entitled "'Love,' protest and Proposition 8." While I respect his right to his opinion on the issue of same-sex marriage, I must state that as a gay man I take offense to certain passages in his article.

At one point, for example, he questions the effectiveness of the upcoming "Day Without a Gay" event – in which gay people are planning to protest oppression by calling out of work – by commenting "As if the religious ever needed someone to help them dress or decorate their house." Mr. Moriarty, I am not an interior decorator or a fashion designer. I am a writer, a teacher and a tutor. My male partner of five and a half years is a pharmacy technician and a graphic design artist.

While I agree that the "Day Without a Gay" Web site's claim that a day without gays is tantamount to "a day without love" is hyperbolic and, frankly, insensitive on their part, I fail to see how painting the entire GLBT community with an enormous, stereotypical brush addresses the issue at hand.

I am also bothered by the fact that he admits in his editorial that www.daywithoutgay.org was "the only place [he] went to for information," and yet he seems to feel qualified to state that "the gays are now trying to hijack the concept of 'love,'" as if one Web site spoke for our entire community.

A VETERAN AFFAIR

Dear Editor:

(Re: "Bellard lecture highlights Veterans' Awareness Week" Emily Reynolds, News, Nov. 17)

On page three of the Nov. 17 edition of The Daily Collegian the secondary headline for the article entitled "Bellard lecture highlights Veterans' Awareness Week" as shown in print is, "True vet caps week of remembrance."

To the editors, I am curious how this secondary headline was chosen. Using the comparative "true vet" begs a question of intent not at all explored or answered in the article. The question is, of course, what is a true vet? Or more importantly, what is an untrue vet? Did the editor responsible for this title mean, "Actual vet caps week of remembrance?" or is Bellard more veteraaly than other veterans? I am confused.

SGA ACCOUNTABILITY

Dear Editor

First off, as someone who was deeply involved in coordinating the voter registration drive that the Student Government Association (SGA) association was a part of, I would like to sincerely apologize to any student who was not able to vote on Election Day.

In addition I would like to thank the dozens of volunteers who worked tirelessly registering students to vote, checking, sorting, and sending forms. The SGA's voter registration drive registered 1,000 people to vote, and sent out over 300 absentee ballots, this would not have been possible without the work of our amazing volunteers.

For the sake of transparency around the SGA's voter registration drive I would like to outline the process that the SGA used to register student voters.

The SGA, in coalition with other groups on campus, used classroom announcements, tabling and a voter registration table in the SGA office to collect voter registration forms.

Each form was checked for errors, sorted by location, stamped and sent out no later than the Massachusetts Voter Registration Deadline of Oct. 15. When an incorrect form was discovered we tried to contact the registree.

If a student had put their phone number on the form we called the registree multiple times. If there was no phone number on the form, volunteers looked the students up on 'People Finder,' and sent out two rounds of e-mails to ensure that each registree had an opportunity to fix their forms before the Oct. 15 deadline.

Unfortunately in large voter registration drives it is not uncommon for people to occasionally have trouble voting. Once again we extend our most heartfelt apologies to anyone who was not able to vote on Election Day. We make no excuses for the mistakes made and would gladly speak with any concerned student.

HATE SPEECH

Dear Editor:

(Re: "Militant gay-rights activists strike out," Alana Goodman, Editorial, Nov 14)

I am appalled that The Daily Collegian is allowed to publish this. I am fully in support of others' opinions in print, even if I don't agree with them. However, when that transfers over to hate-speech, there's a problem.

What right does Miss Goodman have to judge a whole contingent of people she barely knows? These comments are indicative of a person who clearly does not know many people who are LGBT.

Slandering people in print is wrong, and writing a letter to the editor is just giving her what she wants, but honestly, I can't stay silent about this. To everyone who thinks that Proposition 8 was a good thing, something to be happy about. I hope you're proud of yourselves.

You're all collectively hateful individuals and you have no sense of human compassion. Why does this matter? Why is it even a political issue? Why does it even fall into the category of liberal conservative, or Republican/Democrat? It's about people, and being happy.

Plus, Miss Goodman failed to mention the good things that can come out of gay marriages. Money. If people are getting married, there's money being put into the economy and generally, if people are happier (in other words if they have equal rights) their work output will be greater.

Seriously, Miss Goodman. Stop this. You are a hateful, ignorant individual, and I am ashamed that we share writing as a passion, because you use it to hurt, not to inspire.

Dear Editor

As an alumnus of a great school whose daily newspaper I loved as a student, I am utterly disgusted by the piece written by Alana Goodman, "Militant gay-rights activists strike out" and now think lesser of The Daily Collegian and to a lesser extent, my alma mater. Hopefully, an editorial apology will be forthcoming. I know I won't even open anymore fund raising letters until I see one.

A RIGHT IS A RIGHT

Dear Editor

(Re: "Gay is not the new black," Brad DeFlumeri, Editorial, Nov 19)

This is for anybody out there who thinks "gay is not the new black" and that the right to marry doesn't fall under the category of civil rights. It's for anybody who worries about pro-gay marriage activists using "fear and hysteria" to seek marriage rights. It's for anybody who believes that we shouldn't allow gay marriage because there's "no compelling societal benefit."

If gays are granted the right to marry each other, what is it to you? There's no need to be afraid. Nobody's going to take anything away from you or hurt you. They're not asking you to applaud homosexuality. All they want is to marry in a society that's supposed to grant equal rights. In the '60s, civil rights activists fought for an end to segregation and discrimination.

Today, gay rights activists seek equality and justice, and nobody is "belittling" the heroes of the civil rights movements by drawing comparisons between the stubborn political system, prejudiced majorities, and social inequality that both groups have faced.

The real question is, will America make it as difficult for gays to gain their rights as it did for blacks? Or will we ignore the lessons from our past injustices and continue to deny equal rights?

The fact that most states continue to deny the right to gay marriage, which you believe is "for good reason," actually deepens the connection between today's debate and the civil rights movement.

We're talking about the traditional definition of marriage, between a man and a woman. Believe it or not, marriage used to be defined as between a white man and a white woman. If our country had never redefined marriage, black people would never have been allowed to marry each other. And if we hadn't redefined marriage again, in some states as late as the 1960's, black people still couldn't marry white people.

And as for the reproduction factor? We know you're still concerned that gay marriage would threaten society's "ability to produce new life." It's the 21st century after all, and reproductive technology is nothing new.

Sure, they may not be traditional, but baby-making via surrogacy and in vitro fertilization happens all the time in straight couples with fertility problems.

And guess what? Gay couples use the same methods to make babies too, and have been for years. There's only one thing missing: the option for a legal marriage between the two parents, a marriage which would prevent problems with custody, estates, and power of attorney in the event that one partner becomes ill or dies.

So while there are plenty of differences between the civil rights movement and the present debate over gay marriage, a right is still a right. Our country was set up to protect minorities of every kind and every size. As part of the majority, nobody should have the right to alienate the rights of black people, gay people, or any other minority.

Staged reading to showcase activist's story

UMass theater department to host production highlighting Baird's efforts

BY ELIZABETH WAHLMAN
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Theater in all of its forms has many purposes. It can tell a story, teach a lesson or remind us of what we take for granted. The theater department at the University of Massachusetts teaches its students to do all of that. Next weekend, a production will open that tells the story of something we take for granted, teaching a history lesson that has roots at UMass.

"Menace to Society" is a staged reading that tells the story of Bill Baird, a pro-choice activist determined to make contraception available to all people. His efforts, activism, and arrests led him to be called a "menace to society."

Development of the show began with history professor Dr. Joyce A. Berkman. Berkman wanted to produce a dramatization about the history of reproductive rights for many years, but had many obstacles in her way.

This year, she was the recipient of the College of Humanities and Fine Arts Visioning Grant, which allowed her to bring this play to life and share it with the community. Along the way, she received help from members of the history, legal studies, women's studies, creative writing, theater and Special Collections and Archives departments.

"As hard as it is for many people to talk about issues of race, it's even harder for many people to talk about issues of sexuality, such as abortion," said professor Berkman. "I thought it'd be great to have a play based on this experience that would bring to the floor questions about the history of reproductive rights."

Bill Baird's career in social activism started in 1963, when he worked as the clinical director for birth control foam manufacturer EMKO. While organizing some research at a New York City hospital, he witnessed an event that would forever change the course of his life and that of reproductive rights.

While at the hospital, Baird suddenly heard a woman's scream from a corridor. He ran over, and saw a young woman covered in blood from the waist down, as an eight inch piece of a wire coat hanger protruded from her vulva. The woman eventually died from the self-induced abortion.

Outraged at the event, Baird wanted to know why women couldn't access safe forms of contraception. He learned that it was illegal for unmarried women to obtain birth control and that education about the subject was extremely difficult to find. Even advertising birth control was illegal, as it was thought to promote promiscuity.

Baird took matters into his own hands, and started educating people on his own. Baird was criticized by many people, even many feminists. His radical strategies were not smiled upon and were considered an "embarrassment" to the reproductive justice movement.

On April 6, 1967, Baird spoke at Boston University to a crowd of over 2,500 people. Baird gave a presentation on abortion, contraception and reproductive justice. The presentation in itself caused enough of a commotion, however when he handed out one condom and a package of EMKO contraceptive foam to an unmarried female student, Baird was immediately arrested. He was charged with a Crime against Chastity, which could carry a prison sentence of up to five years, and was sentenced to three months in the rat-infested Charles Street Jail, one of the worst in the nation at the time.

In 1968, Baird continued his fight to decriminalize contraception. He received much of his support from college students, UMass Amherst students in particular – they were signing his petitions to get contraception legalized in Massachusetts. Baird spoke at the Student Union on April 11, 1968, which prompted The Daily Collegian to print a special morning edition of the paper. Baird spoke at UMass and at Zayre's Department Store in Hadley, raising awareness and support in Western Massachusetts.

On March 22, 1972, Justice William Brennan said these fateful words during the landmark Supreme Court case, Baird v. Eisenstadt:

"If the right of privacy means anything, it is the right of the individual, married or single to be free from unwarranted governmental intrusion into matters so fundamentally affecting a person as the decision to bear or beget a child."

On this day, contraception became legalized in the United States.

The history of reproductive rights in America is a very interesting topic with many twists and turns along its journey. "Menace to Society" talks openly about the subject which was and still is taboo. It is something that affects all human beings, and yet can rarely be talked about in polite company. This is something that this generation is trying to change.

"Menace to Society" will be performed on December 12 and 13 at 7:30 PM in The Curtain Theater. Tickets are $5 for the general public and $3 for students and seniors.

Independent Film Production Club gains RSO status

On Thursday, Dec. 4, the Independent Film Production Club officially achieved RSO status at UMass.

BY SHELBY LANDECK
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The University of Massachusetts Independent Film Production Club achieved the status of a Registered Student Organization on Thursday, Dec. 4.

The club was founded at the beginning of the semester by students Miles Disney and Kate Antognini.

Antognini, who recently transferred to UMass from Oberlin College, saw that the campus lacked an organized film club like the one she was involved with at Oberlin.

"We were surprised that none existed here. Apparently there was a UMass Film Club, which had the same concept but never got off the ground last year," she said.

This semester the club has come together quickly.

"I'm really impressed with the turn out for the group," said Ben Leonberg, a UMass senior and avid filmmaker. "I'm excited about how many people are involved and the networking opportunities that have come out of it."

The group has held meetings every Sunday at 4 p.m. and is looking for a larger room to gather in for the upcoming semester.

"The meetings have been really helpful," Leonberg said. "It's great to meet up with a bunch of people who are interested in doing the same thing as you, and everyone kind of helps out on different projects."

Miles Disney has also become very active in film projects because of the group.

"I appeared in Ben Leonberg's movie, which was shot for the Apple Insomnia Film Festival [which was canceled]," Disney said. "In addition I am helping several members on their film ideas. Over the break I will be helping Alexander Freeman shoot a documentary and I am also working on a screenplay about post-apocalyptic beat-boxing savages," Disney said.

"The group is just a great way to find people that will help you make your ideas, even crazy ones, into realities," Leonberg said.

"The group doesn't have a great amount of plans for over the winter break outside of working on screenplays to shoot next semester," Disney said.

The Facebook group, "UMass Independent Film Production Club," has 64 members, and there has been a regular turnout of about 14 people to the Sunday meetings.

"We are also looking for pitches and screenplays to produce so people can get involved by providing content to the club," Disney said.

TV classics are coming to town

BY CHUCK BARNEY
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

WALNUT CREEK, Calif. — Karen Nicles isn't ashamed to admit it. Even after countless viewings, she still gets a little lump in her throat whenever Charlie Brown bonds with that poor, scrawny Christmas tree, and a bounce in her heart every time Rudolph lights up the night sky for Santa.

The 54-year-old Walnut Creek resident has been watching television's holiday-themed animated keepsakes for about three decades – first with her two daughters, now with a pair of grandsons. And somehow, it never gets old.

"It's just the thing to do in our family," she says. "Those classic shows take you to a place of innocence and magic – a place where you believe something big can happen."

She's clearly not the only one who feels that way. Every year when the holidays arrive, television programmers flood the airwaves with new specials and movies only to see most of them quickly get discarded like wads of crumpled gift wrap.

But a handful of oldies-but-goodies continue to cast a powerful yuletide spell. Animated specials such as "Rudolph the Red-Nosed Reindeer," "A Charlie Brown Christmas," "How the Grinch Stole Christmas," "Frosty the Snowman" and a few others hover over the forest like the vibrant evergreens they are, refusing to show their age and defying the shelf-life laws of pop culture.

"They are the inner circle. And it's a very tough club to break into," says Dave Barton Thomas, a veteran director of animation who has the challenge of introducing a new special – "A Miser Brothers Christmas" – on ABC Family later this month.

Last December, "Rudolph," a show that debuted in 1964, was television's fourth-rated program during the week it aired. It finished behind only "CSI," "Grey's Anatomy" and "60 Minutes." Also, "A Charlie Brown Christmas," penned by the late Charles Schulz in 1965, was No. 1 in its time slot and proved to be the highest-rated broadcast of the year among children age 2-11.

Conversely, the new stuff just doesn't generate the same kind of interest, unless it's something like "Shrek the Halls," last November. "Shrek" decked the competition in its debut, attracting 21.1 million viewers. It was the first new holiday special in years to display breakout appeal.

"Shrek," of course, benefitted from the recognition factor that comes with being connected to a wildly popular feature-film franchise. But it will have to lure the viewers to return year after year before it can achieve TV immortality. Otherwise, it might join the largely forgotten ranks of "A Garfield Christmas" (1987), "The Tangerine Bear" (2000), "The Happy Elf" (2005) and countless others.

So what is it about the animated staples that allows them to continue to exert Nielsen clout even though they've been out on home video for years, and kid viewers supposedly have become more "sophisticated"? What is it that makes them outshine newer, more "hip" holiday fare?

It could be largely a matter of timing, according to Lee Mendelson, the executive producer of "A Charlie Brown Christmas."

"All these specials came out when there were only three networks and much less competition. They were all popular and brands and they drew huge audiences when they debuted," he says. "Then the audience stuck with us and brought along their kids and grandkids."

Indeed, when "Charlie Brown" premiered, it was watched by almost 50 percent of the nation's viewers – a figure unheard of in today's fragmented 500-channel universe. "You just one shot and we stuck," says Mendelson.

But it's one thing to generate a huge opening audience and quite another to become, for many, as much a part of the holiday ritual as hanging stockings on the mantle and decorating a tree. Fans and experts point out that the best of the classics are beloved because they're distinctive offerings with a creative brilliance that has never quite been duplicated. They feature vivid characters, evocative scenes and memorable music. And they tend to get their points across without an excess of sap.

Credit the writing, says Rick Goldschmidt, an author and animation historian who is an expert on the old Rankin/Bass production company that created "Rudolph," "Frosty," "Santa Claus Is Coming to Town" and many others.

"The classic specials all started with good, simple but strong storytelling," he says. "They're all about heart and warmth. It's a far cry from the booger jokes and cheap laughs (in new shows). That's not what Christmas is all about and it's amazing that today's producers don't get that."

Thomas agrees, but adds that a lot of the old specials also featured a brash kind of "quirkiness" that is often missing from today's children's fare.

"Look at how 'Rudolph' portrayed Santa Claus as a grumpy old curmudgeon. I don't know if he would get written that way in our PC environment today. But that gave the story some character and punch. And it was funny."

Thomas also praises the old classics for their "quaster" approach.

"Back then they didn't feel the need to be so noisy and frenetic every five minutes," he says. "Sometimes I think we forget that, as storytellers, we don't have to be so tied to rapid cuts and pacing. 'Charlie Brown' is a great example of a very quiet show."

Thomas, 42, is in the unique position of bringing to prime time a special that is new, but derives its inspiration from the 1974 Rankin/Bass program "The Year Without a Santa Claus." In "The Miser Brothers' Christmas," Mickey Rooney returns to give voice to Santa, while George S. Irving reprises his role as the infamous Heat Miser.

"It's not really a sequel. It's a brand-new story," he says. "But I wanted the story to be absolutely faithful to the sensibility of those old shows.

"I hope we can take our place among the ranks of the best."

In order to do that, it might help if the show contains a highly original soundtrack as Mendelson's "Charlie Brown" special did.

"I still hear the music in stores all the time and it drives me insane," he says, laughing. "But its great advertising that reminds everyone the show is coming on. It's like a revolving door."

As for the timelessness of the story, Mendelson insists that Schulz simply had his finger on the pulse of the zeitgeist with the tale of an anxiety-ridden boy searching for the true meaning of Christmas among the rampant commercialism.

"He talked about eternal truths and how kids and people relate to each other," he says. "And he used to say there will always be an audience for innocence in this country."

"A Charlie Brown Christmas" is just one of many Christmas films to be featured during primetime this holiday season. When the special originally aired it was watched by 50 percent of the nation's viewers.

Sean Penn gives an Oscar-worthy performance as Harvey Milk in Gus Van Sant's "Milk."

Penn's 'Milk' rings true

Van Sant's bio-pic celebrates the life of first gay public figure

BY SHAYNA MURPHY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

In 1978, San Francisco City Supervisor Harvey Milk was gunned down in the corridors of City Hall, along with Mayor George Moscone.

Milk, 48 years-old and openly gay, was the first to be elected to public office in the United States. His assailant, former San Francisco City Supervisor Dan White, would later argue that his diet of Twinkies and junk food were to blame for the depression that caused him to commit the murders.

With "Milk," director Gus Van Sant ("Good Will Hunting") takes the story history created and runs with it, spinning it into a masterful opus. Van Sant isn't focused on memorializing the life of a fallen gay rights activist – although his film certainly does that – he's more interested in celebrating it.

When the movie opens, Harvey (Sean Penn) is a closeted New York insurance researcher. Feeling the effects of middle age looming, he decides to flee for a more bohemian life in southern California. He ends up on Castro Street, a gay-friendly section of San Francisco.

The city still feels like a war zone in some respects, segregated by territories labeled gay or straight. At Castro Camera, the shop Harvey opens soon after moving to the neighborhood, a local businessman shakes his hand and promptly pulls out a handkerchief. Harvey isn't welcome here, he says, as he wipes his hand clean. And if Harvey knows what's good for him, he'll crawl back under the rock from whence he came.

The gay community may not have muscle in the mainstream, but as patrons of local business, its influence is immense. In short order, Harvey becomes the unofficial "Mayor of Castro Street," by virtue of his ability to mobilize members of the gay community. This stirs up in him a desire for higher office. Climbing atop his soap box before less than a dozen people, he declares his candidacy for the office of city supervisor.

With the exception of Anne Kronenberg (Alison Pill), who later becomes Harvey's campaign manager, lesbians seem to fall largely out of Van Sant's film.

Emile Hirsch is sensational as Cleve Jones, a teenage hustler Harvey picks up off the street and sets to work on his campaign.

At first, Harvey has trouble gaining headway beyond the Castro. He runs for office a few times and fails to secure enough votes for the win. With his wavy chestnut mane tied back in a pony tail and his chest hair peeping out from the plunging neckline of his shirt, he seems ill-cast for a role in public office. Still, Harvey proceeds undeterred.

An issue with the biopic (and any biopic, mind you, even one as experimental as last year's "I'm Not There") is that it's often more fun to hang around the film early, during the nesting stages of the story. Once the film starts to settle into the glory years, it can begin to lose its vibrancy. "Milk" is at its most vibrant during Harvey's early days in the Castro. Yet even as "Milk" turns to politics, the film stays compelling. Van Sant seamlessly integrates archival footage of the period into the narrative.

As a mere idealist, Harvey wouldn't venture far. With a dash of luck and a fortuitous shift in city districting, he morphs from radical outsider to viable contender for office. Once he wins, Van Sant shows Harvey as a consummate, sometimes Machiavellian-style politician. He grows more aware of his public image as the film progresses, learning how to strum the heart strings of his support base.

"My name is Harvey Milk, and I'm here to recruit you," he says at the beginning of a speech. The first time he opens with this line, it packs a powerful punch. By the second time you understand it's all a part of Harvey's carefully crafted approach.

Craft is lacking from his personal life, which seems the stuff of high drama and occasional farce. Harvey goes through men in the film, beginning with Scott (James Franco), whom he picks up early at a New York City subway station. Later, actor Diego Luna stumbles onto the screen as all flights and coquettish to become Harvey's second lover. But Luna is just filling the void and knows it. Neither are

Vaughn misses the mark with another yuletide blunder

BY JENNIFER TURNER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

When the highlight of a movie-going experience is the previews, that says little for the film itself.

In the case of "Four Christmases," the studio bosses would have been better off screening an hour-and-a-half loop of the trailer for "He's Just Not That Into You." It would have been a field day compared to sitting through the train wreck that was "Four Christmases."

The movie sounded rather promising. Vince Vaughn is almost always entertaining, even in the stupidest of roles – but even at his best he couldn't save this nightmare.

The flimsy plot involves Brad and Kate (Vaughn and Reese Witherspoon), a couple who are in the habit of avoiding their families at Christmas. After their tropical vacation plans fall through, they are committed to visiting each parent at different times on Christmas Day. Since both Brad and Kate's parents are divorced, this means four different Christmas celebrations.

Sounds simple enough, right?

Dysfunctional family hijinks are usually fairly humorous. However, this is not the case in "Four Christmases." Although there are a few chuckle-worthy moments, it was an overall snooze fest. The viewer will spend more time rolling their eyes at the absurdity than actually laughing.

The story is so full of continuity holes that it seemed more like watching four separate vignettes instead of a feature film. The timeline was exceedingly inaccurate and it actually took focus away from the movie.

The movie was supposed to take place almost entirely on Christmas Day – a day that has only approximately 10 hours of daylight at best, yet somehow on San Francisco's Christmas Day in the land of "Four Christmases," daylight never seems to end.

Lack of bite hampers 'Twilight'

Teen vampire flick survives with strong supporting acting

BY HANNAH NELSON
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Every teen girl and her mother has seen, read or at least heard of Stephenie Meyer's "Twilight" series, the love story of a mortal human, Bella Swan (Kristen Stewart) and an immortal vampire, Edward Cullen (Robert Pattinson). The cinematic adaptation is likely to shock a lot of loyal fans in light of the huge amount of buzz that started even before filming and peaked during the production.

Hyped up to be the next big Hollywood sensation, "Twilight" hardly comes across on screen as a blockbuster, which isn't necessarily a bad thing. This is due to the creative hand of director Catherine Hardwicke ("Thirteen," "Lords of Dogtown"). From the opening scenes of the movie's gloomy setting of Forks, Wash., Hardwicke's wider experience as a production designer is quite evident in her filming style. There are moments when it is hard to believe the movie is going to evolve into a vampire romance, with the low-budget feel of an independent film.

Hardwicke's style is particularly noticeable from Bella's melancholy voiceovers which become a saving grace for the first half of the film. This is an addition that makes the movie feel complementary to the books considering the series is told almost entirely through the first person narrative of Bella. Unfortunately the inescapable gush of Bella and Edward's dialogue was not lost in translation.

The main musical theme of the movie was more than reminiscent of a B-movie attempted thriller and is the most obvious downfall of the movie as a whole; even the much anticipated "Bella's Lullaby" fails to meet expectations. The only real relief is through several scattered vocals that were written and performed by Pattinson. It isn't until about halfway through the movie that the soundtrack starts to improve, and matched with a superhuman baseball game and a ballet studio climax makes it clear that the second half of the movie carries the cheese that dominates much of the first half.

The success of the baseball scene, one of the best, is largely due to the

Five features that delivered

BY SHAYNA MURPHY

It's dangerous to compile a list like this so early in the film year. By early, I mean by Oscar standards. How can a "Best of the Year" list not include such sure-fire hits as Sam Mendes' "Revolutionary Road," or "Doubt," the adaptation of John Patrick Shanley's prized morality parable? And what of Darren Aronofsky's upcoming "The Wrestler," with its much-buzzed performance by comeback kid, Mickey Rourke?

All we can do is speculate from a distance.

Lists like this are also subject to whatever the writer has seen or not seen (for instance, I still haven't seen "Cloverfield;" tear my imaginary student film critic card to shreds now). Despite these limitations, the following is a list of five strong films and trends present in cinema this year.

"FROZEN RIVER"

Courtney Hunt's voyage across the snowy tundra separating upstate New York from Quebec [illegible] bountiful. The first-time director garnered awards at the Sundance Film Festival for the film.

For Ray (Melissa Leo), the cost hasn't done much to chip away at her resolve to make a better life for herself and her boys. But between her no-account husband and dead-end job at a dollar mart, Ray's visions of domestic bliss seem [illegible] beyond reach.

So what's this weathered lady to do? Offer to use her car as a shuttle service for illegal immigrants, of course. As she makes her way over the frozen St. Lawrence River with her precious cargo, danger seems imminent. Will she be able to make her way safely across the ice, or is the bottom cracking out from under her?

"ROMAN POLANSKI: WANTED AND DESIRED"

Many know his films (from 1968's "Rosemary's Baby" to the 1974 film-noir "Chinatown") but few know the full story behind director Roman Polanski's exodus from the United States. In 1978, Polanski was charged with a felony count of unlawful sex with a 13-year-old girl. On the friend can really hold a candle next to Harvey's passion for the cause.

There's also Harvey's fateful relationship with Dan White (Josh Brolin) to take into account. The relationship orbits around the final third of the film, with tensions hinted at throughout. White finds his own ambitions thwarted as Harvey ascends the ladder of political importance. This isn't much of a shocker – conservative politicians of White's ilk seem like a dime a dozen. Yet for all his uniformity, White doesn't seem to have many friends. He embraces Harvey, who is eager to build connections in the straight world.

Harvey Milk has been the subject of other films, notably the Academy Award-winning documentary "The Times of Harvey Milk" directed by Hampshire College alumnus Rob Epstein.

The only sour note about "Milk" is its finale. Van Sant maintains his distance up until the very end, before his feelings finally get the better of him. The final scenes of "Milk" are staged with too much knowing, with an eye turned toward the tragedy to come.

Death feels like a supporting member of the cast in "Milk." Death is the hazy figure stalking Harvey as he treads down the sidewalks of the Castro at night. Death is the unseen danger that makes him gulp as he approaches a podium. Harvey jokingly pins his death threats to his refrigerator, reasoning that his fear can't hound him if he keeps it out in the open. Still, he knows it's only a matter of time before death catches up with him.

"Milk" helps establish the history of the LGBT movement in California. The timing of its release couldn't have more chilling significance than now, in the wake the Golden State's residents voting in favor of Proposition 8, which limits the definition of marriage to the union between one man and one woman.

With as much as it is allowed, the film depicts the struggle for gay rights as the defining civil rights issue of its time. One wonders what Harvey could have done had he not been struck down so early in his political career – had he been given more time.

Harvey may not have been the ideal face to lead the gay rights movement into the mainstream – his life is a messy one, as Van Sant illustrates well, full of human frailty. But as the film illustrates, the movement needed someone, or something, to sound the rallying cry for change, and he steps up to all of necessity.

"This is our lives we're fighting for," Harvey says in White, before the film's bitter climax. And for once, this doesn't seem like screenplay hyperbole.

Thirty years later, the fight still isn't finished.

eve of his sentencing, Polanski fled the country, heading first to London and then to France, where he remains to this day.

This HBO documentary delivers other angles – that of a judge enamored with media attention, and of a mother hungry for a slice of Hollywood infamy, even at the cost of her daughter's innocence. "Wanted and Desired" doesn't clear Polanski of his crimes, but it does cast a question mark over the legal proceedings that followed.

"REDBELT"

David Mamet's martial arts tale hot ties to the noble Samurai films of times past, but revises the genre by placing a premium on intellect rather than physicality. Ostensibly made for stars as a principled Los Angeles-based jiu-jitsu guru forced to compete in one of the city's televised competitions.

For Lanfor, Jiu-Jitsu is a pathway to enlightenment, not to pummeling. Curious characters teeter on the sidelines – Tim Allen as a veteran star saved from a bartroom brawl and Emily Mortimer as a mealy-mouthed pupil. "Redbelt" may be one of the least aggressive martial arts films ever made, but it's also a deftly executed one.

"FOUR CHRISTMASES" SARAH MARSHALL

Judd Apatow's hit factory churned out another gem this spring, this one starring "Freaks and Geeks" alumnus Jason Segel as Peter Bretter, the movie's main character. Other entourage members also surface, including Paul Rudd as a spacey surf instructor, and Jonah Hill as a waiter obsessed with pop star Aldous Snow (British comedian Russell Brand).

Segel takes off on a Hawaiian vacation after he is unceremoniously dumped by his TV star girlfriend (Kristen Bell). But a romance with a quirky islander (Mila Kunis) could mend his heartache. Targeting Sarah Marshall yields more of the raunchy romance that Apatow and company have made their hallmark.

"SEMI-PRO"

2008 was a banner year for our brave lads in hot crawls and full iron body armor.

The Dark Knight obviously rises to the head of the pack, with an Oscar likely going to the late Heath Ledger for his show-stealing performance as the Joker.

"Iron Man" helped kick off an excellent summer for Robert Downey Jr. while Edward Norton's pet project, "The Incredible Hulk" made up for the mistakes of Ang Lee's 2003 blunder. Not to be outdone, Guillermo del Toro's "Hellboy II: The Golden Army" stunned with a steady array of incredible visual effects.

When will a lady come out and join the ranks? If we're to believe hearsay, Warner Bros. is working tirelessly to bring "Wonder Woman" to the silver screen.

An honorable mention also goes out to Oliver Stone "W." may not be a great movie, but Josh Brolin strikes gold as Dubya. More importantly, Stone bucks with convention and tries something unexpected – he controls himself. His staunch contempt is reserved for the inner cabinet, particularly for Vice President Dick Cheney, played with suitable nefariousness by Richard Dreyfus.

Even if the story's main thrust is a poorly framed, publicly repudiated one ("high-grade, unadulterated hooey," President Bush's brother, Jeb, said of the film's father-son conflicts), its surprising. Stone could be this fair-handed. He even seems to carry some measure of compassion for the oft-maligned 43rd commander-in-chief. Who'd have thunk it?

A laughless Christmas

Is the viewer actually supposed to believe that it is possible to drive around to four different houses in the Bay area, spend at least three or four hours at each house while the sky is bright and sunny for the entire course of events? Not likely. Perhaps this wouldn't have been such a noticeable issue if the movie had been more entertaining, but it was undeniably dull.

There was zero chemistry between Vaughn and Witherspoon, and they were highly unbelievable as a couple. Witherspoon was much more subdued than her normal bubbly self and it resulted in a completely flat performance. The only humor in this film – and it was hard to find – was a direct result of Vaughn's willingness to try and save the scene.

It's shocking to think that stars with the caliber of Vaughn and Witherspoon actually signed on to this film, but they weren't the only impressive names. The blockbuster cast includes Jon Voight, Sissy Spacek, Robert Duvall and Mary Steenbergen – all of whom have won an Oscar for Best Actor/Actress. It baffles the mind to think that they all agreed to devote any time to this horrible movie. Guest spots by Jon Favreau, Kristin Chenoweth, Tim McGraw and Dwight Yoakam also failed to deliver any type of excitement.

Over-the-top stereotypes were used to show the audience the stark differences between the characters of Vaughn and Witherspoon and their respective families, but it was more offensive than funny. For example, seeing Robert Duvall play a no-manners, "white-trash" type was painful, and no doubt humiliating for him. It was hard to not feel sorry for the man, something the filmmakers had probably not intended.

How this film has managed to top the box office for the past two weeks is a complete mystery – it has grossed more than $46 million since its Thanksgiving week release.

Even if this movie is used as a simple diversion from homework or Christmas shopping, it isn't worth it. If a funny Christmas movie is needed, rent "Christmas Vacation" instead. Now that movie got it all right.

Jennifer Turner can be reached at jturner@student.umass.edu

Despite their strong track records, Vince Vaughn and Reese Witherspoon fail to show any chemistry in the new holiday comedy "Four Christmases."

Film adaptation offers new style

Muse's Supermassive Black Hole, an older cut from the British trio's 2006 album, "Black Holes and Revelations." Painfully absent throughout the movie was the latest single by Paramore, "Decode." It was written for the film and doesn't appear until the end credits. The only musical appearance by the group was "I Caught Myself" briefly heard in the background of a short scene.

Too often in the film the cinematography is intended to be creepy but ends up silly, with too many odd angles and choppy shots paired with the would-be-thriller's main theme. The less than outstanding special effects are appropriately downplayed and relatively easy to overlook. But the epitome of cringe comes with the biology classroom scene when Edward first catches Bella's scent, which is simply laughable. As Pattinson stated in an interview with Jay Leno, "it's hard to look pretty and scary at the same time," and in this scene it's clear what he was talking about. Overacting was a definite problem in the movie, but admittedly much of this can be pinned on the storyline's romance between Bella and Edward.

The film's supporting cast gives the movie an understated comedic outlet, such as the Forks High School students who easily steal all of their scenes. Especially entertaining is Billy Burke as Police Chief Charlie Swan, Bella's realistically concerned father, and Anna Kendrick as Jessica Stanley, Forks High's resident gossip girl who oozes the superficial stereotype in a surprisingly likable way.

As a treat to hardcore fans there's inside jokes that won't go unnoticed like Meyer's cameo, or the irony of Bella telling Angela (a Forks High friend) that she's "a strong independent woman" when advising her on boy troubles. One of the movie's major successes is the way it downplays many of Bella's more pathetic character tendencies, and is something that will prove to be even more of a challenge with the impending sequel, "New Moon," rumored to begin filming in January following the great opening week box office numbers.

"Twilight" leaves off on an ominous note, and reflects the pre-production confidence that there would in fact be a follow-up.

Hardwicke's style takes getting used to but once the viewer settles in, the unique touches are more than welcome. The only way that the movies can continue to rise above the lackluster quality of the paper and ink originals is if Hardwicke continues with the stylistic stamp she created for "Twilight" and steers clear of the Hollywood mainstream mold.

Minutemen look to avoid January slump

Team hopes to head into winter break with a victory

By Melissa Turtinen
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts hockey coach Don Cahoon is doing everything he can to prevent his team from falling apart like it did last season.

Friday's game against American International College will be the Minutemen's last game until Dec. 28, when they play in the Dartmouth Ledyard National Bank Classic. Their first opponent is Bemidji State and if they win, they will advance to the championship and play either Army or Dartmouth to finish out the 2008 portion of their season.

January brings a competitive schedule. UMass will host No. 10 Cornell on Jan. 4 and then play seven Hockey East games to finish out the month.

"[The game against Cornell is] a prelude to getting back into a strict Hockey East schedule which is going to determine our destiny," Cahoon said.

UMass will face New Hampshire (Jan. 9, 10), UMass-Lowell (Jan. 17) and Vermont (Jan. 23, 24), among others, during January. Cahoon and the rest of the Minutemen know that a successful month is crucial, especially after the fallout the team experienced in 2007-08.

The Minutemen won the Lightning College Hockey Classic at the end of December last season. After beating Colorado College 5-4 in overtime to win the tournament, they received their highest ranking in program history. The Minutemen entered their rigorous January schedule ranked No. 5, but dropped off the rankings as they went winless for the entire month (0-5-1).

"In January we just found ourselves losing one-goal games, and it wasn't that the other team beat us, it was that we beat ourselves," Cahoon said at the start of the season.

There are numerous reasons that led to the Minutemen's collapse last January, but Cahoon is trying to limit the preventable causes this season.

January is a difficult month for any team from a university that has an intersession. The Minutemen will return to UMass on Dec. 26 after a very short holiday break. Upon their return they will be some of the only students on campus. The team returns with a lot of free time and last season, when the team began to struggle, they failed to band together.

This season, Cahoon is orchestrating a different January schedule to avoid some of the problems that arose last season.

"[We are changing] our practice schedule around so there's more work once they get right out of bed in the morning – mandatory breakfast, workouts scheduled right away in the morning so they aren't hanging around during the day," Cahoon said.

Moving practices to the morning will prevent the team from staying up late and sleeping during the day before practice – instituting a schedule the team typically has during the semester. Many of the players are taking classes during the intersession and having free afternoons will give the players time to work on their studies or have personal time.

"That's one measure we're going to take," Cahoon said. "We think it can improve the quality of our practices, get them to be a little more alert earlier in the day, it's our attempt at addressing part of the problem, playing better will be the biggest factor."

UMass coach Don Cahoon has a new routine for the Minutemen during the month of January to hopefully prevent the rut the team couldn't get out of in the 2007-08 season.

Senior forward Alex Berry has six goals and nine assists this season, good for third on the team in points. The Minutemen host American International Friday at 7 p.m. at the Mullins Center.

UMass can't overlook AIC, must play a complete game

AIC has lost three in a row and four of its last five, including 11-1 and 6-0 thrashings at the hands of Mercyhurst and Union. The Yellow Jackets are a struggling team that hasn't won a postseason game since 2004, a victory over Army in the Atlantic Hockey Tournament. Before the win, AIC was winless in the postseason since the 1990 season.

The program, one of the weakest in Atlantic Hockey, boasts a group of players that aren't at the same level of those at UMass. 17-6-11, the Yellow Jackets sport players that, if anything, can make a game really difficult for their opponent.

"We need to play, we need to compete," Cahoon said. "We need to exhibit a level of enthusiasm that we were looking for over the last couple of weeks. When we played, well, we've had those kind of characteristics. When we haven't, we looked lethargic and indifferent, we need to get rid of that."

The Minutemen seem to have heart and energy one day, and the exact opposite the next. These up and down patterns have led UMass to defeat ranked teams like Boston University, North Dakota and Boston College, but fall to inferior opponents Merrimack and St. Lawrence.

The Yellow Jackets have dealt with struggles up and down their lineup, especially with goaltending. Like most college hockey clubs, AIC split time between goaltenders. Net-minders Dan Ramirez, Tim Lemon and Jake Anderson have a combined 4.09 goals-against average and a .890 save percentage.

With UMass' power-play also struggling as of late, this would be the perfect chance to get back on the scoring track against AIC's terrible penalty kill.

If the Minutemen want to stop themselves from taking the plunge in the standings in January like they did last year, the game against AIC is definitely a must-win and a great opportunity to turn around a normally woeful road.

Curry shakes off bad first half

By Ron Green Jr.
McClatchy Newspapers

NEW YORK – Somewhere Jimmy V was smiling Tuesday night.

Because Davidson's Stephen Curry never ever gave up.

In an event honoring the former N.C. State basketball coach whose inspirational "never give up" speech was played on the big scoreboard hanging inside Madison Square Garden at halftime, Curry shook off one of the most frustrating offensive performances of his career to take his own star turn on a famous stage.

With the Wildcats trailing West Virginia by four points in the final 90 seconds, Curry hit consecutive 3-pointers – one from the left side, the other from the right – to push the No. 23 Wildcats to a 68-65 victory against the Mountaineers.

Until he lit up the New York night in a nearly full arena that seemed to hang on his every move, Curry had made 2-of-12 3-point tries and admitted to getting down on himself.

Then, with his own type of one-two punch, he transformed the night in the space of 31 seconds.

"Stephen Curry became the Stephen Curry I know in the last four minutes," Davidson coach Bob McKillop said. "He somehow found a way to weave that magic at the end of the game."

As familiar as the Curry theme might be, the Davidson (7-1) victory didn't come in the Wildcats' conventional manner.

There was Curry's obvious difficulty – he finished the night with 27 points, making 9-of-27 shots and offset his 10 assists with eight turnovers.

The more startling statistic was the rebounding margin. Davidson was outrebounded by 26 and surrendered a remarkable 29 offensive boards.

And still managed to win.

"It shows how good we are," Curry said.

The Wildcats were without senior forward Max Paulhus Gosselin, who was serving a one-game suspension for a flagrant foul Saturday against N.C. State. But the Mountaineers (6-21) were without two injured starters, including second-leading scorer Alex Ruoff.

Without Gosselin, the Wildcats weren't able to extend their defense. Still, they couldn't keep West Virginia off the boards, particularly Devin Ebanks who had 17 rebounds to go with his 13 points and Da'Sean Butler, who had 24 points and 14 rebounds.

The Mountaineers, meanwhile, bothered Curry by continually switching off ball screens out front and keeping taller players, sometimes the 6-foot-9 Ebanks, on the junior guard. Curry couldn't get his usual looks at open shots and when he gave up the ball, he had trouble getting it back.

"West Virginia defended the daylights out of him," McKillop said.

Curry's frustration mounted in the second half when he went 10 minutes before scoring his first basket. But the later the game went, the better he got. Curry's first 3-pointer in the decisive stretch was on a step-back move he's been working on in practice this week.

"Their length made me miss some shots," Curry said. "I got kind of worried about their hands getting there and messing up moves or shots I would normally make.

"I was pretty frustrated. There were some shots I usually make. It didn't help when they were coming back. But my teammates and coaches kept telling me to keep shooting."

And never ever give up.

Davidson's Stephen Curry hit two 3-point shots in the final 90 seconds to lead his team over West Virginia Tuesday night.

Kellogg's view of UM getting closer

M. BASKETBALL from page 14

Harris finished 3-for-12 from beyond the arc, which isn't exactly a high percentage, but his timely shooting came when the Minutemen needed him the most. His first 3-point shot came with 12 minutes, 42 seconds left in the second half to put UMass up, 46-45.

The Minutemen didn't lose the lead following that basket. UMass went on a 19-4 run, opening the lead to 13 points and never let-up on the offensive end.

With 10:30 left in the game, sophomore Matt Glass (six points, three rebounds) hit his first 3-pointer of the game to give the Minutemen their largest lead since the opening drive.

"I have to keep eating my Wheaties, getting in the weight room and be able to bang down there until we get Lukie back. I need to fill my role and be able to be physical there and at the same time just knock down shots," Glass said.

Glass hit his second 3-pointer with 6:02 left and drew the lead out to 14 points.

UMass' biggest lead of the game was 19 points with 2:25 left. Gaffney followed another 3-pointer by Harris with a dunk that kept the game out of reach for the Crusaders.

Kellogg was unhappy with Lynch's performance this season (3.1 points per game, 4.1 rebounds per game) and chose to start Gaffney at center while giving Glass his third career start at forward.

But that opportunity would be short-lived as he committed two fouls in the first four minutes of the game.

"I wanted to hang my head," Glass said about being benched four minutes into the game. "That's never good, but we're coming together as a team and we're picking each other up. Guys were telling me to make the most of my opportunity, when I came back in."

Foul trouble from the big men plagued UMass the entire game. Glass finished with four fouls while Lynch finished with three.

Gaffney (17 points, 11 rebounds, eight blocks) came close once again to a triple-double as he has in many other games this season. However, he is more focused on doing whatever he can to ensure more victories for the Minutemen than putting up impressive stats.

Kellogg believes this is the first game where multiple players aside from Gaffney stepped up and played hard for an extended period of time.

Lowe (nine points, 12 assists) looked more like the point guard that was praised across the nation, recording his second straight game with more assists than turnovers. It's the kind of effort that Kellogg wants to see on a more consistent basis and one that he thinks is starting to show with his team.

"Earlier in the season it was still getting them to buy into what I'm telling them to do," Kellogg said. "There's a view of UMass that I have in my mind, and it's getting closer and closer."

Adam Miller can be reached at ajmill@student.umass.edu

Lowe providing leadership

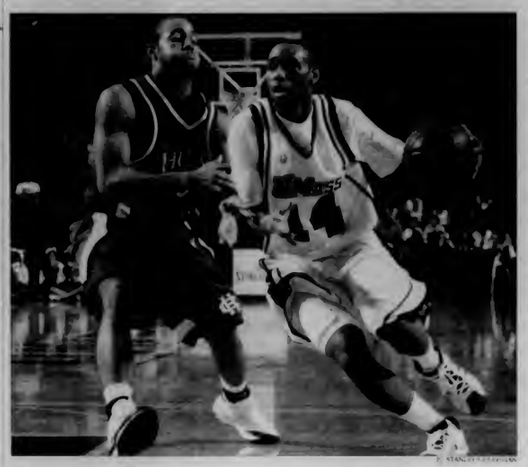
sive end and to run the team on the offensive end and I think he's taking steps towards doing that."

It has been a difficult season for Lowe, who has extremely high expectations due to his outstanding junior season. But Kellogg notes that last year was different because with seniors Gary Forbes, Dante Milligan and Etienne Brower, Lowe didn't always have to be the leader. This year the team is his to run and Lowe's play will determine the Minutemen's level of success. Kellogg has been working with him to become a more vocal leader, and the results are starting to show.

"He's as vocal now as he's been since I've been [at UMass]," Kellogg said. "My point guard needs to be the leader, talk, communicate, play on-the-ball defense and be the coach on the floor, and he's taken on the challenge more and more each day."

The game Lowe had against Holy Cross, especially during the second half, showed how much better the entire team plays when Lowe is doing well. Throughout the second half, Lowe could drive to the lane at will, creating open shots for the rest of the team.



"We're a whole different team [when Lowe plays well]," forward Matt Glass said. "When he's in his comfort zone, when he's making plays and the floor's spread and we can just put the ball in his hands and let him go. He's one of the top point guards in the country at getting people involved and he showed that tonight."

Lowe punctuated his effort tonight with 3 minutes, 33 seconds left in the game when he slashed into the lane, drew two defenders, only to lob an alley-oop pass to the weak side for Gaffney to dunk. The play brought the home crowd to its feet and seemed to remind everyone what Lowe and the Minutemen are capable of.

"Lowe was tremendous in the second half," Holy Cross coach Ralph Willard said. "We did a good job forcing him to some weak spots, but he did a tremendous job in the second half of being patient, breaking us down off the dribble and making plays and getting [UMass] a lot of easy looks and a lot of foul shots."

The Minutemen hope the version of Lowe that showed up last night is here to stay. This Saturday UMass will face defending national champion Kansas and Lowe will have the challenge of defending Sherron Collins, who averages 17.8 points per game, while running the Minutemen offense.

Scott Feldman can be reached at sfeldman@student.umass.edu

Senior point gaurd Chris Lowe had a huge second half helping lead UMass to a 73-59 victory over Holy Cross at the Mullins Center Wednesday night. Lowe had nine points and 12 assists.

UMass center Teva Wright (left) and forward Stefanie Gerardot try to block Delaware's Corinthia Benison Wednesday night at the Mullins Center. The Minutewomen fell 56-42 to the Blue Hens.

Inconsistency plagues offense, Minutewomen

as the squad went 4-of-16 afterward, relinquishing the lead and finishing 0-of-7 to end the half. The Minutewomen trailed, 27-20, heading to the locker room.

UMass struggled with the initial press of Delaware in the first half, committing several sloppy turnovers. But once the offense settled, the Minutewomen passed the ball efficiently, trying to get the ball to Gerardot, Mosgrove or Wright.

Moving the ball wasn't the problem, however, as UMass failed to cash in when it got good looks. The Minutewomen shot 3-of-14 from 3-point range in the first half.

"We took open shots. I think that Delaware took more difficult shots than UMass and somebody else has got to step up," Dacko said. "Teya stepped up today, did a great job.

"But we had eight points to speak of for 20 offensive boards. I was pretty happy with our defense, but I never once guessed that we would struggle so much offensively."

The second half proved to be a continuation of UMass' late first-half struggles. After the Minutewomen came out quickly, forcing a pair of turnovers and getting another layup from Wright, Delaware stretched the lead back to 10 with a Corinthia Benison 3-pointer.

UMass, still struggling to hit its shots, never truly threatened the Delaware lead. The team's two leading scorers, Gerardot and Mosgrove, both shot 25 percent or less from the field, leading the way for an offense that failed to heat up late in the game.

"The word 'inconsistent' just keeps coming to my mind," Dacko said. "We have to be able to compete every play. We have to be able to make plays. We've got to be able to finish plays. Young or old, it's a simple game.

"As a coach, you want to get your kids open looks at the basket and I thought we did that very well. Understandably, one or two can't make [the shot], but all of them?"

Every starter on Delaware came away with at least one steal as the team's press contributed to UMass' turnover woes. Many of the miscues, though, were self-inflicted mistakes by the Minutewomen, who struggled to drive or pass the ball effectively in the second half.

"We're running this offense and its attack-attack-skip-attack," Dacko said. "The offense is not designed to dribble. And if you looked at us, the offense is designed to create gaps. I think that all we did was put our head down and put the ball down and that played into their hands."

This sort of defensive quagmire was the type of game the Blue Hens have played all season. Delaware has averaged 55.3 points per game while surrendering 51.7 per contest.

Yankees' offer lands Sabathia

By Dom Amore
The Hartford Courant

It has taken a blow-away opening offer, four weeks of waiting, an even bigger counter offer and three face-to-face meetings.

But the Yankees finally appear to have the man at the top of their wish list, lefthander CC Sabathia, for the top of their rotation and their marquee with a reported seven-year, $161 million deal.

"(Sabathia's) left-handed. He's a tremendous competitor. His talent is obvious," Yankees General Manager Brian Cashman said Wednesday at the winter meetings in Las Vegas, while stressing that the deal hadn't been finalized. The deal would surpass the six-year, $137.5 million contract the Mets gave Johan Santana last year as the richest for a pitcher, and could give Sabathia the option to become a free agent again after the 2011 season.

"It's all subject on the physical," Yankees co-chairman Hank Steinbrenner told The Associated Press. "Obviously, we're going to try and get it done as fast as possible."

"We just got the best pitcher in baseball." The Yankees made Sabathia their No 1 target, but were not able to get it done without the customary by-play with the Red Sox, who met with Sabathia briefly this week. Cashman took a commercial flight from Las Vegas to Oakland, Calif., to meet with Sabathia Tuesday night.

"We're not the Red Sox," Cashman said, a reference to Red Sox executives' use of John Henry's private jet in the courting of Daisuke Matsuzaka two years ago.

"They certainly are not, thank goodness," Red Sox president Larry Lucchino responded in an e-mail to the AP.

The Yankees' willingness to give a pitcher a seven-year contract could hamper the Red Sox's effort to sign their top target, first baseman Mark Teixeira, who also wants a longer commitment than Boston usually gives. The Yankees, who won 89 games last season, missing the playoffs for the first time since 1993, are trying to catch the Red Sox and Rays in the AL East.

Sabathia, who won the Cy Young Award for the Indians in 2007 and pitched the Brewers into the playoffs with a series of clutch September performances in '08, is the centerpiece of the team the Yankees hope to bring into the new $1.3 billion Yankee Stadium. They would like to add another starter, A.J. Burnett or Derek Lowe, to go with Sabathia and Chien-Ming Wang, and have made Burnett a five-year offer, ESPN.com reported. They would like to bring back Andy Pettitte with a one-year deal, and perhaps leave the No. 5 spot for competition among their young pitchers.

The Brewers offered Sabathia a $100 million package, but the Yankees, realizing it would take a Santana-caliber deal, offered $140 million for six years. They waited three weeks as Sabathia demurred, hinting at a preference to pitch on the West Coast and in the National League, because he likes to hit.

Cashman met with Sabathia in Las Vegas twice over the weekend, then made the trip to Vallejo, Calif. Cashman upped the offer, adding the extra year even though there has been no indication of any other team approaching the Yankees' original offer.

Sabathia, 28, is 117-73 with a 3.66 ERA in eight major league seasons. He has thrown a whopping 241 and 253 innings the last two seasons. At 6 feet 7 and 250 pounds, he is imposing and, using David Wells as a barometer, a pitcher that size usually has a durable arm, but can develop back or knee problems.

The Yankees have baseball's three biggest contracts, with Sabathia behind Alex Rodriguez ($275 million for 10 years) and Derek Jeter ($189 million for 10 years).

Minutemen down H.C. in home win

Fouls give Crusaders advantage, not success

BY ADAM MILLER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Chris Lowe let out a sigh of relief as he expressed his team's emotion that came with getting the first win at home for the Massachusetts men's basketball team.

"It was a long time coming," Lowe said.

UMass (2-6) bounced back from a four-point deficit in the first half to down Holy Cross, 73-59.

"I thought our guys played a complete game tonight," UMass coach Derek Kellogg said.

After a quick 13-5 start on the Crusaders (3-7), UMass had trouble stopping Holy Cross from going inside.

Foul trouble throughout the game forced the Minutemen to play center Tony Gaffney with four guards, giving the Crusaders a considerable size advantage. For much of the first half, Holy Cross imposed its size on UMass with an 18-12 edge in the paint and three minutes left.

The Maroon and White had no answer on the other end with 11 first half turnovers.

The Crusaders were up as many as eight points late in the half, but the Minutemen closed the lead to three and went into halftime after center Tyrell Lynch scored his second basket of the night.

UMass continued struggling out of the locker room as the Crusaders extended the lead to seven points in the opening two minutes of the second half. Guard Anthony Gurley followed up on a block by Gaffney with a 3-pointer to tie the game at 36.

Holy Cross regained the lead once again, but didn't put the Minutemen away.

Guard Ricky Harris finished with a team-high of 23 points. Twelve of his 18 field goals were 3-pointers.

Lowe breaks out of slump, leads offense

Second-half success secures Mullins Center victory

BY SCOTT FELDMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

All season long, Massachusetts men's basketball coach Derek Kellogg has said that he expects Chris Lowe to be one of the best point guards in the country.

Last night was the first time Lowe lived up to those expectations.

Lowe had nine points and a season-high 12 assists to lead the Minutemen (2-6) to a 73-59 victory over Holy Cross (3-7). His second half in particular was phenomenal, as he notched eight assists against one turnover as the Minutemen outscored Holy Cross 44-27 after the break.

"I could just kind of see things before they happened. I could see the way they were playing me in that matchup zone, the 1-3-1," Lowe said about his big second half. "I told myself if I get low and get past the first defender, they all had to collapse to the lane and I either had the lob for Tony [Gaffney] or I had [Matt] Glass, [Anthony] Gurley and Ricky [Harris] out for shots."

The big game was critical for Lowe, who had struggled prior to tonight. He had turned the ball over 36 times while getting 26 assists during UMass' six-game losing streak.

"I've been slumping lately and I just got back to the basics, playing defense and getting my team involved," Lowe said. "I was probably worried about too many things, and I was too distracted the first couple of games. But I just got back to myself, just being Chris Lowe, what made me a great point guard, just getting my teammates involved and playing great defense."

As one of the veteran leaders on the team, Kellogg looks for Lowe to provide leadership on the court.

"I want my point guard to be the best player on the floor," Kellogg said. "I want him to dominate the game on the defensive end."

UM biggest game on AIC schedule

BY RYAN FLEMING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Every team and player has opponents more significant than the rest. They circle the date on the calendar at the beginning of the season and though they will never admit it, all their focus is leaned almost entirely on that game.

Each game is played with a level of intensity, a certain type of energy, that doesn't nearly matchup to that one game.

The Massachusetts hockey team hosts American International College this Friday in the Minutemen's last game before winter break.

This game, this seemingly meaningless matchup for the Minutemen, is the paramount matchup that the Yellow Jackets have waited for since this year's schedule came out last June.

"This is the biggest game on their schedule," said UMass coach Don Cahoon. "Unquestionably the biggest game on the schedule ... the biggest feather in his cap if they can get it done. It will be a motivated group of guys that have played enough hockey to just play and know what happens."

AIC (4-12) has a schedule that doesn't sport many known teams. The Yellow Jackets don't have another Hockey East opponent listed and the only other foes they face that have any national recognition are No. 12 Air Force and No. 19 Nebraska-Omaha, both teams they've already played.

Coming into Friday's game,

Poor offense dooms UMass

BY NICK O'MALLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

In a 56-42 defensive struggle against Delaware, the Massachusetts women's basketball team found out that it doesn't matter how well you play on defense or on the boards if you can't shoot the ball.

Outside of a double-double from sophomore Teya Wright, the Minutewomen were ice cold from the field. Shooting 27.1 percent from the field, compared to 38 percent from Delaware, UMass struggled to develop any rhythm offensively.

|---|---|
| Delaware | 56 |
| UMass | 42 |

"I'm just extremely disappointed with our inconsistency," said UMass coach Marnie Dacko. "We're coming off a Brown game where we played against a zone and shot 60 percent in a half and we come out today, [Stefanie Gerardot] can't buy a bucket, Cerie [Mosgrove] can't buy a basket, [Diatiema Hill] can't buy a basket."

The Minutewomen looked good at the opening of the game, jumping out to a 5-0 lead. Senior Sakera Young drove strong to the hoop to open the game with a layup and sophomore Cerie Mosgrove followed with a 3-pointer.

But, once the Minutewomen came out to a 10-8 lead in the first half, the Blue Hens came back with a 19-10 run to finish it. Young had just finished strong on a drive inside, followed by a Wright free throw, to give the lead to UMass – its last of the game.

Delaware responded quickly with a 7-0 run, capped off with a Vanessa Kabongo 3-pointer to storm ahead. UMass tried to rally back when Mosgrove hit a 3-pointer that was set up by a feed to Wright a play earlier. The Blue Hens, however, continued to be hot from behind the line, hitting back-to-back 3-pointers.

A Wright layup and a Mosgrove 3-pointer brought the Minutewomen back within one. But it was then that UMass' shooting woes began,

Peru sues Yale U.

BY PAUL NEEDHAM
YALE DAILY NEWS (YALE U.)

The Republic of Peru has quietly filed a lawsuit against Yale, officially turning a nearly century-long dispute over the rightful ownership of Inca artifacts into a legal battle.

By late Tuesday, Yale had still not been formally served with the 31-page complaint that was filed Friday in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia. But the lawsuit — in which Peru asks for the immediate return to Machu Picchu of all the artifacts excavated by Yale explorer Hiram Bingham III — comes as a grave setback to University officials who had hoped to resolve the conflict amicably and now say the lawsuit has no basis.

"It's very disappointing," University President Richard Levin said in a telephone interview Tuesday night. "We worked very hard to try to steer a responsible course on this matter and we have been on numerous occasions within a hair's distance of settlement with the Peruvians."

Indeed, as late as September of last year it had seemed certain that Yale and Peru would reach an agreement over the fate of the artifacts. The memorandum of understanding signed between the parties then would have returned most of the objects to Peru within a few years, though some objects would have remained at Yale for up to 99 years.

Now, according to the complaint, Peru is seeking "the immediate return of all such property as well as damages that it has suffered on account of Yale's persistent breach of its obligations and profit at the expense of the people of Peru."

The lawsuit cites Peruvian law dating back to the 19th century as the basis for the nation's claim to the objects that were excavated between 1911 and 1915 and are now housed at the Peabody Museum of Natural History. But Peru is not just seeking the repatriation of what the lawsuit calls "mummies, skulls, bones and other human remains, pottery and utensils, ceramics, objects of art and other items."

Instead, Peru is also suing for compensation the amount of which would be determined at trial — in connection with alleged breaches of agreement on Yale's part. There are 14 causes of action in Peru's complaint, including one that accuses Yale of acting fraudulently by not conducting sufficient scientific research on the objects.

In e-mails to the News, University General Counsel Dorothy Robinson declined to discuss the specifics of the lawsuit, saying that Yale had not yet reviewed the complaint in full.

"Clearly, it is a case where there is good reason for both sides to reach a creative, constructive resolution," Robinson said Tuesday. "We will, of course, defend the suit."

Yale spokesman Tom Conroy also issued a statement Tuesday, in which he decried the Peruvian lawsuit.

"The claims asserted by Peru are barred by the statute of limitations," Conroy said, "and would have been without merit even if they had been filed within the legal time period."

Studio Arts Building hosts lecture on artists, business

BY LISA DIMATTEO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts Small Business Development Center held a training session at the new studio arts building on the University of Massachusetts campus Tuesday, Dec. 9th.

The session, titled "The Creative Economy," was set up as an opportunity for students in the UMass College of Humanities and Fine Arts to become familiar with the business and marketing aspect of becoming a successful artist. "The Creative Economy" is a phrase that contains two "cultural aspects" — the profit and non-profit enterprises and the creative workers, or artists, who are the core of this creative economy.

Joel Martin, dean of the College of Humanities and Fine Arts, began the session with a speech commending the successes of UMass Humanities and Fine Arts alumni and describing how excited he was about the studio arts building.

"We see [this building] as a portal for the creative economy," he said.

Josh Sampson and Scott Prior, two successful artists from the Pioneer Valley, were guest speakers at the event. Each artist presented a slideshow of their work and explained the business and marketing behind their success and that of independent artists.

The Massachusetts Small Business Development Center offers free one-on-one business advising, technical assistance and low-cost education to anyone who is interested in starting a small business. The Development Center's office is located in the Isenberg School of Management.

Scott Prior, a Pioneer Valley artist, spoke in the Studio Arts Building on Tuesday.

"I think it's great, a lot of art programs focus on the aesthetics of art and not how to sell it or make a living," said Sam Wapenis, a junior BDC major with a concentration in art management. "Everyone should be exposed to the business aspect of art. I'm really happy they offered this."

Study: More students utilizing Adderall

BY JESSICA FRYMAN
SAGEBRUSH (U. NEVADA-RENO)

(Editor's note: The names of students who admitted to using Adderall are being withheld or changed to protect them from potential criminal action. John's last name is being omitted. Jim's name was changed.)

Studies show that up to 25 percent of college students misuse Adderall to help them cram for exams, a short-term benefit that comes with the risks of being charged with a felony and detrimental health consequences.

The "study drug" is prescribed to people with Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder to help them focus and stay calm, said Ole Thienhaus, dean of the University of Nevada School Of Medicine. It's a stimulant, classified as an amphetamine and Class II drug — the same category as cocaine.

Studies vary, stating that 8 to 25 percent of college students use Adderall, but reports show increases in prescriptions for Adderall and students say the trend is widespread.

For students that use the University of Nevada-Reno Counseling Services for Substance Abuse, alcohol and marijuana are the most commonly misused drugs, said Garry Rubinstein, coordinator of the program. Of those students, about 8 percent said they have also abused Adderall.

He is treating four students for Adderall abuse this semester. But not everyone who uses Adderall visits counseling services.

"Students I see come in because something went wrong enough for them to call up for help," he said.

Rubinstein said abusing Adderall is "not a new phenomenon," but he has no official numbers to compare this semester to the past.

Jim, a UNR junior who uses Adderall to help him study, said he thinks students are more likely to take Adderall than they are to smoke marijuana.

"People are more willing to do Adderall than anything else," the 20-year-old business major said. "More people are doing Adderall than you think."

He said many students don't consider Adderall a drug because it's easily accessible through friends' prescriptions at an average price of $3 per 15 milligram pill.

ADHD is more commonly diagnosed in young children, but has been increasingly found in adults throughout the past few decades, Thienhaus said.

Almost half of students who use the Disability Resource Center have a psychological condition, reads the center's 2007-08 report.

Prescriptions for ADHD medication increased 369 percent between 1992 and 2002, according to a National Center for Addiction and Substance Abuse report.

Thienhaus said he thinks the disorder is over diagnosed because there are only symptoms and no scientific tests to make the diagnosis.

"In borderline cases, it's difficult and almost impossible," he said. "We have to be careful about it."

Because Adderall is also used as a street drug, pharmacists and doctors watch for red flags of abuse, like when people try to fill the same prescription twice or have prescriptions from multiple doctors, Thienhaus said.

Students said the college trend to use Adderall is fueled by results.

John, a UNR freshman, said he considers himself to have ADD, but has never been diagnosed. During study time, he often finds himself surfing the Web because he's easily distracted, he said.

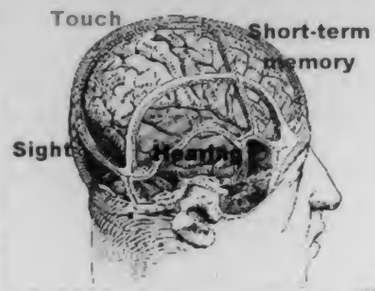
When he was a junior in high school, John's friend offered him Adderall to help him stay more focused. He said he used the pill most often when studying for his Advanced Placement biology class.

Before tests, he'd break the time capsule on the pill to make the effects kick in more quickly, he said.

John said he hasn't taken the pill since he started taking classes at UNR because he hasn't needed to. If that changes, he said he would use Adderall again because it works.

Like John, Jim only takes Adderall when it's an "immediate study emergency."

Jim took one 15 milligram pill Dec. 1 for the first time in nine months when his homework load was too heavy to finish within the number of hours he had to work.



He studied for three exams, finished two presentations, completed regular homework assignments and cleaned his room and kitchen — a to-do list he said he couldn't have accomplished without using Adderall.

"You can cram very well and ace the test, but we know you are supposed to learn not for the next test but as a subject matter that you are supposed to retain," Thienhaus said.

Jim agreed that cramming is not the most effective way to study, but said it's better than not doing the work at all.

"You feel better, you feel like you are stronger, faster, smarter," he said about the pill he started occasionally taking his freshman year in college. "It's making you study and focus. It's definitely beneficial to your studies, but at what cost?"

What was that?

The staff of the University of Massachusetts Psychological Services Center performed tests on locals, examining the basic functions of long and short-term memory.

Psych. Dept. offers free memory tests

BY EMILY REYNOLDS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Psychological Services Center at the University of Massachusetts held a free memory screening clinic yesterday. It was aimed for people over the age of 65 years old to test for cognitive problems.

"This was really a pilot program to raise awareness of some memory disorders," said Christopher Overtree, the director of the center. "The tests are meant to distinguish between normal cognitive decline and more serious memory problems."

The testing was done by two clinical psychology doctoral students, Anna Akerstedt and Melissa Mathews, and was overseen by Bradley Crenshaw, a neuropsychologist.

The test took anywhere from 30 minutes to an hour. It started with an interview, followed by some tests. After the tests were scored, the students consulted with the people taking them.

The tests began with more complex questions to gauge cognitive function, and then proceeded to simpler questions like, "what is your name?" and "what is today's date."

"These may seem silly to ask someone, but if they have memory problems, they may have trouble answering them," said Akerstedt.

The test itself was from a series of standard tests that are used in hospitals and nursing homes.

"This testing gathers evidence for all types of cognitive memory problems," said Overtree. "It could pick up on all sorts of memory problems, including Alzheimer's and dementia. It would give us enough of a reason to refer the clients for more in-depth information."

The clinic was planned throughout the fall semester, and in the past month it has been advertised online and through flyers. Last week, the clinic also sent out a press release informing the community about the service.

The people who came in were mostly over the age of 65, though there were a few younger people. Some were reassured that their brains were working properly. Others were given referrals for further examination.

"About two thirds could benefit from follow-ups," said Akerstedt.

According to Overtree, there were about 35 people who called in to make an appointment. However, since the tests take so long, only about half were seen.

"The screening takes about an hour, and there are only so many people you can see in a day," said Mathews.

The clinic is hoping to do another screening in the spring for appointments that could not be filled.

The Psychological Services Center is open to all students and people in the surrounding communities, as well as people of all ages, including families. They aren't given treatments recommendations, referrals and other services.

Putting Five College libraries to the test

Our staff explores the stacks of the Valley's intellectual institutions

By Michael King and Kate Olesin

When finals week insomnia strikes, it's essential to have a library that's not just another place to study. Libraries come in all styles (and sizes), and that diversity is reflected among those of the Five Colleges.

Over the course of finals week, we observed tense students, caffeine-deprived procrastinators and chatty social studiers in their natural habitats.

We explored and analyzed these five libraries to provide a glimpse of the academic routines of other local college students and where they study to score As on those exams.

Mount Holyoke

As we walked through the 16th-century-modeled doors, we quipped at the college intentionally added its creak for effect. But just through that entrance the ceiling height doubled and we looked into what resembled a European courtyard and cafe.

We library connoisseurs were then left with the choice of where to explore first.

Deciding to take the route right in front of us, we walked up a parallel set of stairs and were faced with a cathedral – or was it a place to study and read? The ceiling, in what we as Mt. Holyoke virgins, called "The Great Room" was clearly reminiscent of a medieval castle with wooden carvings on the buttresses and stained glass windows lining the front of the hall.

Yet, once we considered the function of the room as we struggled to find a place to sit, it became clear that this supposed "Reference Hall" served less as a place to study since it was filled with shelves of books and awkward half-stacks housing various journals. The random placement of computers and tables prevents this area from becoming the core of one's studying experience.

After we stopped gaping at "The Great Room," we wandered at random throughout the library's seven floors. The consensus became that no matter how many times we would visit this library in the future, we would never run out of interesting and eclectic study spots. Whether it was large, medieval-style round tables, cushioned window seats, carrels overlooking campus or a chair in some out-of-the-way corner, one can find a space that matches their study habits.

However, the experience was somewhat marred by the various stenches and musks emitting from various book stacks and stairwells. At one point we were surprised to walk through a hallway that smelled like a swimming pool that moved seamlessly into a secluded corridor with a distinct crayon odor.

Nevertheless, Rao's coffee and the library's full cafe is a staple at this library – something we took full advantage of after exploring.

Yet, even at our favorite library, there were no Daily Collegians.

Amherst

Expecting a shiver from the Frost Library, it was surprisingly warm and inviting.

Amherst boasts the most modern and well-maintained of the five libraries, but its lack of size can make for a challenge to find a personal study space. There were a great deal of computers and tables, but a lack of comfortable, secluded seats to curl up and read in.

Instead of simply adding floors, as the approach taken by its neighbor to the north, Amherst takes an intuitive approach to utilizing its space. The stacks of the bottom two floors redefine a lack of accessibility to books, as many of the college's over 1 million volumes are locked up in several rows of mechanized bookcases, which move on a track to eliminate the aisle between shelves. Naturally, it's spatially efficient, but it also creates a new challenge for innocent students simply wanting to locate a text.

Students looking to avoid print books will be satisfied with Amherst's impressive array of multimedia resources. The library maintains a proportionally large number of computers to its student body and even has computers situated not on top of the work space, but the monitor appears as one looks down into the glass desk.

The lack of coffee, and other forms of caffeine and sustenance inherently limits the time of each library session. Therefore, it's not conducive to a long week of final exams. However, it still holds a strong role in campus activity as it remains true to a library's mission of offering a quiet place to study.

Even as UMass' closest neighbor – no MDCs once again.

The University of Massachusetts

For a campus filled with 19,000 undergraduates, the library's bustling atmosphere, even during the week before finals, reflects that statistic. There are days when one might be forced to wait an hour for a computer, and finding a place to study in the library's Learning Commons is virtually impossible.

But if you enjoy studying with a group or in a busy environment there's no better place. Beyond that space and the two quiet study floors, you'll be relegated to finding an uncomfortable carrel and chair higher up in one of the building's other 23 floors.

The coffee is situated at the entrance – a good hook for the weary studier. In addition, the library is open 24 hours, unlike its peer institutions Mt. Holyoke is only open until 2 a.m. on weekdays and Amherst College's library closes at 1 a.m.

Even practically, the massive number of volumes makes research a relatively easy task. Although Smith's Neilson Library possesses 1.4 million items (books, audio, maps etc.), the W.E.B. DuBois Library at the end of 2006 counted a whopping 3 million volumes.

Overall, the atmosphere is rather tense. You can tell that students are there to study, whether it's between classes on a rush to print out a final paper, or in for the long haul.

And, as an added plus, you can find piles of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian at its entrance.

Smith

Our first library trip out of many started as an attempt to do some legitimate studying. However, once we established a base camp at a table at Smith's Neilson Library, the main bastion of knowledge on campus, we couldn't resist taking an hour to explore.

The building's uninviting, low-ceilinged foyer makes for a harsh entrance to a place of intended hard work. Yet its sprawling design across three primary floors complements the library's functionality, but be prepared to make use of a carrel spread among the stacks (good luck finding a study table among the hordes of territorial Smithies).

But what makes the building's simplicity tolerable is the variety of curious trinkets and artifacts scattered throughout.

We felt like we were walking through a museum at one point, when we discovered a door labeled "Classics Room" near an exhibit of historical book covers. Out of curiosity, we tried the door and it opened to a blackboard which read "Room of Requirement." It felt out of the ordinary for this library, possessing a completely different studying atmosphere, with glass cabinets filled with books and miscellany lining the walls.

These constant discoveries among studying space and rows of books encouraged one of our own: the locating of a fourth-floor men's bathroom that most likely hasn't be used or cleaned since the 1980s.

The second-floor periodicals room, in conjunction with a perpetually bustling computer area, felt like the heart of the library. This room, with its cathedral ceilings and majestic windows, strongly resembled that of Mt. Holyoke, but with much less grandeur and greater functionality.

A warning: the lack of Daily Collegians was disappointing to say the least.

Hampshire

This would've been a great place to study while in high school, because we assumed that's where we were once we stepped into the Harold F. Johnson Library Center among the woodland that is Hampshire College.

We ended up spending a total of a half-hour in the library center. With only three floors to explore and the door to the roof locked, there wasn't much to discover.

Yet the library maintains a status as a hub of student activity with its close proximity to Hampshire's student activities center. More than any other campus, Hampshire's library contains resources beyond the standard academic fare. We discovered a career center nestled among the third-floor stacks, and a multimedia office and other computer classrooms scattered throughout the upper floors.

In terms of actually making the drive to Hampshire to study in the library, you might be better off waiting until it gets warmer to study outside in the vast, expansive lawn of the college.

I love you, you hurt me

Nicholas O'Malley

I love you, you love me, we're a happy family. With a great big hug and a load of questionable measures that have been taken to break down prisoners in the War on Terror, a new method has emerged as one of the most unusual.

When we think about the measures used on prisoners in Guantanamo Bay and facilities of the like, we think of some disturbing images. While allegations of waterboarding and prisoner abuse come to mind, one method of breaking down detainees is one of the last things we'd ever expect to see or in this case, hear at Barney.

In a recent column for the L.A. Times, the composer and producer of the infamous "I Love You" ballad called out against the use of his song on suspected terrorists at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq.

Sure, at some point in our lives, the "I Love You" theme was one of the most annoying and nerve-racking things we could hear. But is it torture?

And he's not alone.

Many musicians, including Rage Against the Machine's Tom Morello, have voiced their displeasure over the government's use of their music as a tool of abuse. It's one thing to have your music stolen, but it's not a good thing to hear when your government considers your music worthy of driving prisoners out of their minds.

On the other hand, bands, like Drowning Pool, have members that are taking this revelation with a sense of pride.

"I take it as an honor to think that perhaps our song could be used to quell another 9-11 attack or something like that," bassist Stevie Benton told Spin Magazine.

The methods have been especially effective on prisoners in Afghanistan, where blaring music was an impossible occurrence under a Taliban regime that banned the playing of music.

Prolonged use of loud music was authorized as far back as 2003. According to Lt. Gen. Ricardo Sanchez, the method is utilized "to create fear, disorient ... and prolong capture shock."

It's hard to draw a line as to where the abuse of music lies on the list of things the U.S. government has done to try to break suspected terrorists. When it's compared to methods like waterboarding, though, it doesn't measure up.

Sure, at some point in our lives, the "I Love You" theme was one of the most annoying and nerve-racking things we could hear. But is it torture? Yeah, that's right. I used the "T" word.

The perpetual blaring of music has been linked to driving prisoners to the brink and most likely has long-term effects. But in the face of all the other things the government has been accused of doing in the past, is that even such a big deal anymore?

Yes, most of the methods the U.S. has employed to interrogate terror suspects have been under just as much scrutiny as the alleged terrorists themselves.

But we know what can happen if you're subjected to music to the point where it's abuse. What we don't know is what the effects are of the method the U.S. government would use in its place.

We'd all like to see if there's a method the government could use to interrogate terrorists that's both non-abusive and effective. But that's not happening.

As long as there's a War on Terror there will be intelligence groups working towards getting every possible piece of information out of detainees. If that means it must be done by questionable methods, so be it.

Right now, though, there are reports of the government using the likes of Queen, Nine Inch Nails and Pantera to break some of the country's most dangerous enemies. It could be worse.

Even if the effectiveness of interrogation methods was ignored, it would still make sense to stick with a method like blaring music. If forced to change, all the government would have to do is come up with another non-physical method of pushing prisoners to the breaking point.

It wouldn't have to be along the lines of electroshock therapy or anything of that nature. But, as the use of prolonged music has shown, there are more ways to break someone than physical punishment.

The choice at this stage is whether or not we are willing to accept abuse we know rather than another of which we are ignorant.

Whether or not you support such methods, pushing prisoners to the limit is something that will be done, regardless of how the public feels about it.

But as long as Barney is the malicious weapon used to crush the will of the world's most hardened villains, there could be a worse fate.

Scoring morals by better role models

Nick Bush

As the Plaxico Burress incident proves once again, athletes are not good role models. They've never been particularly good role models — going right back to the grand old days of Mickey Mantle or Joe Namath.

It just seems that over the past few years, I've heard parents suggest that watching Tom Brady throw accurate footballs somehow translates into him being a good role model for their kids. Why, exactly?

Because he didn't get arrested, like half of the Cincinnati Bengals did last season? Can't we find role models that do things a bit more tangible? What about President-elect Obama, or the guy that invented the taco salad — anyone other than a typical spoiled athlete.

Don't get me wrong. Most of today's modern athletes are upstanding citizens. The intense focus with which the American public looks at them comes with celebrity stature, however.

In today's media, the word celebrity has gone from suggesting respectability to one that now hints at infamy. It can be easy to hear more negative stories about professional athletes than positive ones. Controversy can fill a lot more airtime on ESPN than stories about donations to charity.

If you're looking for a role model for your kids, please leave the channel on Mister Rogers, rather than putting on a Sportscenter Top 10 list of the "greatest hockey fights" or "greatest Barry Bonds steroid injection moments." The media loves to endlessly build up athletes, only to tear them down once their human capacity to err becomes apparent in any manner.

Being a professional athlete is a job — and like every other job, there are a wide range of people and personalities who end up employed. There can be dozens of hard-working, decent men on a team, and only a handful of bad apples can end up giving a negative perception.

However, perception is everything. This is especially true in the eyes and minds of young children, who have no internal filter of understanding set up yet, and are particularly impressionable.

We learned long ago that athletes aren't ever going to live up to the impossible task of being good role models, because they're being paid to do very different impossible tasks, such as throwing a fastball at 100 miles per hour, or nailing a three-point shot in the final seconds with a seven-foot man's hand in their face.

They're not professional athletes for any reason other than their amazing athletic abilities. Keep morality for the priests and politicians (not that they deserve it), and leave scoring points and winning games to the sports teams.

Actual role models don't score touchdowns or hit home runs, anyways. They take their kids to Little League practice everyday even when crippled by a horrible disease, or work a third job just to put food on the table. If you want to find a large group of generally spoiled, immature, misogynistic and egomaniacal adults, look no further than the majority of professional athletes populating the NFL, NBA and MLB.

Piles of money, obscenely fast cars, thug security guards, shady investments, illegitimate children, enormous diamonds, multiple women on each arm and yes, even illegal firearms all seem to find their way into the lives of modern athletes, time and time again. Thank you, Mr. Burress, for managing to combine a good deal of those into one neat little example. You made my job that much easier.

If you want to find a large group of generally spoiled, immature, misogynistic and egomaniacal adults, look no further than the majority of professional athletes populating the NFL, NBA and MLB.

There aren't a lot of great role models around these days, so I don't necessarily blame people for trying to squeeze a few athletes into the ranks. But I don't understand what good it is for children to learn that it's okay for Randy Moss to not hustle down the field because the Raiders team he was on was terrible, or that it's okay for Ron Artest to run into the stands and deck some fans because they were heckling him. The bad examples in sports always tend to outshine and outlast the positive ones.

Even though you may remember Joe Namath throwing touchdowns, if he had lived in a different era, you might remember him as the Jets quarterback that drunkenly rode motorcycles while covered with adoring naked women, or something of the sort. At the very least, you can watch him on YouTube, drunkenly hitting on Monday Night Football sideline reporter Suzy Kolber in 2003.

Some things never change.

Back up your boycott against both bigots and business

Alana Goodman

What if you threw a boycott and nobody showed up?

That's exactly what happened to pro-gay marriage activists on Wednesday when they staged a nationwide demonstration to protest the passing of California's anti-gay marriage initiative, known as Proposition 8.

The demonstration, which was officially dubbed "A Day Without a Gay," called on homosexuals and their allies to stay home from work and boycott shopping in an effort to prove to Americans that gay people are an important part of the economy.

"Calling all queers!" blares the movement's official Facebook page. "We are sending out a call to all 'our people' and our allies to rally together and 'call out gay'" — as opposed to calling out "sick."

The movement's comparison of homosexuality with "illness," which even goes as far as referring to it as the "Lavender flu," is a puzzling position for pro-gay activists to take in the first place.

But according to John Michael Weatherly, a writer for "Out and About," the most baffling part of "Day Without a Gay" is that it contradicts the original purpose of the gay movement.

"We want people to see that we are the same as everyone else, right? If that's the case, then why are we constantly separating ourselves? Wouldn't we be better displaying our normalcy by showing up and doing our jobs as usual?" he wrote.

Apparently, the majority of the gay community shared his beliefs. Wednesday's protest was widely reported as unsuccessful, drawing "spotty participation nationwide," according to the Associated Press.

The failure of the protest is not surprising. The concept of the boycott was based on the popular "Day Without an Immigrant" protests of 2006, when immigrants and their allies skipped work to oppose tighter immigration restrictions. Since these restrictions meant fewer immigrants living and working in the United States, immigrant-rights activists wanted to show Americans that we would be losing a group that makes fundamental contributions to our economy.

Homosexual activists are protesting the passing of anti-gay marriage legislation, something that has almost no bearing on their occupations or contributions to the economy.

"Day Without a Gay" would make similar sense if gay people were at risk of being deported from the United States or were commonly accused of "taking away American jobs."

However, homosexual activists are protesting the passing of anti-gay marriage legislation, something that has almost no bearing on their occupations or contributions to the economy. Whether gay marriage is legal or illegal, gay people will still have jobs and still consume products.

The hare-brained scheme to implement a "Day Without a Gay" was cooked up by L.A. Times columnist Joel Stein. Unsurprisingly, Stein admits that he has a record of horrible boycott ideas.

"My previous attempt as an outsider to rally folks to a cause was a miserable failure. Right before I applied to college, I suggested Asian students protest being stereotyped as overachievers by skipping the SAT," he wrote.

Hopefully Stein's next plan for a Jewish boycott of Wall Street will be more successful. Or maybe he should just stop proposing protest ideas altogether.

Unfortunately for Stein and the gay rights movement, the failed demonstration on Wednesday ultimately ended up hurting their cause.

Chicago Free Press columnist Jennifer Vanasco wrote, "when [boycotts] wind up having no significant impact, it makes the group boycotting seem less powerful."

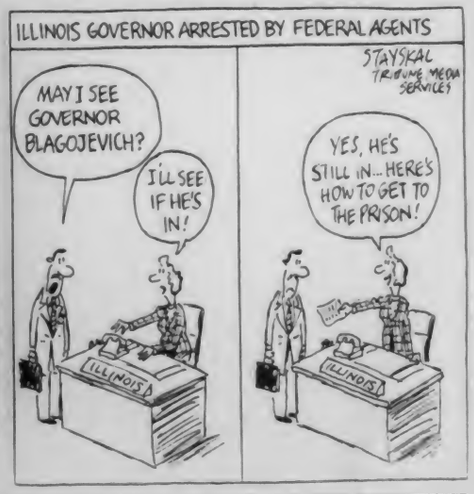
The pro-gay marriage movement would do well to learn from failed boycotts by groups like the American Family Association (AFA). The AFA, whose ideology on social issues falls slightly to the right of David Duke, regularly harasses major corporations that they deem "supportive" of the "homosexual agenda."

Thanks to the AFA, companies like Ford Motors, Wal-Mart and McDonald's have been bugged by more right-wingers than Gov. Blagojevich's campaign office. The "crimes" of these corporations range from selling copies of "Brokeback Mountain" to placing advertisements in gay magazines and donating to gay-friendly organizations.

Once a powerful lobbyist group, the AFA has undermined its own goals by engaging in these gimmicky, attention-grabbing boycotts.

"How many families are being adversely affected by this 'pro-family' boycott [of Ford Motors]? Do the AFA and their allies care? Not in the least," wrote Mel Seesholtz on Civil-rights.org.

But at least the AFA focuses on companies that personally oppose their admittedly moronic beliefs. In contrast, the point of "Day Without a Gay" was to target all businesses, even those which are pro-gay marriage or are located in states where they have no say on the issue.



"A boycott is good when a company is bad. When it harasses its LGBT employees, fires them for being gay, will not promote them, sells anti-gay products or services ... [We] must save boycotts for the companies that actually deserve them," wrote Vanasco.

The pro-gay marriage movement, like the AFA, must start choosing its battles more wisely. While a boycott against a company that endorses discrimination based on sexual orientation can be a catalyst for positive change, an arbitrary boycott of any and all businesses reflects poorly on the gay community.

Enigk's set short and bittersweet

Singer mixes new and old in NoHo

By Angela Stanowski
Contributing Writer

NORTHAMPTON — Call it religion, call it what you will.

There's something about performers like Jeremy Enigk that transcend the standard measures of success.

It's something bigger than fans, or albums or commercial accomplishments that constitute the soul of performance.

Whatever "it" is, Enigk most certainly understands.

Playing before an intimate crowd at the Iron Horse Music Hall in Northampton this past Wednesday, Enigk astounded his spectators with vocal feats that were nothing short of surreal.

It's rumored that his separation from Seattle band Sunny Day Real Estate was a result of differences surrounding Enigk's religious conversion in the mid 1990s, but nothing has been confirmed.

Whatever the case, it seems Enigk has survived and perhaps even benefited from the division.

His solo career has been quite successful thus far, including the creation of his own label, Lewis Hollow Records, and the release of two studio albums with another on deck.

Opening for Enigk was Mark Schwaber, a local musician from Easthampton whose unique strumming techniques made his acoustic guitar set quite distinct.

Schwaber provided a personal touch to the evening by dedicating several songs to his dear friends, one of whom was present for the show.

Though Schwaber was set to perform with fellow musician Sara Gomes, but was left to a solo performance when Gomes fell ill at the last minute.

Considering his entire third release featuring Gomes' vocal harmonies, the set contained a significant amount of his older tunes.

Regardless, Schwaber's performance was inspired and succeeded in the music hall's environment.

From the moment he stepped onstage, the audience began to gather at Enigk's feet — a faithful flock of both Sunny Day and new fans alike.

Enigk himself was hardly recognizable from previous years, opting for a scruffier exterior.

With his acoustic guitar and some help from

Jeremy Enigk performed an hour-long set of new and old tunes at Northampton's Iron Horse Music Hall on Wednesday evening.

In the 2008 remake of "The Day the Earth Stood Still," Jennifer Connelly (left) and Keanu Reeves (right) offer a fresh take on the 1951 original.

'Earth' relates to all

Reeves, Connelly talk movie remake

By Brittany Bell Dalphond
Collegian Staff

First filmed in 1951, the science-fiction movie "The Day the Earth Stood Still" followed Klaatu and his robot Gort, who lands his spacecraft in Cold War era Washington, D.C. just after the end of World War II.

Today, "The Day the Earth Stood Still" is brought to the present.

Directed by Scott Derrickson, the film updates Cold War themes like nuclear warfare to the more contemporary issue of global warming.

This remake supposedly stays true to the original while also sticking closely to "Farewell to the Master," the short story by Harry Bates which the original was based on.

Keanu Reeves plays Klaatu, an alien messenger in human form. Jennifer Connelly plays Helen Benson, a famed astrobiologist at Princeton University who is recruited by the government to study Klaatu. The cast also includes Jon Hamm, who plays Dr. Michael Granier, a NASA official who recruits Helen into his scientific team to investigate Klaatu.

The stars gave their thoughts on the film as a remake, what the film can teach us and whether or not they believe in extraterrestrial beings.

Q: What do you think will attract audiences to see this film as opposed to other similar films in the genre or other films that are out at this time?

KR: Personally, I've seen the film, and to me, it's come to turn out how I hoped. It's a big idea film. It hopes to be enjoyable on a lot of different levels. I think it's a film you can take your kids to. It's a film that has something to think about. It's a big idea film. There are some great visuals, but

Fast food not necessarily 'fat food'

Healthiest choices at the drive-thru

By Jodi Tanasciuk
Collegian Staff

Let's face it. No matter how healthful we try to eat, everyone ends up at a fast-food restaurant at some point, wondering what to order.

Is there such a thing as a healthy fast-food option? We asked two registered dietitians to consider the choices at 10 restaurants. Ximena Jimenez, a spokeswoman for the American Dietetic Association who works for Weston, Fla.-based MyRDforMe Inc., a nutritional consulting company, and Cindi Creighton-Reis of Boca Raton, Fla., who works for Community Hospital Diabetes & Nutrition Center.

Here's what they had to say. (Ah, and just so you know, both dietitians admit to occasionally eating fast food.)

MCDONALD'S

The 420-calorie Premium Grilled Chicken Classic Sandwich is the best choice. Skip the mayonnaise and you reduce fat intake from 10 grams to 5 grams. But even with the mayo, it's not a bad choice.

Finish your meal with a Fruit 'n Yogurt Parfait for calcium. It has 4 grams of protein and 130 calories without granola.

KFC

The Toasted Wrap with Original Recipe Chicken Strip without sauce has 270 calories and 11 grams of fat. Add a side order of 50-calorie green beans for fiber and Vitamin A.

POLLO TROPICAL

The Pork TropChop Combo is a one-bowl meal that includes yellow rice, vegetables (usually broccoli and carrots) and protein. It has 480 calories and 21 grams of fat. You can add a side of black beans for 7 grams of fiber and 7 grams of protein.

STEAK 'N SHAKE

Order the 337-calorie, double Marinated Grilled Chicken Sandwich. The difference between the single and double sandwich is minimal.

Add apples and grapes (an unusual fast-food choice) for fiber.

WENDY'S

The Mandarin Chicken Salad with Grilled Chicken Fillet is the best choice, with 540 calories and almost 25 grams of fat.

Using just half of the dressing saves you from about 10 grams of fat and 80 calories.

Have a fresh fruit bowl with yogurt or low-fat yogurt, and you'll get some calcium and potassium.

ARBY'S

Stick with original menu items such as the Regular Roast Beef Sandwich, which has 320 calories, 11 grams of fat and about 950 milligrams of sodium. Newer sandwiches, such as the crispy Chicken Cordon Bleu, are nearly double in calories, fat and salt.

Add a salad for balance.

TACO BELL

Best bets include the high-fiber, original Regular bean burrito and a Fresco crunchy taco.

The burrito has 350 calories and 9 grams of fat. The taco has 150 calories, 3 grams of fiber and 8 grams of fat.

Always add extra tomato, lettuce, onion and salsa to your dishes.

BURGER KING

Order the regular Flame-Broiled Hamburger. Just say no to the mayo to save 90 calories.

Ask for extra lettuce and tomatoes. And you're allowed a small order of fries, provided you only eat half or share it with someone else.

This meal has about 500 calories and 8 grams of saturated fat — as much as 381 grams of saturated fat as other Burger King burgers.

Order a Double Whopper with Cheese and you're consuming 990 calories and 24 grams of saturated fat.

SUBWAY

The 6-inch, oven-roasted chicken breast sub on a whole wheat roll has 330 calories.

When it comes time to add vegetables, ask for lots.

You, of course, want to skip the mayo, but add a little oil, vinegar, pepper and oregano or mustard.

CHIK-FIL-A

The Chargrilled Chicken Sandwich has just 270 calories and 3 grams of fat without any mayonnaise. The restaurant offers light mayo, a packet adds just 40 calories and 4 grams of fat.

McDonald's offers healthier alternatives to the classic double cheeseburger, including the Premium Grilled Chicken Classic Sandwich.

an electric guitar accompaniment, Enigk delivered each song with the power and ardor of true musicianship.

To begin the set, Enigk crooned "Abegail Anne" off of his 1996 debut album, "Return of the Frog Queen."

Moving onto unreleased material, songs like "Late of Camera" and "April Storm" showcased the new direction in which Enigk's music is headed.

Though they were similar to some of his previous material, the songs served as somewhat of a return to his higher intensity performances. Both tracks were taken off of "OK Bear," set for release this coming February.

"River to Sea," off of 2006's "World Waits" followed the new songs, bringing the volume down to a minimum for the time being.

Another surprising addition to the set was "Burn," also off "World Waits." Though the song is quite popular among Enigk's fans, it has rarely been added to his set lists, making it a welcoming addition to the performance.

A highlight of the show was his captivating rendition of "Carnival" from "Return of the Frog Queen."

The song, which is played in a curiously haunting minor key, spans the reaches of Enigk's vocal range and complemented his flawless guitar work.

Enigk prefaced another one of his unreleased songs, "Same Side Imaginary," by pointing out that, "It's the closest to country I've ever gotten."

One fan was compelled to teasingly ask where his cowboy boots were, to which he replied, chuckling, "It's clothes. I'm not quite ready to wear the boots and the hat yet."

Despite the drunken hollers of Sunny Day fans for old favorites like "In Circles," Enigk restricted the set to his own material. His choice certainly did not detract from the evening, as he played a wide range of material from his past and future albums.

As an encore, Enigk harkened back to his work from the soundtrack to "The United States of Leland," performing a heartfelt rendition of "Set it on Fire."

While it may seem like an impossible feat, Enigk's live performance was better than his studio recordings, with his love of the art more tangible than ever.

At several moments in the evening, when the music overcame him, Enigk would turn his face up to the blinding spotlights and close his eyes. The image that resulted, in conjunction with his moving vocal displays, was inspiring at the very least.

The only complaint among those present was the length of Enigk's set, a brief hour long. However, if the sayings of old hold any truth, brevity is preferable so long as quality abounds.

Once again, Enigk proved himself as someone to believe in.

Movie has message for us

"The Day the Earth Stood Still," in theaters today, addresses current issues such as nuclear warfare and global warming.

EARTH from page 8

it's also got some real, at the heart of it, personal relationships. Jennifer Connelly is playing a scientist and also a mother, a stepmother to a young boy, and they have their relationship. She's lost a husband, he's lost his father. You kind of see this relationship. They're both in grief, and how is their relationship going to resolve? So, the film is trying to work on a bunch of different levels. It's kind of got big ideas, but it's also got smaller kind of human stories to it.

JC: I don't know of any other movies out there that are really like it, to tell you the truth. I think it brings more of the character of the original film, which was made in 1951, but I don't know of any other movies that are out there like it. I think there's something special about it in that way, the way that it's a big, exciting kind of spectacle of a movie. I think it fulfills the genre in that way. It's like you have your popcorn. It's thrilling. It's exciting. It's fun. But also, it's really responsible. I think it's also really resonant with things that are going on in the world today that people are talking about and are concerned about and maybe anxious about. I think it's a really nice balance, a really nice combination of elements.

Q: What do you hope audiences take away from the film?

KR: Well, we hope that people, obviously, enjoy the film. It hopes to entertain, but also to leave you with something to think about, and I think it's a film that has a real positive message. We're facing so many hardships and crises during these times, and there's a kind of hope, that we can do it.

JC: I felt that it was really uplifting as a film. [It's] honest and truthful. [and] gives this truthful view of what we're doing and how we're living and how we're treating each other and what's going with the planet. But I think at the end of the day, at the end of the film, I felt it was empowering in a way. I liked the way I felt when I finished watching the film.

Two guys, one column

We here at The Massachusetts Daily Collegian and by we I mean myself (Sports Editor) and Mr. EIC himself, Michael King – have been covering UMass sports for far too long.

So who better to go to when you want to know the results of UMass hockey vs. Bemidji State (who?) – before it even happens?

So let's take a look at how well things shake down over the first few weeks of winter break. Check Dailycollegian.com in mid-January for a new installment of "Two guys, one column."

Just remember, you heard it here first.

Friday, Dec. 12

Hockey vs. American International (King) UMass wins 7-1. (Rosenwaike) This game is a joke. Even you could score a goal, and you're the worst skater in America. UMass wins 6-0.

Saturday, Dec. 13

Men's Basketball @ Kansas (King) Now that the Minutemen are officially the best 2-6 team in the country, that new-found confidence should translate on the court. But not here against Kansas. Look for the Jayhawks to cruise to a 86-70 win. (Rosenwaike) Bill Self could beat UMass all by himself. Jayhawks win 83-62.

Saturday, Dec. 20

Women's Basketball vs. Northwestern (King) UMass wins 66-49 behind 23 points from Stefanie Gerardot. (Rosenwaike) UMass needs all these days off before this game. They'll take advantage and win 58-52.

Men's Basketball vs. Hofstra (King) UMass wins 89-79. (Rosenwaike) Minutemen take it 77-64.

Saturday, Dec. 27

Men's Basketball vs. IUPUI (King) Two consecutive wins might be the beginning of something for the Minutemen. And with IUPUI guard George Hill gone for the NBA, this looks like a possibility. UMass wins 72-57. (Rosenwaike) No Hill, no win for IUPUI. UMass takes it 73-62.

Sunday, Dec. 28

Hockey @ Bemidji State (Hanover, N.H.) The Minutemen won their only mid-season tournament championship last season and defeated a talented Colorado College squad. UMass had success against its only WCHA opponent this season (3-2 win over North Dakota). Look for UMass to win 3-2. (Rosenwaike) I've never heard of Bemidji State. They can't be good. UMass wins 4-1.

Monday, Dec. 29

Women's Basketball vs. Seton Hall (King) Seton Hall wins 54-49. (Rosenwaike) UMass loses 61-49.

Tuesday, Dec. 30

Men's Basketball @ Houston (King) Last year's game was a shootout. The onus will be on the Minutemen to keep pace offensively this time around. Houston wins 102-85. (Rosenwaike) UMass drops a close one, 79-75.

Friday, Jan. 2

Women's Basketball vs. Boston University (King) BU wins 63-49. (Rosenwaike) UMass wins 62-58.

Saturday, Jan. 3

Men's Basketball vs. Vanderbilt (King) Vandy takes this one 88-86. (Rosenwaike) No way it's that close. UMass loses 83-70.

Sunday, Jan. 4

Women's Basketball @ Boston College (King) BC wins 59-41. (Rosenwaike) UMass loses (what else is new?) 63-50.

Hockey vs. Cornell (King) Cornell wins 1-0. (Rosenwaike) UMass wins 2-1.

Wednesday, Jan. 7

Women's Basketball vs. NJIT (King) UMass wins, 76-61. (Rosenwaike) NJIT stinks at basketball. UMass wins 64-51.

Friday, Jan. 9

Hockey vs. New Hampshire (King) UNH wins 4-2. (Rosenwaike) UMass wins 3-2.

Men's & Women's Skiing @ Colby Sawyer Carnival (King) Men's team place fourth, women place second. (Rosenwaike) Both teams finish second.

Saturday, Jan. 10

Men's Basketball vs. Boston (Springfield) (King) Kellogg makes his triumphant return to the City of Homes and leads the Minutemen to victory, 76-68. (Rosenwaike) This will be the best game of the year, but UMass falls, 79-77.

Women's Basketball @ Fordham (Bronx, N.Y.) (King) Fordham wins 66-45. (Rosenwaike) UMass wins a close one, 60-56.

Hockey @ New Hampshire (Durham, N.H.) (King) UNH sweeps the weekend series with a 5-2 win. (Rosenwaike) UMass drops it 3-1.

Saturday, Jan. 3

Men's & Women's Swimming at Loyola Invitational (San Juan, Puerto Rico) (King) These teams always thrive in the annual Puerto Rico trip that is just as much about the experience as it is about training. (Rosenwaike) Sure, what he said.

Wednesday, Jan. 14

Men's Basketball vs. Saint Louis (King) Saint Louis wins 89-81. (Rosenwaike) Rick Majerus is a beautiful man, but I Mass wins 75-68.

Women's Basketball vs. Charlotte (King) Charlotte always has trouble with these January games when the weather gets bad. ... oh wait, wrong sport. 49ers win 56-53. (Rosenwaike) UMass is going to lose, and lose badly. Charlotte wins 67-49.

Scores and Smack

Last week: Rosenwaike 4-3; King 4-3. Season: Rosenwaike 19-14; King 17-15.

(Rosenwaike) Don't let the tied record this past week fool you, I won again for the fourth time in four tries in the history of this column. In all our agreements, I was closer to predicting the final score, so I get the tie breaker.

(King) OK, so I had some flukes aren't looking good for me. Thank goodness I have this entire month of January to practice making predictions. And hopefully this month I won't have to look at your pretty face for at least six weeks.

(Rosenwaike) Since my Footballs Idiotic you'll trust me.

Next month's progress crucial for UMass

By Scott Feldman
Collegian Staff

While most students at the University of Massachusetts will get a chance to relax over winter break, there will be no rest for players on the Massachusetts basketball team as the season rolls on.

After a rocky start to their season, the Minutemen (2-6) will look to get back on track by making a run in Atlantic 10 play. But first, they'll prepare for those games by finishing their rigorous out-of-conference schedule, starting with defending national champion Kansas.

The Minutemen will face what could be their toughest challenge all season when they take on Kansas (7-1) on the road Saturday night. The Jayhawks have won 30 straight home games.

Kansas has dominated its opponents in nearly every statistical category. The Jayhawks have outshot their opponents by an average of 48.2 percent to 36 percent, averaged 9.9 more rebounds than their opposition and scored 83.5 points while allowing 62.6 points per game. Their only loss came in overtime 89-81 to undefeated Syracuse.

For the Minutemen to have a shot to pull off what would be a huge upset, they'll need another stellar performance from emerging star Tony Gaffney.

Gaffney has been the best player on the team, averaging 13.3 points, 12.9 rebounds and 5.37 blocks per game. He has notched five double-doubles this season after having zero prior to this year, including a monster game Wednesday against Holy Cross with 17 points, 11 rebounds, eight blocks and four steals.

UMass is 4-1 all-time against defending national champions, most recently defeating the 2006 champion Florida Gators in the National Invitation Tournament during the Minutemen's run to the NIT finals last season. Coach Derek Kellogg understands a win isn't likely, but he felt that facing off against top competition would give UMass valuable experience.

"To realistically go in [against top teams] and beat them, that's a tough task," Kellogg said before the season. "Now can you go in there, play tough and maybe put a scare into them? Well, that's the goal."

After facing Kansas, the Minutemen will return to Amherst to host Hofstra on Dec. 20 and IUPUI on Dec. 27, and then fly out to take on Houston on Dec. 30. Obviously all coaches want to win every game, but what Kellogg is most concerned about is making sure his team continues to improve and get ready for A-10 play.

"We're shooting for the Atlantic 10 season ... that's what I keep telling our guys ... it's a long season," Kellogg said following the game against Boston College last Saturday. "When the Atlantic 10 season comes around, I don't want anybody in that league to think that we're an easy game."

The final test for the Minutemen before their conference schedule starts will be when they host Vanderbilt on Jan. 3. Currently, the Commodores are 6-3 and are coming off a 28-6 season in 2007, which earned them a fourth seed in the NCAA tournament.

UMass' road season begins on Jan. 10 when it takes on Dayton at the Mass. Mutual Center in Springfield. The Flyers are 8-1 and were picked to finish second in the A-10 preseason polls. With a presumably healthy 7-foot-1 center Luke Bonner back in the starting lineup, UMass will have another big body on the interior to play alongside Gaffney.

Ricky Harris and the Minutemen have a busy slate of games on tap over winter break. The action begins Saturday night for UMass against defending national champion Kansas.

UMass will also have to rely on players like freshman Tyrell Lynch and junior Matt Glass to play heavy minutes to give them size down low. Glass said he is up for the challenge.

"Obviously, we're missing a lot of big players. Tony is playing incredible but we need a few other guys to step up. I need to keep eating my Wheaties and get in the weight room so that I can be able to bang down there until we get Luke Bonner back," Glass said following the Holy Cross game.

UMass will play four more conference games after facing the Flyers before school resumes at Saint Louis, vs. Temple, at Charlotte and vs. La Salle. How they perform in those four games may determine what the postseason prospects will be for the Minutemen.

Meets to help prep swimmers for A-10s

By Henry J. Gaffen
Collegian Staff

The path to the Atlantic 10 Championship is taken on international duties this winter.

The Massachusetts men's and women's swimming and diving programs, as both teams will travel to San Juan, Puerto Rico (Dec. 6-8) for Lasorda Invitational on Dec. 10.

The committee will be joined once again by San Jose State University. UMass director Dave Arendell compared the Lasorda Invitational to where the Minutemen and Minutewomen are four years into the season.

By three early season meets, the swimming season reaches its pinnacle – a trip to Bethany Fleckenstein Aquatics Center for four days of championship action.

On a final road trip, UMass heads to the Bronx to take on Fordham on Jan. 31. The weekend immediately after, swimmers and divers will split up one last time to compete in the Army Diving Invitational and New England Invitational to prime them for the season's true test: A-10 Conference play.

UMass looks for progress over break

By Mike Gelbwasser
Collegian Staff

The holiday break will give UMass coach Marnie Ducko ample time to get the Massachusetts women's basketball team ready for its rigorous Atlantic 10 Conference schedule.

The Minutewomen (5-5) will prepare by fine-tuning their play in the closing games of their non-conference schedule. UMass will have until the second week of January to get ready for its first conference opponent, Fordham, on Jan. 10.

In that span of time, the Minutewomen will face one team in a western conference – New Jersey Institute of Technology (2-5) – and four teams in the east, including Northeastern (2-4), the second Colonial Athletic Association Conference opponent for UMass in as many games.

Cerie Musgrove and the Minutewomen face challenging Atlantic 10 foes Charlotte and Xavier once conference play begins on Jan. 10 for UMass.

Jasmine Crew's 21 assists lead the Huskies as well as her 11.9 points per game. Just behind Crew in points is Kim Carr, who has 11.7 points per game and whose 6-foot-1 frame gives Northeastern a post presence. Carr has eight blocks and 5.2 rebounds this season.

Like the Minutewomen, the Huskies are a young team, with a roster including only one senior and three juniors.

Next on the schedule is Seton Hall (6-1) of the Big East Conference. The Pirates are one of six one-loss teams in one of the strongest conferences in the country. Four players are averaging at least 10 points per game. Forward Nicole Emery leads the Pirates with 12.7 points per game and has 19 blocks and 13 steals on the season.

Alongside Emery is forward Notersha Womack, who's averaging 13.1 points and 11.8 rebounds per game while shooting 53 percent from the field.

As a team, Seton Hall is averaging a 23-point margin of victory per game.

Boston University (5-4) is the last opponent in UMass' four-game home stand. Senior Jessica Burles Wiley leads the Terriers with 15.9 points per game and she has 38 points from the free-throw line this season, while shooting 80 percent from the charity stripe.

The Minutewomen then travel to Chestnut Hill to face Boston College (6-2) before rounding out their non-conference schedule against the NJIT.

UMass then travels to the Bronx to begin its A-10 Conference schedule against Fordham. Junior forward Randall Hurst is the only Ram averaging double-figures in scoring (12.7). With 34 points from the foul line, Hurst is a physical player who frequently gets to the basket.

Sophomore guard Brianna Bo[illegible] six points per game with eight 3-pointers, going 53 percent from beyond the arc. She contributes off the ball as well. Her 31 assists and 14 steals are both team-highs.

Senior forward Iaisha Earl leads the defensive effort in the post for Fordham, swatting 12 shots so far this season.

UMass also plays Charlotte (7-2), which is one of the best teams in the conference. Four of its starters average at least 10 points per game. Senior guard Traci Ray is 10-3-pointers and 18 steals both lead the 49ers.

Starting four players who are at least 6-foot-tall, Charlotte is a big, physical squad. The 49ers have an average of 41 rebounds per game. 4.1 more than their opponents.

After playing Charlotte is one of the Minutewomen's former St. Bonaventure rivals. The Bonnies are led offensively by Dana Mackey (15.7 points per game) and Kandice Martin (10.0). Martin is enjoying [illegible] becoming one of 10 players in the country.

Cerie Musgrove is one of the biggest contributors for the Minutewomen and will be key for Xavier (7-3). At which is just outside the top 25 polls. The Musketeers have a strong and experienced squad, with 10 players averaging at least 10 minutes per game.

Sophomore center Ta'Nia Phillips leads Xavier with 16 blocks, 10 steals and 14.2 points per game.

Richmond, Va., is the final destination for UMass before classes resume. The Minutewomen will take on the Spiders (8-0), who are currently the only unbeaten team in the A-10.

Track, rowing, skiing teams almost set to start seasons

By Steve Levine
Collegian Staff

For many college students, the holiday break generally means relaxation. For winter athletes, however, it means the start of an intense season. In the middle of the frigid air running our way, our coastal campus will find that the action is just starting to heat up.

The men's and women's track teams will be underway this break, as the women begin the season with a meet against Boston University, Boston College and Sacred Heart at 1 p.m. on Jan. 15. The women's will then travel to the New York Armory to participate in the Great Dane Invitational on Jan. 23. A week later, January's competition will round off as the women participate at the Reebok Classic in Roxbury, Mass.

Three hours into the women's Great Dane Invitational, the men will kick off their season at the Terrier Classic, hosted by BU. A two-day event, the Terrier Classic proves to be a challenging first test for the Minutemen, as it comes over a month into the fall. Joining the Lady Terrier contender, the men will close out January's action at the Reebok Classic.

Chance at a repeat

Both the men's and women's ski teams begin their seasons on Jan. 9, when they travel to Mt. Sunapee for the two-day giant slalom and slalom events at the Colby-Sawyer College Carnival. All races throughout the season consist of two-day events including both slalom and giant slalom at a designated mountain.

The ski teams come into this season with high aspirations – especially the men. Last year, the Minutemen were the national champions in both slalom and giant slalom events. The ladies took fifth place on last year's trip to Sunapee in 2008. Before last year's victory, it had been 23 years since an eastern team won the championship.

Much like 2008, the men's team will defend the national Minutemen title in the slalom event, but with the women joined in a new, improved role. The 2009 championship event features a giant slalom finale, which the women's team will look for the win. The Nashville Classic at Waterville Valley, N.H. The qualifying season culminates six days later with the U-Mass Carnival at Loon Mountain in Lincoln, N.H. for the ECAC Carnival that will end January's races.

Rowing through 2008

The 12-time Atlantic 10 champion women's rowing team capped off their fall season with impressive performances at the Head of the Charles.

The Minutewomen's season picks up again on Jan. 7 when they travel to Deland, Fla. for their annual winter training trip.

President Barack Obama delivers his inaugural address at the U.S. Capitol in Washington, D.C., Tuesday, January 20, 2009. An estimated 1.8 million people packed the capital to witness an inauguration laden with hope but tempered with uncertainty for the next four years.

"The challenges are real, they are serious and they are many."

– PRESIDENT BARACK OBAMA

A nation hopes to witness

A surprisingly large crowd packs the Cape Cod Lounge to watch the inauguration. The University had to open spillover sites to accomodate.

Area locals look to commune, watch inauguration together

By Matt Rocheleau
Collegian Staff

As record-setting crowds packed into the nation's capital on Tuesday, the turnout at local gatherings also exceeded expectations as people joined to watch televised broadcasts of the Presidential Inauguration of Barack Obama.

Attended by mainly Obama supporters, public screenings were held at the University of Massachusetts, The Academy of Music in Northampton and at Rafters Sports Bar & Restaurant in Amherst.

At UMass, faculty, staff, students and local residents were among an estimated 1,000 spectators, according to Kevin Libby, the event's planner and a senior majoring in Social Thought and the Political Economy.

Both the Student Union's Cape Cod Lounge and ballroom filled to capacity, causing event staff to open The Hatch food court to make room for a larger-than-anticipated audience. Others crowded into the Blue Wall eatery.

"We originally thought we'd get between 50 and 100 people," explained Lloyd Henley, assistant director for the Center for Student Development. "Then, it started to grow."

"We were blown away with the RSVP requests," added Libby, who said people began arriving around 45 minutes prior to the event's planned start at 11 a.m. "It's exciting that we, as a UMass community, can come together to be a part of this."

Expressing a desire to share the moment with others was common throughout the day.

"Obviously it's just a momentous occasion. The difference here is you don't want to be alone. You want to be with a community of people," said TreaAndrea Russworm, assistant professor in the English department. "If you can't be in D.C., you want to be with others."

Vice Provost for Outreach Sharon L. Fross said, "We're all working at the campus, and it's really wonderful to be a part of the campus community and to be together."

Watching the television coverage from the Blue Wall, she added, "It is historic, and I think all of us recognize that. We recognize where the country is. We recognize the historic nature of his election, and [President Obama] has so many in the country behind him."

WASHINGTON — Barack Obama asked Americans to brave the "icy currents" in the "winter of our hardship" — and if the frosty temperatures and long lines more than a million people endured over many hours at Tuesday's inauguration are any indication, they are poised to accept the challenge.

For many of the estimated 1.8 million people who crowded onto the National Mall and the vicinity to witness Obama's swearing-in, the events were the culmination of months of carefully laid plans, many hours of travel and a willingness to do whatever it took to witness history in the making.

Retired Judge Sean Dunphy and wife Ann Dunphy, of Northampton, daughters

Jennifer Dunphy and Elizabeth Creamer, of Maryland, and five grandchildren all got up in the wee hours so they could make it to the National Mall in time to get places to stand in front of one of the Jumbotrons, which allowed people far from the Capitol to watch the proceedings.

They didn't have tickets that would have allowed them to stand somewhere on the Mall itself, but the extended Dunphy family didn't consider that a stumbling block.

"The big thing for us is not only being here but being here with the family," Sean Dunphy said.

They were warming up at a pre-inauguration coffee-and-doughnut reception held by U.S. Rep. Richard Neal, D-Springfield, at a Capitol Hill American Legion.

WASHINGTON — Around 1.8 million descended on Washington D.C. Tuesday to witness Barack Obama's historic inauguration as the United States' 44th President, including a large amount of young people for the first time in years.

The streets of the nation's capital were full of hopeful voices. Cheers and excited screaming rang out across the brisk morning as a large police and military presence made many tofeel secure

The crowd was jubilant before Obama took the podium, as the cheering masses listened to Pastor Rick Warren's invocation, and a performance of an original John Williams composition featuring cellist Yo-Yo Macomposition.

Many of the city's residents and visitors were smiling and optimistic

"It's just a wonderful experience, I'm so glad to be here," said Jenene Jones, 25, of Macon, Ga.

"I'm so glad we can reclaim the presidency," said Texas A&M senior Jake Here, of Galveston,Texas. "I've lived in Texas most of my life and have always lived in an area where Republicans have been touted as great, as being right, and I've always valued progressive thought and was a big proponent of Obama from the start; but when he won, I just couldn't believe it.""

Here and his roommate had been forced to stay in a suburb of Philadelphia to get a room for the festivities and then traveled two hours by train to Washington, before quipping that he had no doubt it was a worthwhile trip.

"I told my roommate Ben I have to witness this historic moment in history," continued Hereed

Others were ready to celebrate months of hard work they had spent campaigning in the hopes of seeing this day come to pass

"We've just been working really hard this whole campaign, and we wanted to reward ourselves for all of the canvassing and phone drives and hours volunteering by coming down here to witness this," said members of the Beckley, W.Va., Young Democrats.

The diverse crowd seemed to share an electrifying excitement about the nation's new leader.

Many could be seen huddled together over cell phones and portable radios, as the millions on Washington Mall strained to catch Obama's inaugural address. His voice echoed over the massive crowd, many of whom seemed driven to display support for the landmark elec

Campus braces for budget cuts

By Lisa DeBenedictis
Collegian Staff

With change being the operative word, a new year, new president and new semester all position the University of Massachusetts for a time of change. However, in the case of the University's financial position, not all change can be good.

Indeed, upcoming changes are exactly what UMass students should expect, especially with nearly $50 million expected to be cut from the campus budget.

Many of the ways the University will cope with the cuts are already in place. However, most of them will not be directly impacting students this semester, but rather the next.

"The $45 million projected budget gap is for next fiscal year, which begins July 1," said UMass spokesman Ed Blaguszewski. "For this fiscal year, to date the campus has incurred an $11.3 million cut in its budget. This year's cut shouldn't impact students, since we made one-time reductions in budgets, which included a targeted hiring freeze and curtailment of travel."

In an effort to update both students and faculty on the latest budget processes and executive area budget cuts, on Dec. 16 and Jan. 13, Chancellor Robert Holub released two more campus-wide e-mails.

In his Jan. 13 e-mail, the chancellor stressed that while the University will be cutting back wherever possible, the goal of the Budget Task Force is to maintain the academic quality of the University.

"My charge to the Task Force was simple: consider all strategies to deal with this fiscal crisis in ways that allow us to focus our energy and resources on our core values of teaching and research," said Holub in his January e-mail.

The budget cuts will be executive area cuts and mergers in the administration by over $500,000 and reductions in capital funding through a hold of $5 million in capital construction.

"Fund reductions of $1.5 million for lab renovations and deferred maintenance, one-time savings by cancelling $3.8 million for the Stockbridge pedestrian walkway, $2 million in electrical work, and $650,000 in campus landscape improvements and signage," said Blaguszewski, of the specific construction projects already placed on hold.

There are also cuts of $1.5 million in base spending on maintenance and other construction projects, such as $500,000 from refurbishing academic offices and laboratories, $464,000 from long-term deferred maintenance funds, and $500,000 from moves on campus for relocation.

"The cuts I am aware of have to do with 'campus beautification' projects," said professor Ernest

Vassell's supporters march into the Southwest Residential Area last spring in a "Take Back Southwest" rally against campus violence. The state asked to relocate Vassell's trial, saying an impartial jury cannot be found.

Vassell trial may move

As the one-year anniversary of the arrest of former University of Massachusetts student Jason Vassell approaches, the prosecution has requested a venue change for the March trial while Vassell's supporters are planning another rally in his defense.

At a pre-trial hearing on Jan. 15, First Deputy Assistant Northwestern District Attorney Elizabeth Dunphy Farris requested a change of venue for the controversial trial. Vassell, a black student forced to withdraw from the University pending trial, is charged with stabbing two men, John C. Bowes and Jonathan J. Bosse, both of whom are white, after they allegedly harassed and threatened him in his dormitory.

The case has become a widely-publicized controversy, with Vassell's supporters claiming a racist prosecution of an innocent man while some say the Committee for Justice for Jason Vassell (CJJV), the community group organized in his support, is playing the race card.

The incident occurred nearly a year ago. The CJJV announced in an e-mail to supporters Friday that there will be a "Day of Shame" event on Feb. 3, the one-year anniversary of the incident, which will include a rally outside MacKimmie Hall in Southwest and a "National Call-in Day."

The pre-trial hearing followed a motion to dismiss the case filed on Dec. 29 "on the ground that the defendant has been selectively prosecuted because of his race, in violation of the rights guaranteed him by the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution and Articles I and XII of the Massachusetts Declaration of Rights," according to the e-mail sent by the CJJV. The motion will be heard on Wednesday, Feb. 18 in the Northampton Court House at 2 p.m.

Dunphy Farris said at the pre-trial hearing that the defense has "infect[ed] the jury pool" and made it impossible to find impartial jurors. The CJJV says that the prosecution is intimidated by the efficiency with which the group has spread the word of Vassell's plight.

"At this hearing [Dunphy Farris] was clearly concerned by the support that the Committee for Justice for Jason has continued to mobilize for almost a year now," said Joe Mirkin, a UMass alumnus and member of the CJJV media committee in an e-mail.

Judge Judd C. Carthart said at the pre-trial hearing that a venue change wouldn't be considered until the trial.

Vassell and his sister, Tiffany, after the July 24 pre-trial hearing.

Vassell's attorneys, David P. Hoose and Luke Ryan, were granted access to the high school disciplinary records of Bowes and Bosse – both of whom attended school in Milton, Mass. – at the Jan. 15 pre-trial hearing. They claim that the two men have previous records of racially motivated attacks.

The trial is scheduled for some time in March. If convicted, Vassell could face up to 20 years in prison.

New Year to bring big cuts

CUTS from page 1

May, chairman of the Budget Task Force and secretary of the Faculty Senate. "All construction projects underway are scheduled to be completed. New construction projects are part of the capital budget, not the operating budget, which is where the cuts are targeted."

In addition to these steps taken by the Budget Task Force to cut back expenses, reductions to energy consumption have also been enacted.

"Reducing energy consumption and costs was an idea that drew widespread support and suggestions from all segments of campus," added Holub in his December e-mail. "Today I want to announce that we will set centrally controlled thermostats on campus down to 67 degrees."

Blaguszewski added that UMass has reduced its energy consumption by 21 percent over the past four years.

"The campus has reduced its consumption of steam by 24 percent, water by 43 percent and electricity by 9 percent since 2002," explained Blaguszewski. "In addition, all campus buildings now have meters to measure electric consumption and several revenue-based campus departments are being offered rebates if they can reduce their utility costs."

What students will see next year is the potential for reorganization of schools and colleges within the University, for example, to combine the College of Humanities and Fine Arts with the College of Social and Behavioral Sciences.

"The University is considering a consolidation of academic administration, including a reorganization of the schools and colleges. Such action would cut administrative costs, preserving funds for teaching, learning and research," said Blaguszewski.

"Budget cuts may result in a reduction of faculty positions (through vacancies, departures and retirements), larger classes, fewer courses, and staff layoffs," he continued. "However, the University will protect its core teaching and research mission, and position itself for future success. We expect students will be able to arrange a full schedule of courses and proceed toward graduation as scheduled."

UMass student Lindsay McCluskey, a representative on the Budget Task Force, stated that the biggest impact on UMass students will be the increase in fees next fiscal year.

"I think that we will feel the pain from the budget cuts next year. The fundamental change students will feel is the increase in fees, especially as the private loan industry is so competitive. There is no hard data on it, but the chancellor has requested a 15 percent fee increase," said McCluskey.

May agrees, but urges students to keep in mind that this fee increase is vital to maintain the value of a UMass education.

"There is no doubt that a $1,500 fee increase in the cost of attending UMass will be a heavy burden for students," said May. "However, it is absolutely necessary in order to maintain the quality of a UMass education."

While the floundering economy may make these changes seem inevitable, Chancellor Holub, May and McCluskey all stress that there is possibility for change in another form – advocacy.

"This is clearly the time for students and their parents to let their governor and their legislatures know that this situation is not acceptable, and that they must fix it," said May. "UMass students come from every part of the state – every legislative district. If every legislator heard from enough students, parents, alumni, etc., in strong enough terms, another solution would be found."

"If there are students who are interested with working with the Student Government Association and other organizations advocating at the state capital and in [Washington] D.C., I encourage students to get involved," added McCluskey. "The only way I see a change coming is if students get together and work for it."

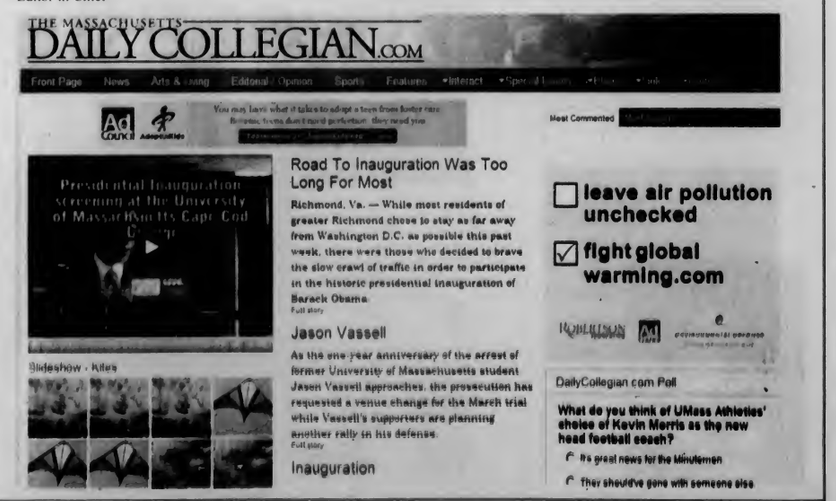
Dear Reader,

As a news service, our role in the University of Massachusetts community is constantly evolving. Fewer than two decades ago, The Massachusetts Daily Collegian was available solely in the print edition found on campus and in the surrounding communities. But fewer than 14 years ago we launched into the realm of online media with our website, www.dailycollegian.com.



This semester we're making a stronger commitment to our website and providing even more exceptional content beyond what you can find in the daily paper. We'll have multimedia features that expand upon our articles, including audio slideshows and video content. Also, you can find unique content such as podcasts that analyze recent UMass sporting events, and a weekly roundtable of Collegian editors debating campus issues. Check the inside page of each print issue for a summary of our online offerings.

Our completely redesigned website will launch this afternoon at 3:00 p.m. Check dailycollegian.com frequently for news and content updates between issues.

Additionally, we've redesigned our daily broadsheet and weekend edition to provide a more graphically pleasing and better organized newspaper. But the one thing that will remain constant is the passion and veracity with which we report the news.

Sincerely,

Michael King
Editor in Chief

heard from the newly appointed commander in chief.

"I thought it was a very good speech," said Willie Pope, associate director of the Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black and other Minority Students. "It's one that's going to bring people and inspire people to do things together. And, that's the only way that we are going to move forward in this country is by us all coming together to putting our heads together to try and solve what problems we have."

UMass student, Ryan Pothering, agreed.

"I've always liked listening to his speeches," he said. "He's very eloquent. He ties his arguments in very well."

In downtown Northampton, hundreds were lined up outside The Academy of Music nearly an hour before the venue's free screening of the inaugural broadcast began.
